Order by Chief Judge of the United States Court of Appeals for the Fifth Circuit, Convening a Statutory Three-Judge Court in CA-3-3690-B, Filed March 18, 1970

IN THE

UNITED STATES DISTRICT COURT

FOR THE NORTHERN DISTRICT OF TEXAS

Civil Action No. 3-3690-B

JANE ROE,

—v.—

HENRY WADE.

(1) Requesting Judge: Honorable SARAH T. HUGHES, Northern District of Texas.

(2) District Judge: Honorable W. M. TAYLOR, Northern District of Texas.

(3) Circuit Judge: Honorable IRVING L. GOLDBERG.

(4) Date of Order: 3-16-70.

The Requesting Judge (1) above named to whom an application for relief has been presented in the above cause having notified me that the action is one required by Act of Congress to be heard and determined by a District Court of three Judges, I, John R. Brown, Chief Judge of the Fifth Circuit, hereby designate the Circuit Judge (3) and District Judge (2) named above to serve with the Requesting Judge (1) as members of, and with him to constitute the said Court to hear and determine the action.

This designation and composition of the three-Judge court is not a prejudgment, express or implied, as to whether this is properly a case for a three-Judge rather than a one-Judge court. This is a matter best determined by the three-Judge Court as this enables a simultaneous appeal to the Court of Appeals and to the Supreme Court without the delay, awkwardness, and administrative insufficiency of a proceeding by way of mandamus from either the Court of Appeals, the Supreme Court, or both, directed against the Chief Judge of the Circuit, the presiding District Judge, or both. The parties will be afforded the opportunity to brief and argue all such questions before the three-Judge panel either preliminarily or on the trial of the merits, or otherwise, as that Court thinks appropriate. See Jackson v. Choate, 5 Cir., 1968, 404 F.2d 910, Jackson v. Department of Public Welfare of the State of Florida, S.D. Fla., 1968, 296 F.Supp. 1341; City of Gainesville, Georgia v. Southern Railway Company, N.D. Ga., 1969, 296 F.Supp. 763; Smith v. Ladner, S.D. Miss., 1966, 260 F.Supp. 918; Hargrave v. McKinney, M.D. Fla., 1969, 302 F.2d 1381; Langford v. Barlow [No. 26770], 5 Cir., 1969, 417 F.2d 628, Langford v. Barlow, W.D. Tex., 1969, 304 F.Supp. 657.

(1) Requesting Judge: Honorable W. M. TAYLOR, JR., Northern District of Texas.

(2) District Judge: Honorable SARAH T. HUGHES, Northern District of Texas.

(3) Circuit Judge: Honorable IRVING L. GOLDBERG.

(4) Date of Order: March 26, 1970.

The Requesting Judge (1) above named to whom an application for relief has been presented in the above cause having notified me that the action is one required by Act of Congress to be heard and determined by a District Court of three Judges, I, John R. Plaintiffs' First Amended Complaint in Roe v. Wade, CA-3-3690-B (N.D. Tex., Filed Apr. 22, 1970)

IN THE

UNITED STATES DISTRICT COURT

FOR THE NORTHERN DISTRICT OF TEXAS

DALLAS DIVISION

Civil Action No. CA-3-3690

JANE ROE, suing on behalf of herself and all others similarly situated,

Plaintiff,

—v.—

HENRY WADE, District Attorney of Dallas County,

Defendant.

I. PARTIES

1. Plaintiff, Jane Roe, is a citizen of the State of Texas, and a resident of Dallas County.

2. Defendant Henry Wade is the District Attorney of Dallas County, Texas, charged with the enforcement and administration of the criminal laws of the State of Texas in Dallas County.

II. JURISDICTION

1. Plaintiff invokes the jurisdiction of this Court under the First, Fourth, Fifth, Eighth, Ninth and Fourteenth Amendments to the United States Constitution; and under Title 28, United States Code, Sections 1331 and 1343, 2201 and 2202, and 2281 and 2284; Title 42 United States Code, Section 1983.

2. Plaintiff seeks (a) a declaratory judgment that Articles 1191, 1192, 1193, 1194, and 1196 of the Texas Penal Code (hereinafter sometimes collectively referred to as the Texas Abortion Laws) are unconstitutional on their face; and (b) a permanent injunction against the future enforcement of these statutes.

III. Facts

1. Plaintiff, Jane Roe, is an unmarried pregnant woman.

2. Because of the economic hardships and social stigmas involved in bearing an illegitimate child, Plaintiff wishes to terminate her pregnancy by means of an operation, generally referred to as an abortion (within the meaning of Article 1191 of the Texas Penal Code), performed by a competent, licensed physician, under safe, clinical conditions.

3. Plaintiff's life does not appear to be threatened by the continuation of her pregnancy.

4. Plaintiff has been unable to secure a legal abortion in Dallas County because of the existence of the Texas Abortion Laws.

5. Her inability to obtain an abortion has caused Plaintiff to suffer emotional trauma.

6. Plaintiff cannot afford to travel to another jurisdiction to seek to secure a legal abortion under safe, clinical conditions.

7. An abortion performed by a competent, licensed physician, under hospital or clinic conditions is a safe and simple procedure which presents less danger to the pregnant woman, particularly in the first trimester of pregnancy, than ordinary childbirth.

8. An abortion performed outside of the clinical setting by unqualified personnel is extremely dangerous and often results in death, maiming, sterility, or serious infection.

9. This is a proper case to be heard by a Three-Judge Court in that Plaintiff is challenging State statutes as invalid on their face under the United States Constitution, and is seeking an injunction against the enforcement of the statutes.

10. Plaintiff sues on behalf of herself and all other women who have sought, are seeking, or in the future will seek to obtain a legal, medically safe abortion but whose lives are not critically threatened by the pregnancy. The number of members of the class is large and joinder of all members is impractical; there are questions of law and fact common to each class; the claims of Plaintiff are typical of the claims of such class; and the named Plaintiff will fairly and adequately protect the interests of the class.

IV. Causes of Action

1. The Texas Abortion Laws are unconstitutionally vague and uncertain on their face.

2. Said statutes deprive women and their physicians of rights protected by the First, Fourth, Fifth, Ninth, and Fourteenth Amendments, in that the statutes are neither narrowly drawn nor supported by any overriding and compelling state interest.

(i) They infringe upon Plaintiff's right to safe and adequate medical advice pertaining to the decision of whether to carry a given pregnancy to term.

(ii) They deprive Plaintiff of the fundamental right of all women to choose whether and when to bear children.

(iii) They infringe upon Plaintiff's right to personal privacy.

(iv) They infringe upon Plaintiff's right to privacy in the physician-patient relationship.

3. Said statutes on their face infringe upon Plaintiff's right to life and liberty in violation of the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment.

4. Said statutes on their face violate the First Amendment's prohibition against laws respecting an establishment of religion.

5. Said statutes on their face deny Plaintiff the equal protection of the laws.

V. Relief Requested

1. Plaintiff prays that a Three-Judge Court be convened to hear this cause.

2. Plaintiff prays that a declaratory judgment be issued holding the Texas Abortion Laws to be unconstitutional on their face.

3. Plaintiff further prays for a permanent injunction restraining Defendant, his agents, and successors from enforcing the challenged statutes, that costs be taxed against the Defendant and for such further relief, at law or in equity, as Plaintiff may be entitled to receive.

Plaintiffs' First Amended Complaint in Doe v. Wade, CA-3-3691-C (N.D. Tex., Filed Apr. 22, 1970)

IN THE

UNITED STATES DISTRICT COURT

FOR THE NORTHERN DISTRICT OF TEXAS

DALLAS DIVISION

Civil Action No. CA-3-3691

JOHN DOE and MARY DOE, suing on behalf of themselves and all others similarly situated,

Plaintiffs,

v.

HENRY WADE, DISTRICT ATTORNEY OF DALLAS COUNTY,

Defendant.

I. PARTIES

1. Plaintiffs, John and Mary Doe, are citizens of the State of Texas, and residents of Dallas County.

2. Defendant Henry Wade is the District Attorney of Dallas County, Texas, charged with the enforcement and administration of the criminal laws of the State of Texas in Dallas County.

II. JURISDICTION

1. Plaintiffs invoke the jurisdiction of this Court under the First, Fourth, Fifth, Eighth, Ninth, and Fourteenth

LEED THROUGH

Amendments to the United States Constitution; and under Title 28, United States Code, Sections 1331 and 1343, 2201 and 2202, and 2281 and 2284; and Title 42, United States Code, Section 1983.

2. Plaintiffs seek (a) a declaratory judgment that Articles 1191, 1192, 1193, 1194, and 1196 of the Texas Penal Code (hereinafter sometimes collectively referred to as the Texas Abortion Laws) are unconstitutional on their face; and (b) a permanent injunction against the future enforcement of these statutes.

III. Facts

1. Plaintiffs John and Mary Doe are a childless married couple.

2. Plaintiff Mary Doe is presently suffering from a neural-chemical disorder. Her physician has advised her to avoid pregnancy until such time as her condition has materially improved, (although a pregnancy at the present time would not present a serious risk to Mary Doe's life).

3. In view of the medical advice received from Mary Doe's physician, Plaintiffs feel that it is inadvisable for them to become parents unless and until Mary Doe's condition has improved. For other highly personal reasons Plaintiffs do not wish to become parents at any time in the near future.

4. Also pursuant to medical advice, Plaintiff Mary Doe has discontinued use of the most effective means of contraception, the birth control pill. Plaintiffs are now conscientiously practicing an alternative method of contracep-tion, but understand that there is nevertheless a significant risk of contraceptive failure.

5. Plaintiffs fear that due to contraceptive failure, they may face the prospect of becoming parents before they are properly prepared to accept the responsibilities of parenthood and before Mary Doe is able to undergo pregnancy without suffering considerable harm to her health and well-being. In such event, Plaintiffs would want to terminate the pregnancy by means of an operation, generally referred to as an abortion (within the meaning of Article 1191 of the Texas Penal Code), performed by a competent, licensed physician, under safe, clinical conditions.

6. Plaintiffs could not at the present time obtain a legal abortion in Dallas County, or anywhere else in Texas, in view of the Texas Abortion Laws which appear to limit legal abortions to those performed under medical advice in order to preserve the mother's life.

7. Should Mary Doe become pregnant, Plaintiffs' only alternative in Texas to carrying an unwanted pregnancy to term would be to secure an illegal abortion. Plaintiffs fear that the latter alternative would expose Mary Doe to an unnecessarily high risk of death, maiming, sterility, or serious infection. In addition, Plaintiffs would thereby suffer the extreme humiliation of participating in a furtive act, declared by the Texas Legislature to be a felony offense. And John Doe might risk prosecution under Article 70 of the Texas Penal Code as an accomplice to the crime of abortion.

8. Should Mary Doe become pregnant and Plaintiffs decide to secure a legal abortion, Plaintiffs would be forced to undergo the emotional trauma of contacting numerous persons to ascertain jurisdictions where they could meet the legal requirements, to contact a doctor or clinic at the expense of long distance calls to make arrangements for the operation, and to expend considerable sums in travel, etc. Further, by the time Plaintiffs ascertained the fact of pregnancy, made the medical arrangements, arranged for time off from work, and gathered the necessary funds, in all likelihood the first trimester of pregnancy would have passed and the operation would then involve considerably greater risk to Mary Doe's health and require a lengthier recuperation.

9. The possibility of having to choose between the above-mentioned alternatives is presently having a detrimental effect upon Plaintiffs' marital happiness.

10. Since the birth control methods available to plaintiffs involve a risk of pregnancy, the Texas Abortion Laws, by eliminating the possibility of obtaining an abortion with reasonable ease, force upon Plaintiffs the choice of refraining from normal sexual relations or of endangering Mary Doe's health through a possible pregnancy.

11. In addition, Plaintiffs want to actively participate in various organizations, the activities of which include the giving of advice and counseling to both married and unmarried pregnant women, including the giving of information to assist in securing abortions, if desired.

12. Plaintiffs fear that any participation on their part in the above-mentioned organizational activities might subject them to prosecution under either (a) Article 70 of the Texas Penal Code, as accomplices to the crime of Abortion; or (b) Article 1628 of the Texas Penal Code for conspiring to commit the crime of abortion. Therefore, Plaintiffs have refrained from participating in these activities.

13. This is a proper case to be heard by a Three-Judge Court in that Plaintiffs are challenging State Statutes as invalid on their face under the United States Constitution, and are seeking an injunction against the enforcement of the statutes.

14. Plaintiffs sue on behalf of themselves and all couples similarly situated, where they would seek an abortion were the woman to become pregnant and where the pregnancy would not constitute a critical threat to the woman's life. The number of members of the class is large and joinder of all members is impractical; there are questions of law and fact common to each class; the overall claims of Plaintiffs are typical of the claims of the class; and the named Plaintiffs will fairly and adequately protect the interests of the class.

IV. Causes of Action

1. The Texas Abortion Laws are unconstitutionally vague and uncertain on their face.

2. Said statutes deprive plaintiffs and their physicians of rights protected by the First, Fourth, Fifth, Ninth and Fourteenth Amendments, in that the statutes are neither narrowly drawn nor supported by any overriding and compelling state interest.

(i) They infringe upon Plaintiffs' right to safe and adequate medical advice pertaining to the decision of whether to carry a given pregnancy to term.

(ii) They infringe upon Plaintiffs' right to choose whether and when to have children.

(iii) They infringe upon Plaintiffs' right to privacy in the physician-patient relationship.

(iv) They infringe upon Plaintiffs' right to personal and marital privacy.

3. Said statutes on their face infringe upon Mary Doe's right to life and liberty in violation of the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment.

4. Said statutes on their face violate the First Amendment's prohibition against laws respecting an establishment of religion.

5. Said statutes on their face deny Plaintiffs the equal protection of the laws.

V. Relief Requested

1. Plaintiffs pray that a Three-Judge Court be convened to hear this cause.

2. Plaintiffs pray that a declaratory judgment be issued holding the Texas Abortion Laws to be unconstitutional on their face.

3. Plaintiffs further pray for a permanent injunction, restraining Defendant, his agents and successors from enforcing the challenged statutes; that costs be taxed against the Defendant; and for such further relief, at law or in equity, to which Plaintiffs may be entitled.

Plaintiff-Intervenor Hallford's Application for Leave to Intervene in Roe v. Wade, Filed March 19, 1970

UNITED STATES DISTRICT COURT

FOR THE NORTHERN DISTRICT OF TEXAS

DALLAS DIVISION

Civil Action No. CA-3-3690-B

JANE ROE,

Plaintiff,

—v.—

HENRY WADE, District Attorney of Dallas County,

Defendant.

To the Honorable Judges of Said Honorable Court:

COMES NOW James Hubert Hallford, M.D., a licensed physician under the laws of Texas since 1958, and moves for leave to intervene as plaintiff in this action, in order to assert the claim set forth in plaintiff's Hallford original complaint which is filed herein, on the ground that he fears prosecution under the Texas Abortion Laws (Articles 1191 thru 1196 of the Texas Penal Code) as he currently stands charged with violating said articles in the following causes now pending in the Criminal District Court of Dallas County, Texas to wit: the State of Texas vs. James H. Hallford No. C-69-5307-IH and the State of Texas vs.

James H. Hallford No. C-69-2524-H and he feels that the present plaintiff (and the plaintiff in Civil Action No. CA-3-3691-C) does not fairly and adequately protect the interest of himself and the class of people who are physicians, licensed to practice medicine under the laws of the State of Texas and who fear future prosecution under said statutes and the present plaintiff does not fairly and adequately protect the interest of the class of people who are his patients and the patients of other practicing physicians. James Hubert Hallford further prays for an order permitting him to adopt the complaint of plaintiff, Jane Roe, insofar as the allegations contained therein are applicable to himself, as his own with like effect, as if fully repeated.

Respectfully submitted,

JAMES HUBERT HALLFORD, M.D.

[Certificate of Service omitted in printing.]

Plaintiff-Intervenor Hallford's Original Complaint, Filed March 23, 1970

IN THE

UNITED STATES DISTRICT COURT

FOR THE NORTHERN DISTRICT OF TEXAS

DALLAS DIVISION

Civil Action No. CA-3-3690-B

[TITLE OMITTED IN PRINTING]

I. PARTIES

1. Plaintiff, James Hubert Hallford, M.D., is a citizen of the State of Texas, and a resident of Dallas County, and is engaged in the active practice of medicine in the County of Dallas.

2. Defendant, Henry Wade, is the District Attorney of Dallas County, Texas, charged with enforcement and administration of the criminal laws of the State of Texas in Dallas County.

II. JURISDICTION

1. Plaintiff invokes the jurisdiction of this Court under the First, Fourth, Fifth, Eighth, Ninth and Fourteenth Amendments to the United States Constitution; Title 28, U.S. Code, Sections 1331 and 1343; the Declaratory Judgment Act, Title 28, United States Code, Sections 2201 and 2202; the three-Judge Court Statute, Title 28, United States Code, Sections 2281 and 2284; and Title 42, Section 1983.

2. Plaintiff seeks a declaratory judgment that Articles 1191, 1192, 1193, 1194, and particularly 1196 of the Texas Penal Code (hereinafter sometimes collectively referred to as the Texas Abortion Laws) are unconstitutional on their face; and a permanent injunction against the enforcement of these statutes. The plaintiff expressly reserves the right to apply for a temporary restraining order, in the future, under Title 28, United States Code, Section 2284, if such action is necessary to prevent irreparable damage to him.

III. Statutes

1. The provisions of the Texas Penal Code, concerning the laws of abortion, being Articles 1191 through 1196 provide for and read as follows:

> Article 1191—"If any person shall designedly administer to a pregnant woman or knowingly procure to be administered with her consent any drug or medicine or shall use towards her any violence or means whatever externally or internally applied, and thereby procure an abortion, he shall be confined in the penitentiary not less than two nor more than five years; if it be done without her consent, the punishment shall be doubted. By 'abortion' is meant that the life of the fetus or embryo shall be destroyed in the woman's womb or that a premature birth thereof be caused. Acts 1907, p. 55."
> Article 1192—"Whoever furnishes the means for procuring an abortion knowing the purpose intended is guilty as an accomplice."

Article 1193—"If the means used shall fail to produce an abortion, the offender is nevertheless guilty of an attempt to produce abortion, provided it be shown that such means were calculated to produce that result, and shall be fined not less than one hundred nor more than one thousand dollars."

Article 1194—"If the death of the mother is occasioned by an abortion so produced or by an attempt to effect the same it is murder."

Article 1195—"Whoever shall during parturition of the mother destroy the vitality or life in a child in a state of being born and before actual birth, which child would otherwise have been born alive, shall be confined in the penitentiary for life or for not less than five years."

Article 1196—"Nothing in this chapter applies to an abortion procured or attempted by medical advice for the purpose of saving the life of the mother."

2. The above abortion laws do not define the meaning of "for the purpose of saving the life of the mother," nor the meaning of "an abortion procured or attempted by medical advice." Furthermore, the case law of the State of Texas as reflected in the opinions of the Texas Court of Criminal Appeals does not define the meaning of said phrases.

3. The abortion laws do not establish a formal administrative mechanism for interpreting and enforcing its provisions.

4. The abortion laws in effect create a presumption that any abortion performed by a licensed practicing medical doctor is illegal and unlawful and the physician has the burden of proving the lawfulness of the abortion if he is arrested or charged with violating the Texas Abortion Laws. In this regard, there are no provisions in the Texas Abortion Laws which require the State to rebut any medical opinion justifying an abortion and a Judge or Jury may convict a defendant under the Texas Abortion Laws simply because they do not believe the testimony of the defendant and/or any other expert opinion offered on his behalf.

5. The Texas Abortion Laws do not elaborate on their applicability or lack of same to the common situation in which a patient seeks an abortion, such as psychiatric indications, cardiac complications, kidney disease, rape, German measles, contraceptive failure, genetic complications, gastrointestinal diseases, neurologic diseases, diabetes, pulmonary disease, cancer, exposure to radiation, and socio-economic conditions such as those encountered by parents who have neither the means nor the desire to have more children, but the wife is pregnant.

IV. Facts

1. A therapeutic abortion performed under hospital or clinic conditions is a safe and simple procedure which presents less danger to the pregnant woman, particularly in the first trimester of pregnancy, than ordinary childbirth.

2. An abortion performed outside of the clinical setting by unqualified personnel is extremely dangerous to a woman, and may result in death, maiming, sterility or serious infection.

3. The threat and uncertainty of the Texas Abortion Laws are a principal deterrent to physicians and patients which delimits the number of therapeutic hospital and clinical abortions.

4. The plaintiff is not able to treat his patients according to the high standards of medical practice because of the uncertainty, potential sweep, and application of the challenge laws.

5. Pregnant women patients thereupon seek abortion outside of the hospital and clinical setting, risking their lives and health.

6. Hospitals in Dallas County treat numerous cases each year of women who have had septic, incomplete, and badly bungled abortions at the hands of unqualified, often non-medical abortionists.

7. The plaintiff in his regular practice as a physician receives, on a frequent and recurring basis, appeals from pregnant women who desire a therapeutic abortion in safe hospital or clinical surroundings.

8. Plaintiff must, in each case, decide whether and how he can advise and treat these patients in light of their overall physiological, psychological, and other personal needs.

9. Plaintiff's prospective patients come within a wide variety of conditions, which have included in the past and will include in the future the following:

(a) Serious danger of death to the woman unless an abortion is performed within a short period of time;

(b) Serious danger of suicide;

(c) Possible danger of suicide;

(d) Uncertain danger of suicide;

(e) Pregnancy caused by rape or incest;

(f) Patient ill with cancer;

(g) Patient had been infected with German measles in early pregnancy and would not like to risk the danger that continued pregnancy would lead to a serious malformed and sick infant;

(h) Patient would prefer to postpone pregnancy to a later date for a wide variety of reasons, including contraceptive failure, extreme youth, and others;

(i) Uncertain danger of death to the woman unless an abortion is performed within a short period of time;

(j) Possible danger of death to the woman unless an abortion is performed within a short period of time.

10. Plaintiff is not able to ascertain in a vast majority of cases whether the challenge laws prohibit advice and medical treatment, because the statutes do not in any way correlate with the regular and recurring medical indications present in his patients.

11. Plaintiff is deterred, hindered, chilled, and hampered in advising and treating his patients as a direct consequence of the statutes involved.

12. There is no medical committee, administrative agency or any other group that the plaintiff can apply to for an approval to perform a therapeutic abortion so that he can be sure that his patient comes within the medical exceptions to the Texas Abortion Law or whether or not he has complied with Article 1196 in performing an abortion.

13. If the plaintiff was not subject to the threat of the vague and sweeping statutes challenged here, the medical practice of the plaintiff and other similar situated would be better able to serve the health needs of large numbers of women who are also affected by the statutes.

14. The plaintiff in the past has been arrested for violating the Texas Abortion Laws and at the present time stands charged by indictment with violating said laws in the Criminal District Court of Dallas County, Texas to-wit: (1) The State of Texas vs. James H. Hallford, No. C-69-5307-IH, and (2) The State of Texas vs. James H. Hallford, No. C-69-2524-H. In both cases the defendant is charged with abortion and the indictment does not allege that the defendant does not come under the protection of Article 1196 of the Texas Penal Code nor does the indictment set out any facts which would negate the exceptions provided by Article 1196 of the Texas Penal Code and under the laws of the State of Texas the defendant has the burden of proving that he comes under the vague, ambiguous and indefinite provisions of Article 1196 of the Texas Penal Code, and furthermore, under the laws of the State of Texas even if the defendant offers testimony from himself and other physicians that the alleged abortion comes under the exception set out by Article 1196, the Judge and/or Jury may simply disbelieve such testimony without any expert medical opinion being offered to the contrary and convict the defendant.

V. Causes of Action

1. The Texas Abortion Laws and in particular Article 1196 are unconstitutionally vague and uncertain on their face, and in violation of the specificity requirements of the Fourteenth Amendment to the United States Constitution.

2. Said laws, on their face and as applied, deprive plaintiff and his patients of the right to privacy in the physician-patient relationship, as protected by the First, Fourth, Fifth, Ninth, and Fourteenth Amendments to the United States Constitution.

3. Said laws, on their face and as applied, deprive plaintiff of the right to practice medicine according to the highest standards of medical practice, as guaranteed by the First, Fourth, Fifth, Ninth, and Fourteenth Amendments to the United States Constitution.

4. Said laws, on their face and as applied, deprive plaintiff's patients of "the fundamental right of a woman to choose whether to bear children . . . " People v. Belous, 458 P.2d 194, 199, 80 Cal. Rptr. 354, 359 (1969), as protected by the Fourth, Fifth, Eighth, Ninth and Fourteenth Amendments to the United States Constitution.

5. Said laws, on their face and as applied, infringe upon plaintiff's patients' right to safe and adequate medical advice and treatment pertaining to the decision of whether to carry a given pregnancy to term, in violation of the First, Fourth, Fifth, Eighth, Ninth, and Fourteenth Amendments to the United States Constitution.

6. Said laws, on their face and as applied, infringe upon the stated constitutional rights of plaintiff and his patients, because said rights are protected and fundamental, and no compelling or overriding justification can be offered for the potentially drastic sweep of the laws.

7. Said laws, on their face, and as applied, deprive plaintiff and his patients of the equal protection of the laws, by treating similarly situated classes differently with no compelling justification for classification.

8. Said laws, on their face and as applied, violate the First Amendment free speech guarantee in their broad and indiscriminate sweep which deters and chills discussion and advice pertaining to abortion.

9. Said laws, on their face and as applied, violate the First Amendment prohibition against laws respecting an establishment of religion, in that the challenged statutes have no independent and compelling secular justification.

10. Said laws violate the Eighth Amendment in that they operate to impose a cruel and unusual punishment upon women by forcing them to bear each child they conceive, regardless of other surrounding circumstances short of immediate and obvious death if an abortion is not performed.

11. The enforcement of the said laws places the physician and this plaintiff in a position of decision-making beset with such inherent possibility of bias and conflict of interest as to deprive the plaintiff and his patients of due process of law as guaranteed by the Fourteenth Amendment to the United States Constitution.

12. The abortion laws and in particular Article 1196 are unconstitutional in that they provide no exceptions or justifications for abortions performed by a licensed physician wherein the plaintiff's patients are suffering from any one of the following:

(a) Pregnancy caused by rape or incest;

(b) Pregnancy complicated by various physiological and psychological conditions;

(c) Patients infected with German measles in early pregnancy and would not like to risk the prospect of serious and permanent fetal deformatives;

(d) Patients being the victims of contraceptive failure and for other medical reasons than have been set out above, highly likely or in all probability likely to bear serious and permanent fetal deformatives;

(e) Patients who for psychological or physiological reasons are in some danger of death if an abortion is not performed but where the risk or immediacy of such is not so great that it can medically or legally be said that the abortion is "for the purpose of saving the life of the mother;"

13. The Texas Abortion Laws create a legal and factual presumption that any abortion performed by a licensed physician is unlawful and place upon the defendant physician the burden of showing privilege or a lawful abortion was performed and the presumption of guilt created by the Texas Abortion Laws is in violation of the laws and the Constitution of the United States of America.

14. The language in Article 1196 reciting that "nothing in this chapter applies to an abortion procured or attempted by medical advice for the purpose of saving the life of the mother" is unconstitutionally vague and uncertain on its face and forbids the doing of an act in terms so vague that the plaintiff physician and others similarly situated must necessarily guess at its meaning and differ as to its application.

VI. Relief Requested

1. Plaintiff prays that a three-Judge Court be convened to hear this cause.

2. Plaintiff prays that a declaratory judgment be issued holding the Texas Abortion Laws to be unconstitutional on their face.

3. Plaintiff prays for a permanent injunction, restraining defendant, his agents, and successors, from enforcing the challenged statutes.

4. Plaintiff reserves the right to make application for and pray for an interlocutory injunction granting a temporary restraining order to prevent irreparable damage, i.e., the actual trial of the felony cases now pending against this plaintiff in the Criminal District Court of Dallas County, Texas, because such a trial would cause irreparable damage to the plaintiff.

5. The plaintiff further prays that costs be taxed against the defendant; and for such further relief, at law or in equity to which plaintiff may be entitled.

Order of District Court Granting Application for Leave to Intervene, Filed March 23, 1970

IN THE

UNITED STATES DISTRICT COURT

FOR THE NORTHERN DISTRICT OF TEXAS

DALLAS DIVISION

CA-3-3690-B

[TITLE OMITTED IN PRINTING]

On the 20 day of March, 1970, came on to be heard in the above cause, the Application for Intervention filed by James Hubert Hallford, M.D., who fears future prosecution under the Texas Abortion Statutes (Articles 1191 thru 1196 of the Texas Penal Code) and,

IT IS, THEREFORE, ORDERED that said Applicant be allowed to intervene as plaintiff in this action.

Signed this the 20 day of March, 1970.

SARAH T. HUGHES
United States District Judge

Defendant Wade's Original Answer in Roe v. Wade, Filed March 23, 1970

IN THE

UNITED STATES DISTRICT COURT

FOR THE NORTHERN DISTRICT OF TEXAS

DALLAS DIVISION

Civil Action No. CA-3-3690-B

[TITLE OMITTED IN PRINTING]

To the Honorable Judge of Said Court:

Defendant is without knowledge or information sufficient to form a belief as to the truth of the following averments in Plaintiff's Original Complaint:

a.) That plaintiff is an unmarried pregnant woman;

b.) That plaintiff wishes to terminate her pregnancy, if any;

c.) That plaintiff is under any economic hardship or social stigma;

d.) That plaintiff's life is not threatened by continuation of her pregnancy, if any;

e.) That plaintiff cannot secure a legal abortion in Dallas County, Texas;

f.) That plaintiff cannot afford to travel to another jurisdiction to secure an abortion;

g.) That an abortion under clinical conditions is safer than ordinary childbirth.

Defendant denies that this is a proper case to be heard by a Three-Judge Court because plaintiff is without standing to maintain it, in that the statutes complained of operate only against persons who perform an abortion, not against pregnant women upon whom abortions are performed.

4.

Defendant denies that there is no state forum in which plaintiff's federal constitutional rights can be determined.

5.

Defendant denies that the statutes complained of are unconstitutionally vague and uncertain on their face.

6.

Defendant denies that the said statutes are unconstitutionally broad on their face for any of the reasons alleged in Plaintiff's Original Complaint.

7.

Defendant denies that the said statutes infringe upon plaintiff's right to life.

8.

Defendant denies that the said statutes violate the constitutional prohibition against laws respecting establishment of religion.

9.

Defendant denies that the said statutes deny plaintiff the equal protection of the law.

10.

Defendant affirmatively says that if plaintiff is in fact an unmarried pregnant woman she has assumed the risk attendant upon such condition.

WHEREFORE, defendant prays that all relief requested by plaintiff be denied, that this cause be dismissed for plaintiff's lack of standing to maintain it, and that defendant recover from plaintiff his costs in this behalf expended.

Defendant Wade's Answer to Plaintiff-Intervenor Hallford's Original Complaint, Filed March 26, 1970

IN THE

UNITED STATES DISTRICT COURT

FOR THE NORTHERN DISTRICT OF TEXAS

DALLAS DIVISION

Civil Action No. CA-3-3690-B

JANE ROE,

Plaintiff,

v.

HENRY WADE, District Attorney of Dallas County,

Defendant.

To the Honorable Judge of Said Court:

Defendant is without knowledge or information sufficient to form a belief as to the truth of the following averments in Intervenor's Original Complaint:

a) That intervenor is a citizen of the State of Texas, or a resident of Dallas County, Texas;

b) That intervenor is licensed to practice medicine in the State of Texas, or that intervenor is engaged in the practice of medicine in Dallas County, Texas;

c) That a therapeutic abortion performed under clinical conditions presents less danger to the pregnant woman than ordinary childbirth;

d) That intervenor is not able to treat his patients, if any, according to the high standards of medical practice because of the Texas Abortion Laws;

e) That pregnant women thereupon seek abortions outside the hospital or clinical setting, risking their lives and health;

f) That hospitals in Dallas County treat women each year who have had septic or incomplete abortions at the hands of unqualified abortionists;

g) That intervenor, if he is a physician, in his regular practice, if any, receives frequent appeals from pregnant women who want an abortion;

h) That intervenor must decide whether and how he can treat these patients, if any;

i) That intervenor's patients, if any, come within the variety of conditions set out in paragraph 9, subparagraphs (a) through (j) on page 5 of Intervenor's Original Complaint;

j) That intervenor is not able to ascertain whether the challenged laws prohibit advice and medical treatment in a vast majority of cases, if any;

k) That intervenor is deterred, hindered, chilled, and hampered in advising and treating his patients, if any, as a direct consequence of the statutes involved;

l) That there is no medical committee or other group to which intervenor can turn for advice;

m) That intervenor would be better able to serve the health needs of large numbers of women but for the statutes of which he complains;

n) That intervenor is one and the same JAMES H. HALLFORD indicted in cause numbers C-69-2524-H and C-69-5307-IH in the Criminal District Court of Dallas County, Texas;

o) That intervenor fears future prosecution under the Texas Abortion Laws.

Defendant denies that the statutes complained of are unconstitutionally vague and uncertain on their face, and in violation of the requirements of the Fourteenth Amendment.

Defendant denies that the statutes complained of deprive intervenor and his patients, if any, of the right to privacy in the physician-patient relationship, without admitting the existence of any physician-patient privilege.

5.

Defendant denies that the said statutes deprive intervenor of the right to practice medicine according to the highest standards of medical practice, and denies that such right is protected or guaranteed by the United States Constitution.

Defendant denies that the said statutes deprive any pregnant woman of the "fundamental right to choose whether to bear children", and without admitting the existence of such right, defendant says that intervenor has no standing to assert it.

7.

Defendant denies that the statutes complained of deprive pregnant women of any of their constitutional rights, and says that intervenor has no standing to assert any of such rights.

8.

Defendant denies that the said statutes violate the First Amendment right of free speech or the prohibition against laws respecting the establishment of a religion.

9.

Defendant denies that the said statutes violate the Eighth Amendment prohibition against cruel and unusual punishment.

10.

Defendant denies that the said statutes deprive intervenor of the equal protection of the law.

11.

Defendant denies that the said statutes are unconstitutional for any of the reasons set forth in paragraphs 1 through 14, inclusive, on pages 7, 8, 9 and 10 of Intervenor's Original Complaint.

12.

Defendant denies that the said statutes are so threatening or uncertain as to constitute a principal deterrent to physicians and patients which delimits the number of therapeutic hospital and clinical abortions.

13.

Defendant denies that the said statutes create a presumption of guilt on the part of any person charged thereunder.

Defendant says that if intervenor is in fact one and the same JAMES H. HALLFORD indicted in cause numbers C-69-2524-H and C-69-5307-IH in the Criminal District Court of Dallas County, Texas, his prayer for relief as to those criminal cases cannot be granted by this Court because of the provisions of 28 USC Sec. 2283.

WHEREFORE, defendant prays that intervenor be required to show by legal and competent evidence the truth of the matters of fact alleged in his Original Complaint, if he can, that all relief prayed for in said Original Complaint be denied, that this cause be dismissed because of intervenor's lack of standing to maintain it, and that defendant recover from intervenor his costs in this behalf expended.

Motion of the State of Texas to Dismiss All Complaints, or in the Alternative for Judgment on the Pleadings, Filed April 30, 1970

UNITED STATES DISTRICT COURT

FOR THE NORTHERN DISTRICT OF TEXAS

DALLAS DIVISION

Civil Action Nos. 3-3690-B and 3-3691-C

JANE ROE, et al.,

Plaintiffs,

vs.

HENRY WADE, District Attorney of Dallas County,

Defendant.

To the Honorable Court:

COMES NOW the State of Texas, represented herein by Crawford C. Martin, the Attorney General of Texas, after leave of the Court having been first sought and obtained to respond to the Plaintiffs' and Intervenor's Complaints in the above-entitled actions, and by way of response makes its Motion to Dismiss said Complaint and for Judgment on the Pleadings pursuant to Rule 12, F.R.C.P., and would show unto the Court as follows:

I.

Plaintiffs and Intervenor have failed to state a claim upon which relief may be granted by this Court for the following reasons:

A. They have failed to show that they and members of the class they purport to represent have standing to bring these actions.

B. They have failed to raise a substantial Constitutional question.

C. They have failed to show irreparable injury and the absence of an adequate remedy at law.

D. Intervenor, James Hubert Hallford's, Complaint is barred by 28 U.S.C. 2283.

II.

In the alternative, if the Court should conclude that it can properly consider the constitutionality of the Texas statutes under attack by Plaintiffs and Intervenor, the State of Texas would make this Motion for Judgment on the pleadings pursuant to Rule 12(c), F.R.C.P. In support thereof, the State of Texas would respectfully show that Articles 1191, 1192, 1193, 1194, and 1196 of the Texas Penal Code are constitutional on their face.

III.

The State of Texas requests this Court, under the provisions of Rule 12(c), F.R.C.P., to consider its Motion for Judgment on the pleadings of Plaintiffs and Intervenor as a motion for summary judgment as provided in Rule 56, F.R.C.P.

IN THE

UNITED STATES DISTRICT COURT

FOR THE NORTHERN DISTRICT OF TEXAS

DALLAS DIVISION

Civil Action Nos. CA-3-3690 and CA-3-3691

[TITLE OMITTED IN PRINTING]

STATE OF TEXAS,
COUNTY OF TRAVIS.

BEFORE ME, the undersigned authority, on this day personally appeared PAUL CAREY TRICKETT, MD., to me well known, who, after being by me first duly sworn, did depose and say as follows:

My name is Paul Carey Trickett. I was born Oct. 13, 1922, in Brunswick, Ohio. I graduated from high school in Waterloo, New York, and attended college at DePauw University in Greencastle, Indiana and at Yale University in New Haven, Connecticut. I graduated from college in the class of 1944. I attended medical school at Long Island College of Medicine (now State University of New York Downstate) in Brooklyn, New York, and graduated in 1948. I served an internship at Stamford General Hospital, Stamford, Connecticut. I have done an Obstetrics and Gynecology Residency and had Fellowships at St. Agnes Hospital in New York, Stamford General Hospital, Westover Air Force Base Hospital in Massachusetts, and Massachusetts General Hospital in Boston. I was in private obstetrics and gynecology practice in Lewes, Delaware from 1954-1959 and served as Clinical Director of Health Programs at Wayne State University in Detroit from 1959-1961. From 1961-1968 I was Director of the University Health Program at Tulane and taught as a member of the Obstetrics and Gynecology Department at Tulane Medical School, New Orleans. Since September 1, 1968 I have been Director of the Student Health Service, The University of Texas at Austin (Box 7339, University Station, Austin, Texas 78712). In addition to my administrative duties, I am also in charge of our gynecology clinic and see patients regularly.

Based upon my experience as a practicing physician, especially my practice in the field of obstetrics and gynecology, and on my previous medical studies and my continuing studies since graduation from medical school, it is my opinion that an abortion involves only minimal danger to the patient if it is performed early in the pregnancy (preferably during the first 6-10 weeks of pregnancy), if the woman has had an adequate medical examination, and if the procedure is done by a competent physician in a good medical setting. Certainly an abortion is no more dangerous than a diagnostic dilitation and curretage, a common, routine medical procedure, done under the same conditions for other reasons.

Many women who are Texas residents have told me that they wanted an abortion after learning that they were pregnant; those wanting to terminate unwanted pregnancies have included unmarried and married women. Tragically some of them have gone to great extremes to get the abortion done.

In my opinion, it would be conservative to estimate that we diagnose at least one pregnancy a day at the University of Texas Student Health Center; a majority of those women diagnosed to be pregnant desire an abortion.

I have seen numerous young ladies who have come in following an illegal abortion. From the things they have told me and from my findings upon medical examination, it is my opinion that a large number are getting very poor procedures, which cannot only threaten immediate life but can also lead to psychological and medical problems in later life. It is my opinion that obtaining an abortion under the present non-legal situation is extremely dangerous, and that doing so becomes increasingly dangerous when an unskilled individual performs the abortion. The possible results of a "bad abortion" include death, infection (which may lead to sterility or future ectopic pregnancies), and other medical conditions. It has been my experience that many psychological problems result from the brutality that the girl may experience, and that many girls go through psychological difficulties resulting from their knowledge that they are participating in illegal conduct when their general attitude is one of respect for the law.

Numerous reasons have been stated to me as the basis on which a particular patient desires an abortion. These include lack of marriage (certainly being pregnant is much more pressing to an unmarried girl with no desire to marry or no reasonable chance of marriage than it may be to a married woman), desire to avoid interruption of schooling, and frequency of pregnancy (especially as to married women). Many pregnant women who are students feel that they might be able to finish a current semester but would have to drop out to have the baby and during the post-partum period and that they would be severely hindered by such in their academic pursuits. It has also been my experience that the rate of academic attrition is very high among those who do carry the pregnancy to term. Another reason women seek abortions is economic; many single women and many couples (especially where they are both in school or where the wife is working to put the husband through school) feel that they cannot afford to have a child.

It is my opinion that inability to find good methods of contraception is another cause of unwanted pregnancies. It has been my recent experience, especially since the last hearings in Washington, that both married and unmarried women who have been on the pill desire to use other methods of contraception, and that more women now hesitate to start taking the pill. This increases the problems in regard to contraception since other methods of contraception are 60-80 per cent effective for the most part and this leaves a 20-40 per cent risk of pregnancy, which is unsatisfactory for most women. The diaphragm is often used by women who wish to avoid or discontinue use of the pill, but a substantial human error factor is involved in use of the diaphragm; a diaphragm must be placed properly to be effective, and that requires a certain level of intelligence and care. The IUD (inter-uterine device) is generally unsatisfactory in women who have not had a prior pregnancy carried to term and there is a high rejection rate; also, some doctors are fearful of the IUD since we don't know what the chronic irritation of the uterus might lead to.

I refuse to do abortions, and the physicians I know refuse to do them, because I wouldn't willfully, knowingly break the law or jeopardize my standing in the medical society or in the community.

However, I do know many physicians who have told me that there are circumstances other than where necessary to preserve the life of the mother when they consider an abortion to be indicated. I know several physicians who would perform abortions if the procedure were legal and if it could be done under good medical circumstances for such reasons as valid medical reasons as to why the pregnancy shouldn't be allowed to continue (as conditions where pregnancy is detrimental to the health of the mother and conditions where the fetus is suspect as to being defective or deformed), valid psychological reasons as to why the pregnancy shouldn't be allowed to continue, economic reasons, rape and incest. I personally would perform abortions under limited circumstances if the procedure were legal and if I had access to the proper medical facilities.

PAUL C. TRICKETT, M.D.

FOR THE NORTHERN DISTRICT OF TEXAS

DALLAS DIVISION

Civil Action Nos. CA-3-3690 and CA-3-3691

[TITLE OMITTED IN PRINTING]

STATE OF TEXAS,
COUNTY OF DALLAS, ss.:

BEFORE ME, the undersigned authority, on this day personally appeared , to me well known, who after being by me first duly sworn, did depose and say as follows:

(1) My name is , I am over the age of twenty-one and am fully competent to testify. I presently reside at in Dallas, Texas.

(2) On March 3, 1970 I filed a lawsuit in the United States District Court for the Northern District of Texas, Dallas Division, which cause is presently pending under cause No. CA-3-3690. I filed this suit under the fictitious name of Jane Roe for the following reasons:

(a) I am not married at the present time and have not been at any time in the past six years.

(b) Because of my pregnancy I have experienced extreme difficulty in securing employment of any kind. I feared the notoriety occasioned by the lawsuit would make it impossible for me to secure any employment in the near future and would severely limit my advancement in any employment which I might secure at some later date.

(c) I consider the decision of whether to bear a child a highly personal one and feel that the notoriety occasioned by the lawsuit would result in a gross invasion of my personal privacy.

(3) I was pregnant on March 3, 1970 and am still pregnant at this time. I am and have been otherwise in good health.

(4) At the time I filed the lawsuit I wanted to terminate my pregnancy by means of an abortion performed by a competent, licensed, physician under safe, clinical conditions. I wanted to terminate my pregnancy because of the economic hardship which pregnancy entailed and because of the social stigma attached to the bearing of illegitimate children in our society.

(5) I consider myself to be a law-abiding citizen and have never wanted to participate in an act deemed by the State of Texas to be a felony offense.

(6) It is my understanding that I cannot secure a legal abortion in Dallas County, Texas or any place else in Texas because there has never been any medical indications that my life was endangered by the continuation of my pregnancy.

(7) I have a tenth grade education and have never received any formal training which would prepare me for a well-paying job. Since my pregnancy I have experienced difficulty in securing any kind of employment. Each month I am barely able to make ends meet. Consequently I cannot afford to travel to another jurisdiction in order to secure a legal abortion.

(8) I understand that there are competent licensed physicians in Dallas County who do perform, apparently illegal abortions, but I have never been able to afford their services.

(9) I fear that my very life would be endangered if I submitted to an abortion which I could afford.

(10) I believe that the enforcement of the Texas Abortion Laws against licensed physicians has forced me into the dilemma of electing whether to bear an unwanted child or to risk my life by submitting to an abortion at the hands of unqualified personnel outside of clinical settings.

UNITED STATES DISTRICT COURT

DALLAS DIVISION

Civil Action No. CA-3-3690-B

JANE ROE,

Plaintiff,

vs.

HENRY WADE, District Attorney of Dallas County,

Defendant.

STATE OF TEXAS) COUNTY OF DALLAS)

BEFORE ME, the undersigned authority, on this day personally appeared JAMES HUBERT HALLFORD, M.D., to me well known, who, after being by me first duly sworn, did depose and say as follows:

My name is James Hubert Hallford. I was born in 1927 in Wichita Falls, Texas. I graduated from high school in Enid, Oklahoma, and went to Oklahoma Baptist University where I graduated in 1949. I later attended Southern Methodist University in Dallas, Texas, and I attended medical school at University of Texas Southwestern Medical School in Dallas, Texas. I graduated from medical school in 1958 and served an internship at University of Oklahoma Hospital in Oklahoma City, Oklahoma. I am now and I have been licensed to practice medicine in Texas since 1958 and have been engaged in the practice of medicine in Dallas County since 1960.

I have been arrested several times for the felony offense of abortion and I now stand charged by indictment for the offense of abortion under the laws of the State of Texas in what I am informed by my attorneys are Cause Numbers C-69-5307-IH, styled State of Texas v. James Hubert Hallford, and Number C-69-2524-H, styled State of Texas v. James Hubert Hallford. I have appeared in Judge Chamberlain's Court in the Dallas County Courthouse in regard to these charges and I have been informed that my case is now currently set for trial for Monday, April 20, 1970.

Before I was arrested or indicted in regard to any of the different arrests for abortion, I was never contacted by any police officer, Assistant District Attorney, or any other representative of the State of Texas and questioned or told that I might be arrested for the offense of abortion. Furthermore, no one ever asked me if I ever performed an abortion to "save the life of the mother or woman involved," before I was arrested. In fact, so far as I know, at no time has any representative of the State of Texas or any police officer ever inquired concerning whether or not any alleged abortion was performed legally or whether or not I wish to submit any written report or report of any other physician that any alleged abortion was lawfully performed to "save the life of the mother".

Based upon my experience as a practicing physician in the general practice of medicine and on my previous medical studies and continuing studies since graduation from medical school, it is my opinion and there is little if any disagreement among other physicians that a therapeutic abortion performed under hospital or clinical conditions by a licensed physician is a safe and simple procedure which presents less danger to the life of the pregnant woman, particularly in the first trimester of pregnancy, than ordinary childbirth. Furthermore, in my opinion, a substantial percentage of physicians would agree that even in the second trimester of pregnancy, if there are no unusual complications, a therapeutic abortion performed under hospital or clinical conditions is as safe or safer than ordinary childbirth.

An abortion performed outside of clinical settings by an unqualified person is extremely dangerous to a woman, and may result in death, maiming, sterility, serious infection and emotional disorders.

In my opinion (and all or nearly all licensed physicians would agree) pregnant women seeking abortion outside the hospital and clinical setting risk their lives and health and hospitals in Dallas County treat numerous cases each year of women who have had septic, incomplete, and badly bungled abortions at the hands of themselves or of unqualified or non-medical abortionists. I would estimate that Parkland Hospital in Dallas County, Texas receives on the average at least three or four women a night with incomplete abortion medical problems usually secondary to treatment by non-medical personnel. When I was in medical school at Parkland Hospital in 1958, I know of my own personal knowledge that there was an average of approximately four or five such emergency patients a night and it is my understanding based on conversations with other physicians that the number has increased significantly since that time or date.

In my practice as a physician I receive on a frequent and recurring basis appeals from pregnant women who desire a therapeutic abortion in safe hospital or clinical surroundings. Consequently, I must in each case decide whether or not and how I can advise and treat these patients in light of their overall physiological, psychological and other personal needs. My patients and/or prospective patients come within a wide variety of conditions which have included in the past and in all probability will include in the future the following:

A. Those who are in serious danger of immediate death unless an abortion is performed within a short period of time.

B. Serious danger of suicide.

C. Possible danger of suicide.

D. Uncertain or slight danger of suicide.

E. Pregnancy reportedly caused either by rape or incest.

F. Patients ill with cancer.

G. Patients who have been infected with German measles in early pregnancy and/or other infections which cause fatal deformity and consequential damage to the emotional health of the mother and who would not like to risk the danger that continued pregnancy would lead to a serious malformed and sick infant and/or the dangers involved in an emotional disorder.

H. Patients who would prefer to postpone pregnancy to a later date for a wide variety of reasons, including contraceptive failure, extreme youth, emotional problems and problems connected with pending divorces, other family problems and those with other financial and marital stress type problems.

I. Patients with a possible danger of death to the woman unless an abortion is performed and/or will have serious complications at the time of delivery unless an abortion is performed.

J. Uncertain or slight danger of death to the woman unless an abortion is performed.

I am not able to ascertain (as a doctor or from other sources) in a vast majority of my cases whether or not the Texas Abortion laws prohibit advice and/or medical treatment and/or an abortion because the Texas Laws and the language of the Texas Laws do not in any way correlate with the regular and recurring medical indications present in my patients.

There is no medical committee, group of physicians, administrative agency or any other medical or legal group that I can apply to for approval to perform a therapeutic abortion so that I can decide whether or not my patient comes within the medical exception to the Texas Abortion Law. Furthermore, it has been my experience as a practicing physician that even in hospital settings where there is an obvious significant danger of loss of life to the mother if an abortion is not performed, it is impossible or extremely difficult to get a hospital committee to commit themselves as to the legality of an abortion and furthermore it is extremely difficult to get another physician to render an opinion whether or not an abortion is necessary to save the mother's life. It has been my experience that while other physicians are willing to informally talk about the abortion laws and under what circumstances an abortion is legal and/or medically should be performed, it is extremely difficult to get another practicing physician to commit himself in writing as to whether or not an abortion is necessary to "save the mother's life". In my opinion, under such circumstances, physicians are generally concerned about criminal prosecution and more important they are concerned about censure by their colleagues and/or disciplined by the State Board of Medical Examiners.

The different hospitals in Dallas County, Texas that allow abortions within the hospital setting at all, generally have an "abortion committee" composed of physicians which must grant approval before an abortion can be performed within the hospital. At some of the hospitals, abortions are not allowed to be performed at all. Unless the pregnant woman is removed to a different setting where an abortion can be performed, regardless of her condition and whether or not she is obviously going to die if an abortion is not performed, the mother is simply allowed to die.

From my own personal experience I recall having a patient in one hospital within Dallas County that does allow abortions upon approval of the Abortion Committee and my patient was suffering from pernicious vomiting as a result of pregnancy and after the patient who originally weighed 110 pounds lost 30 pounds, I informed the patient as well as the family that she was going to die if an abortion was not performed. I applied for approval from the Abortion Committee and requested a specialist, being a gynecologist, to perform the abortion. After I requested the approval several times and a number of days had gone by and the patient's condition was steadily deteriorating, I informed the committee that we could wait no longer than 48 hours on an opinion. The Abortion Committee still refused to render an opinion one way or the other and the family removed the patient from the hospital setting to secure an abortion elsewhere.

In my opinion as a practicing physician, it is extremely difficult in Dallas County to obtain a therapeutic abortion in a hospital setting because the physicians involved are in fear of criminal prosecution under the Texas Abortion Laws and consequential reprimands or disciplinary action by the Texas and County Medical Associations. If it were not for the Texas Abortion Laws I and other physicians would better be able to serve the serious health needs of large numbers of women who are directly affected by the Texas laws.

Although I am not an attorney and do not have any special knowledge of the criminal law, I, as well as other physicians, are generally aware that there are laws concerning accomplices and accessories and I have heard such legal terms as have other doctors, like "accessories before the fact" and "accessories after the fact" and such phrases as "aiding and abetting" and have heard of laws concerning acting together to perform a criminal act. Because of the Texas Abortion Laws and other such laws concerning criminal conduct, myself and other physicians are deterred, hindered, chilled, hampered and otherwise thwarted in advising and treating patients as a direct consequence of the Texas Abortion Laws. In this regard I have received numerous patients who have told me that they had tried to discuss abortion with other physicians but without success and I know that many of the doctors here in Dallas County absolutely refuse to even discuss the question of abortion with their patients. It is my opinion, as a physician, that a significant number of physicians in Dallas County are quite frankly simply afraid to even discuss the subject matter with their patients because of the Texas Abortion Laws.

It is my opinion, as a practicing physician, that I and other doctors are not able to treat patients according to the highest standards of medical practice because of the uncertainty and broad potential sweep and application of the Texas Abortion Laws. Furthermore, a substantial number of physicians or experts in the field of gynecology and obstetrics also agree that the abortion laws in Texas (or similar abortion laws) should either be liberalized or abolished. A study or a poll conducted by the Texas Medical Association reported that approximately 90 percent of the physicians polled were in favor of abolishing or liberalizing the Texas Abortion Laws in different degrees.

It is my understanding, as a physician, and in my opinion other physicians understand that the Texas Abortion Laws prohibit an abortion unless the same is "performed on the basis of medical advice for the purpose of saving the life of the mother". I do not know of any publications by the Texas or Dallas County Medical Associations defining such language, if it is possible to medically define such language. To my knowledge (and I have been so informed by attorneys) there is no legal definition of such terminology within the case laws of the State of Texas. To my knowledge there are not any medical publications nor any legal publications that have defined "medical advice" as used in the abortion laws. I do not know whether or not this includes the medical advice of chiropractors, registered nurses, medical technicians, osteopaths, other M.D.'s or the opinions of any group that holds themselves out to practice medicine. I do not know whether or not the term medical advice includes the body of knowledge or medical opinion of those licensed to practice medicine outside of the State of Texas or licensed to practice medicine in some other country other than the United States of America. I do not know whether or not under the Texas law I can rely on the opinion or advice of another practicing M.D. or even the advice of a specialist. Furthermore, I do not know of any publications medical or legal which state whether or not an abortion in Texas is legal if it is performed in good faith by a physician to "save the mother's life" or whether or not to defend myself in an abortion offense case, I would have to present objective medical evidence so that some, most, or all doctors of medicine would agree that the abortion in question was "for the purpose of saving the life of the mother".

I do not know of any medical or legal publications which have defined the term "life" particularly as used in abortion statutes. I do not know whether or not it simply means a continuation of neurological, respiratory and cardiac functions. Also, I do not know whether or not the term includes psychological or emotional stability. Furthermore, the term "life" is also susceptible to widely differing interpretation among doctors in that it is not clear whether or not it means immediate survival, probable survival for a period of days, weeks, months, years or whether or not "life" is equivalent to longevity. It is not clear whether or not a patient's "life" encompasses physical and mental "health" or her overall well being.

I do not know of any medical or legal publications which have defined the term "saving" as used in the Texas Abortion Laws. Physicians do not know whether or not the term simply means to keep alive and if so, for how long it means to keep alive. I and other physicians do not know whether or not the term means to keep free from harm or injury or whether or not the term means to keep free from serious harm or serious injury and if it does mean serious injury, I do not know how serious the injury must be before the abortion would be legal for the purpose of "saving" the mother's life. Furthermore, in my opinion as a physician, it is difficult to define the term "saving" in the sense that it is not unusual for licensed, competent physicians to disagree as to the diagnosis and prognosis in particular patients including pregnant women.

Also, it is my opinion as a practicing physician that if the Texas Abortion Laws mean that an abortion must be performed in good faith and also be based upon a reasonable medical basis concerning the danger of death for the mother, it would be extremely difficult to define "reasonable" or "reasonable belief" since I do not know whether or not it means a belief shared by all, most, or more than half of the practicing physicians in Dallas County.

Based upon my past experience and training, it is also my opinion as a practicing physician that the other physicians and/or M.D.'s in Dallas County do not and could not agree upon the legal and/or medical meaning of the phrase "for the purpose of saving the life of the mother". From my personal experience I know that there are good honest differences of opinions among physicians as to the meaning of the Texas Abortion Laws. Furthermore, I know of my own personal knowledge that hospital abortion committees vary in their interpretations, decisions and opinions concerning the meaning of the phrase.

It is my opinion as a practicing physician that the Texas Abortion Laws as a matter of fact create a conflict of interest between physicians and their patients. Based on my own personal experience it is my belief that a significant number of physicians are extremely concerned about their liability under criminal abortion laws and resulting professional standing to the detriment of their patients, in making decisions concerning whether or not an abortion should be performed and/or even advising the patient concerning abortion.

It has been my experience, as a practicing physician, that the pregnant women who come to me and raise the subject of an abortion have already made up their minds that they desire and are in fact going to obtain an abortion and they are primarily only concerned whether or not they can legally obtain an abortion and/or whether or not they can obtain full and adequate medical care.

From my experience and observations as a practicing physician, I know that patients who are wealthy or can afford to travel outside the State of Texas, can obtain an abortion under safe clinical conditions. However, the less fortunate or lower economic class of patients, as a general rule cannot obtain a legal abortion and consequently either must bear the child or seek an abortion outside of safe clinical settings. It was my experience while I was at Parkland Hospital that most of the emergency incomplete abortion patients were from a lower social economic class. To my knowledge there is no social agency or any group of physicians or hospitals in Dallas County which make any special effort to serve the needs of indigent pregnant women concerning abortions and/or to help counsel with or otherwise advise such class of people. Other than the possible exception of a private agency in Houston, I do not know of any such organization within the State of Texas or any other group that an indigent pregnant woman can turn to for advice, help and medical treatment concerning an abortion.

Attached to this affidavit are true and correct copies of the indictments pending against me at the present time in the Criminal District Court of Dallas County, Texas. Because I have been arrested several different times on different occasions for the felony offense of abortion and have been indicted and at the present time stand charged by indictment with the offense of abortion, I presently fear prosecution under the Texas Abortion Law and am in fear of future arrest for violating the Texas Abortion Laws for the reason that it is my understanding that in all of the cases previously filed against me and now pending against me, the State is alleging that I performed an abortion upon a woman who was at the time of the abortion a patient of mine.

It is my medical opinion, as a physician, that the Texas Abortion Laws prohibit me from practicing medicine according to the highest of medical standards and it is my medical opinion that the decision as to whether or not a woman should have an abortion, particularly in the first trimester of pregnancy, should strictly be a matter to be decided by the patient and her physician.

PROCEEDINGS

Dallas, Texas
July 22, 1970

Judge Goldberg: Good afternoon. We have for hearing this afternoon the consolidated cases of ROE, et al versus WADE, 3690 and DOE, et al versus WADE, 3691. Have all the appearances been given to the court reporter?

Mr. Tolle: Yes, Your Honor.

Judge Goldberg: Is everyone ready?

Mr. Tolle: Defendant Wade is ready, Your Honor.

Mr. Bruner: We are ready, Your Honor, the Intervenor is ready.

Miss Coffee: Plaintiffs Doe and Roe are ready, Your Honor.

Judge Goldberg: Will there be any testimony in this case?

Mr. Tolle: No, Your Honor, for purposes of the record, we had previously filed a Motion for a Jury trial, and all facts that were to be in controversy, I think have been resolved by affidavits, and we at this time withdraw that Motion. We will have no evidence to present.

Miss Coffee: We have no evidence to present.

Judge Goldberg: The Intervenor?

Mr. Bruner: The Intervenor has no evidence, Your Honor.

Judge Goldberg: The Court will allocate half an hour to the side for the presentation of your arguments with respect to the Motion for Summary Judgment and the Motion to Dismiss. With that time allocation, we will now hear you. The Intervenor and the Plaintiffs should divide their half hour. Your positions are the same, are they not, except with respect to standing?

Mr. Fred Bruner: Yes, Your Honor.

May it please the Court, we have agreed upon presentation of the matter before the Court, and ladies first, of course. There are several points to be taken up and we have agreed upon the points to be presented by the respective parties, and we will abide by the Courts' time.

Mr. Floyd: Your Honor, if the Court please, the State of Texas has responded to the Plaintiffs' and the Intervenor's Petitions. We don't know how the Court feels about the allocation of time between the State of Texas and the District Attorney.

Judge Goldberg: Can you divide your half hour?

Mr. Floyd: I think we can.

Judge Goldberg: Let's proceed then.

Miss Coffee: May it please the Court, I am Linda Coffee and I am the attorney representing the Plaintiffs Doe and Roe. We had agreed, my co-counsel and I, to divide up the argument in the following way: I will present the preliminary procedural points, and then my co-counsel, Sarah Weddington, will consider the merits for the Plaintiffs Doe and Roe. In view of the allotted time, I will not attempt to cover all the procedural issues raised for they are many and somewhat complex. I think I must concentrate on the question of whether this Court should abstain from rendering a Declaratory Judgment concerning the validity of the Texas Abortion Laws, and then the question of the propriety of injunctive relief, should they decide that the laws are unconstitutional.

I will first consider the question of declaratory relief. It is our position that the case of Zwickler versus Koota compels this Court to consider the constitutional question, compels this Court to give a declaratory judgment concerning the validity of the Texas Abortion statute.

Judge Hughes: Why do you say that?

Miss Coffee: Because in this case the Plaintiffs are contending that there is no possible construction which the State Courts could put on the Texas Abortion Laws which would modify or remove the constitutional question. It could not at least modify all of the questions.

Perhaps the State Court could possibly render a decision explicating and making the statute somewhat less vague, but we are complaining of the statutes not only because they are vague but because they are overbroad. Our contention is that there is no conceivable construction which you can put on the Texas Abortion Laws which would remove the problem of their overbreadth. There is no construction whereby the Court could say Texas Abortion Laws permit abortion or do not punish abortion in the case of a woman who seeks an abortion because of contraceptive failure or because of simply economic reasons, and I would point out that Zwickler versus Koota is not limited to First Amendment rights, however, if the Court thinks it is important, we do feel that First Amendment rights are involved in our Plaintiffs' constitutional claims.

Judge Hughes: What First Amendment rights?

Miss Coffee: Well, the right of privacy. I think the case of Stanley versus Georgia clearly extended First Amendment protection to the right of privacy. I think this is clear from the language of the case. However, I don't think—as I said—Zwickler versus Koota no where indicates it is limited to First Amendment rights.

Judge Goldberg: Zwickler was a First Amendment case, wasn't it?

Miss Coffee: It did involve expression—First Amendment rights, however the statement in the case says, "This is especially so when First Amendment rights are involved", implying that the case has as much validity as when First Amendment rights are not involved.

Judge Goldberg: Do you make a distinction between the First Amendment and the Ninth Amendment with respect to perhaps enforcement even if there is no difference with respect to the declaration of unconstitutionality?

Miss Coffee: I think in some cases this may be justified. I don't think it makes any difference in our case because whether you say that the rights involved First Amendment rights or Ninth Amendment rights, I feel that they are so important that they deserve the special protection that has been accorded First Amendment rights. In other words they involve fundamental human freedom, which I think the recent cases have indicated are beginning to be given the same priority treatment that First Amendment rights have already been afforded.

Judge Goldberg: We have been cautioned, however, that we are only to do it in extra ordinary cases where it is liable to have a chilling effect upon First Amendment rights.

Miss Coffee: Well, as I understand, we're talking about injunctive relief now. As I understand it, the traditional rule is that the Courts will not enjoin State criminal proceedings or perhaps proceedings of any kind except in extra ordinary circumstances.

Judge Hughes: What extra ordinary circumstances are involved here? The State has not tried to prosecute unfairly, has it?

Miss Coffee: The State is prosecuting against physicians. I think when the State undertakes to prosecute against physicians, naturally this will deter physicians from performing abortions even if they feel that in certain cases it's justified.

Judge Goldberg: Well, your position is then that any constitutional invasion of any constitutional right should be protected by an injunction?

Miss Coffee: Not any constitutional right.

Judge Goldberg: Well, where would and where wouldn't you?

Miss Coffee: All right, here's an illustration—where one individual is subjected to an unreasonable search and seizure. As in the present case, this does not really involve what we call public rights, this could be said to be an injury to this one particular individual, and this is not done pursuant to a State statute as in this case, where a State statute clearly authorizes the State to make these prosecutions.

And I think another point is that the members in Jane Roe's class do not have any adequate State remedy. There is no State forum available to the Plaintiff in Jane Roe's class.

Judge Goldberg: Yes, but the State of Texas might hold its statute unconstitutional or the Supreme Court of the United States could hold it unconstitutional when the State has held it constitutional. It's not defenseless.

Miss Coffee: Well, Jane Roe is not personally facing prosecution.

Judge Hughes: Could the Intervenor submit himself to the State Court?

Miss Coffee: He is already before the State Court, the Intervenor is already before the State Court.

Judge Hughes: But can he raise the question?

Miss Coffee: I suppose in his defense he can raise the interest of our Plaintiffs there, but I don't think it's fair to make our Plaintiffs' rights—to make their vindication of their rights be determined on what another class of persons raises.

Judge Goldberg: Do you think the entire statute should be stricken?

Miss Coffee: Yes.

Judge Goldberg: Completely?

Miss Coffee: Yes. I think the Court has no other choice because the scope is so entirely too broad. All the provisions just about are so vague, that I just don't think it's—

Judge Hughes: Suppose we struck out the provision saving the life of the mother in the last section of the law, wouldn't that make the statute constitutional? You would then have that section read, "Nothing in this Chapter applies to an abortion procured or attempted by medical advice."

Miss Coffee: The thing is—this was not the intent—if the Court should do this, then the Court would be rewriting the statute for the State. There is no indication that the State of Texas intended the statute to read that way.

Judge Goldberg: Do you know whether this statute was separable? Did it have a separability provision? When was it passed? When was the Abortion statute passed—1905?

Miss Coffee: I believe this statute was passed around 1919—it might be 1905, but the predecessor was passed in 1886, I am told.

Judge Goldberg: Do you know whether it has a separability provision?

Mr. Tolle: If the Court please, it's 1907, I think.

Judge Goldberg: Does it have a separability provision?

Miss Coffee: I don't know, Your Honor.

Judge Goldberg: Does anyone at the counsel table know?

Mr. Tolle: Not specifically. I believe there is a general provision in the Penal Code providing for separability. I think there is, Judge.

Miss Coffee: Is the Court worried about—

Judge Goldberg: We worry about a lot of things. Don't let that worry you.

Miss Coffee: I was going to suggest if the Court was concerned about there being any criminal sanction against a non-medical personnel performing abortions—

Judge Goldberg: Perhaps—may I suggest—we may be worried, I don't know—that if we struck it down completely, extricated the whole thing, anybody could perform an abortion any place—in a garage or in an attic or any other place? I know you're going to answer about the medical practice, and we'll get to that a little bit later.

Miss Coffee: All right, Your Honor.

In the case of University Committee to End the War in Vietnam versus Dunn, a court in Austin, a Three-Judge Federal Court in Austin struck down the Texas Breach of the Peace statute.

Judge Goldberg: Yes.

Miss Coffee: They struck down the whole statute, as I understand it, but they stayed the execution of an injunction until the next session of the Legislature out of a Special Order—

Judge Goldberg: You are suggesting we might do that here?

Miss Coffee: That's a possibility. I think the statute is so bad the Court is just really going to have to strike it all down. I don't think it's really worth salvaging. If the Court made the relief which it mentioned, that would still read "pursuant to medical advice" and that would still be somewhat unclear. The Court would almost have to extricate "by medical advice", whether that's just limited to licensed practitioners of medicine or nurses or what it means. There's nothing in the statute.

Judge Goldberg: You think 63 years of unconstitutionality should have worn everyone's constitutional patience, is that what you're saying?

Miss Coffee: Yes, I think so. I think the State of Texas has had plenty of time to construe this statute, if it can be construed in a constitutional manner.

Judge Goldberg: You've used 13 minutes. Judge Hughes is our timekeeper. Thank you.

Mrs. Weddington: May it please the Court, my name is Sarah Weddington. Since I have very little time left, I would like to speak to two issues, the first being the justification which the State alleges for the State Abortion statute, i.e., the protection of the life of the child; and secondly, whether or not there are substantial constitutional issues involved as protected by the right to privacy.

Since the four recent cases which deal with the Abortion statute have unanimously recognized the right to privacy and have expanded on it to some extent, I would like first to turn to the problem of whether or not—

Judge Goldberg: What four cases are you talking about?

Mrs. Weddington: The four cases I'm talking about are California v. Belous, U. S. v. Vuitch—

Judge Goldberg: In the District of Columbia—you say that they held that the Ninth Amendment was involved—

Mrs. Weddington: I said that they have all recognized the right to privacy.

Judge Goldberg: I don't read Vuitch that way. I think it's stricken down on the basis that it was vague.

Mrs. Weddington: Excuse me—quoting from that Opinion—"There has been moreover an increasing indication in decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States that as a secular matter the woman's liberty and right of privacy extends to family, marriage, and sex matters, and may well include the right to remove an unwanted child at least in the early stages of pregnancy."

Judge Goldberg: You are reading from what, now?

Mrs. Weddington: U. S. v. Vuitch. Memorandum Opinion.

I'll be glad to show this to the Court.

Judge Goldberg: I have it.

Judge Hughes: We have it.

Judge Goldberg: We have it.

Mrs. Weddington: Would you like for me to quote further from this?

Judge Hughes: No, you go ahead.

Mrs. Weddington: I will refer to this question again later, if the Court would like.

The only justification which the State has advanced at this point for the justification for the statute is that of protecting what they term the life of the unborne child.

First, I would like to draw to the Courts' attention the fact that life is an ongoing process. It is almost impossible to define a point at which life begins or perhaps even at which life ends. Certainly life in its very general matter is present in the sperm, it's present in the ova. This potential of life depends on a set of circumstances which must then occur. This is a fact recognized by former Justice Clark in an article he wrote. "To say that life is present at conception is to give recognition to the potential rather than the actual." The unfertilized egg has life and if fertilized it takes on human proportions.

Judge Goldberg: Assuming that there is a Ninth Amendment right here, I want to ask you to address yourself to the question—does the State have any compelling interest that could regulate or modify in any manner that right? Can they for example say that all abortions must be in a hospital or must be certified by one physician, four physicians or 22 physicians? Whether there should be different standards for abortion for married and unmarried people? Can there be a State compelling interest still recognizing the Ninth Amendment right?

Mrs. Weddington: So far as I can see any interest which the State would allege which could be compelling must be based on some sufficient justification. I can see, for example, sufficient justification for keeping a non-licensed medical person from doing the operation.

Judge Goldberg: You can see this?

Mrs. Weddington: There is a public health problem involved.

I cannot see any justification for regulating the abortion when it is done by a doctor.

Judge Goldberg: Whether it be married or unmarried?

Mrs. Weddington: That is true.

Judge Goldberg: Or the state of the pregnancy or anything?

Mrs. Weddington: The state of the pregnancy gives me some pause. I can see, for example, that you could, as I believe Babbitz did, say that this right exists only to the fourth month of pregnancy. To me a more persuasive argument is that you could recognize life when the fetus is able to live outside the body of the mother, which is approximately the 22nd or the 26th week of pregnancy.

I think a solution I would like to suggest to the Court is one which has come up in consideration of transplants, as to when death occurs. Instead of whether or not the heart is beating or there are bodily processes going on, the standard is more and more being adopted as to whether or not there are brain functions present as evidenced by EEG. I think this is an excellent way to determine whether or not the fetus has sufficient human characteristics that it should be given the recognition of a human life and protected as such.

So far the earliest that they have been able to get EEG readings on the fetus is about the seventh month of pregnancy.

Judge Hughes: Would you put that in the statute?

Mrs. Weddington: I think it could be used as a determination point. Certainly EEG is a very standard procedure. Doctors are all familiar with it and it could be something that could be easily done or proven that the brain function is evident.

Judge Goldberg: Do you think that the present statute, bad as you say it is, should show some compelling State interest on the part of the State to regulate some phase of this matter?

Mrs. Weddington: Not as it's written. It is so broad at the present time that it denies, or it covers so many women whom I believe under the Ninth Amendment, that those women have a right to abortion, which is denied them by this statute. I think you cannot make any valid distinction on whether or not she's married or unmarried, whether or not the child is conceived out of marriage—

Judge Goldberg: Not whether we can, but the Legislature could.

Mrs. Weddington: I don't believe the Legislature could make such a valid distinction under the distinctions.

Judge Hughes: Do you think that the State has a more compelling interest with reference to unmarried women than married women?

Mrs. Weddington: I do not. For example, at the present time a great many women who are pregnant and desire abortion are unmarried women. I don't believe it can be successfully argued that to enact a statute which would deny them abortion would in fact serve any State interest.

Judge Goldberg: Well, is there any relationship between promiscuity?

Mrs. Weddington: I don't believe there is.

Judge Goldberg: Is there any body of knowledge on the subject?

Mrs. Weddington: Not to my knowledge, other than the fact that they are already promiscuous when the statute is in effect, and in fact these are some of the girls who need this right and who have the most socially compelling arguments why they should be allowed abortions—the young, those still in school, those unable to shoulder the responsibility of a child—these girls should not be put through the pregnancy and should be entitled to an abortion.

Judge Goldberg: Are there any conditions under which the State has a compelling interest to prevent this—any, any situation that you can think of?

Mrs. Weddington: If the abortion is to be performed on a fetus which has been determined to have human life, which I would suggest would either be when brain waves are present or in the cases I suggested earlier, then I believe the State would have a valid right to regulate. Even then I do not believe the State has a valid right to regulate how it is done other than that it be done by a competent, licensed physician.

Judge Goldberg: Do you think if we struck the law down and there could be no indictments and no prosecutions for abortion and some of the abortions were taking place under conditions which you might even agree were unsanitary or unscientific conditions, what would be the situation then?

Mrs. Weddington: First of all, if it is an unlicensed medical personnel, there are remedies under the Penal Code for the practice of medicine.

Judge Goldberg: Do you know what they are? Do you know that it's just a fine and punishable by 30 days?

Mrs. Weddington: Yes.

Judge Goldberg: That's the limit of the punishment?

Mrs. Weddington: That's right, but if you had licensed personnel available and doing the operation, the girls would have the alternative of going to those people, and any woman would tell you that she would much rather place herself in the hands of a doctor under sterile conditions than to be placed in a motel room—

Judge Hughes: It might be dependent upon whether she had the money or not.

Mrs. Weddington: It might be, but for example, in John Hopkins, they are now doing abortions on an out patient basis for from $75 and $100. In most of the cases now the girls are raising usually $150, more generally $350 for the abortions that they are getting now, which is evidenced by the fact that the girls are coming in, having gone through that abortion and having to be treated.

Judge Goldberg: If the State had to pay for a good many of these abortions, would the State have any compelling interest in keeping the number down from an economic point of view?

Mrs. Weddington: The State would have more of an interest in not having to make the welfare payments to many of those children and their parents when they are later produced, than it would in denying the basic constitutional rights to those women.

I can also point out that Blue Cross has now come out and said that it will definitely consider and feels that it will probably pay medical benefits for abortions in Wisconsin.

Judge Goldberg: One more question—you think this statute is more vulnerable on Ninth Amendment grounds or on vagueness.

Mrs. Weddington: I believe it is more vulnerable on the Ninth Amendment basis.

Judge Goldberg: All right, thank you.

Mr. Bruner: Your Honor, I am Fred Bruner, and I am representing the Intervenor, Dr. Hubert Hallford.

I regret that Mrs. Weddington says on the Ninth Amendment because I was about to argue on the vagueness of the statute.

Judge Hughes: I think you should under the circumstances.

Mr. Bruner: Going back to Judge Hughes' remarks about Article 1196 of the State statute, the question of the exception to an abortion if it's procured or done by or attempted to be done by one on medical advice for the purpose of saving the life of the mother—that's what I'd like to limit my remarks to, and I think it goes without saying that any State law should precisely set out in plain language and intelligible language so that a man of common intelligence could understand the meaning of the law.

It's the position of Dr. Hallford, and I'd like to refer the Courts' attention to his uncontroverted affidavit attached to my pleadings, that not only is this language vague and hard to understand for the man of common intelligence, but even doctors themselves cannot interpret the language of this statute, and in Dr. Hallford's affidavit he states that even hospitals and doctors cannot determine what they should or shouldn't do, what is permissible and what is not permissible under the language of this particular statute. He points out in his affidavit that a person who comes to a hospital in Dallas, Texas or in the State of Texas pregnant and is going to consult the hospital about the impending pregnancy, that they can't get a decision from the hospital. They sometimes move from one hospital to the other, they sometimes move from doctors' offices to other doctors' offices—it's more or less a passing of the buck, so that doctors themselves can't determine what their liability may or may not be under this particular section of the Texas Abortion Law.

Judge Hughes: Well, if the Court struck out the words "for the purpose of saving the life of the mother", would that make the whole statute constitutional?

Mr. Bruner: You mean, Your Honor, Section 1196 in its entirety?

Judge Hughes: No, just struck out the words "for the purpose of saving the life of the mother"?

Judge Goldberg: There's nothing in this Chapter that applies to an abortion procured or attempted by medical advice—period.

Mr. Bruner: All right—I don't think it would be, Your Honor, because of the fact that "medical advice" as written in this law can be interpreted by many different ways. What is medical advice? Who does it come from?

Judge Goldberg: Can you look it up in a book?

Mr. Bruner: You can't look it up in a book—a dictionary.

Judge Goldberg: Maybe you could look it up in a book by a layman—that might be medical advice, mightn't it?

Mr. Bruner: A layman could look up "medical advice" in a book and he could say, "Come here, young lady, I am a medical advisor and I want to abort you under this law in Texas."

Judge Hughes: But you don't certainly think it would be interpreted that way, do you?

Mr. Bruner: I wouldn't go that far, Your Honor, but it has been interpreted by some to mean people who are pharmacists, who are nurses, who are taxi cab drivers and things of that nature—have interpreted themselves to be one who has medical advice, so I don't want to speculate on what some individual might interpret, but it has been so interpreted in the past that way. So therefore we take the position that this language used in this statute of the State of Texas is vague, and a man of common intelligence can't interpret it. Therefore, under rights to due process under the Constitution of the United States, Article 1196 of the Abortion Law of the State of Texas is unconstitutional.

Going to the life of the mother part of the statute, I might add also before I get away from the medical advice, referring to Dr. Hallford's affidavit, he states in there that when a woman comes into his office and discusses with him an impending pregnancy, that he is afraid to talk to her about it because of this statute; that immediately there becomes a conflict of interest between the physician and the patient in that he's afraid he's going to be prosecuted for abortion, and she's there not worried about the prosecution part of it, she's there for her personal medical reasons of having an abortion performed; and so then you get into the question of accessory before or after the fact of an abortion. Other doctors will not discuss it with other doctors about the matter of terminating a pregnancy.

Now, on the life of the mother, this part of it we contend—saving the life of the mother. "Saving"—some of the statutes, the Belous California statute uses the word "preserve". I assume that's synonymous with "save", and the Court held in the Belous case that that language of preserved and saved was vague and could not be interpreted by a man of common intelligence, and I believe that the Court in the District of Columbia dwelt upon that issue. There is a distinction, however, between those cases decided and the Babbitz case in Wisconsin in that the exceptions to the Wisconsin statute did use language of this nature. However, it did say that two physicians advised, the point being that the physicians would make the interpretation of whether it was medically permissible to abort the woman, and it would be upon the shoulders of the physicians and not upon the shoulders of the prosecutor.

Judge Goldberg: The constitutionality of 1196 has never been presented to the Court of Criminal Appeals, has it?

Mr. Bruner: There are no cases that we can find where in the Texas Court, the Texas Court of Criminal Appeals has decided upon the constitutionality. They have talked about it.

Judge Hughes: Has it ever been really raised—the constitutional point?

Mr. Bruner: Not on that particular point, Your Honor, not on 1196.

Mr. Merrill: Could I speak on that?

Mr. Bruner: Yes.

Mr. Merrill: Your Honor, in one case it was raised in the sense that there was a Motion to Quash The Indictment, and the Court just summarily said that the exception was constitutional and there was no evidence in the case about why an abortion was performed, and I think it was on medical grounds, and I have that and can give it to the Court.

Judge Hughes: Give it to us later.

Mr. Bruner: In closing, Your Honor, I want to answer, if I may, a question that Judge Goldberg asked Mrs. Weddington about if the fact that this Court knocked this law out and held it was unconstitutional, that it would open up the door for a woman to go out here in a garage or restroom or anywhere else—in a motel—and have an abortion performed. I think that the very fact that they have this Abortion law on the books of Texas has driven women to that sort of thing in the State today, and that if the Abortion Law of the State of Texas were declared unconstitutional, it would give these women the right, the constitutional right, to go to a doctor or go to a qualified person who has the right surgical instruments and have this matter done at their wishes, and I just wanted to say that in closing. Thank you.

Mr. Floyd: Your Honor, I am Jay Floyd, Assistant Attorney General for the State of Texas—

Mr. Merrill: If it please the Court, my name is Roy Merrill and I am one of the attorneys representing the Intervenor, Dr. Hallford. I'd like to cite the three cases that we could find that did deal with the Texas statute 1196. Of course there are numerous cases on the other Articles. One of them is Link versus State which is in the original Brief filed on behalf of the Doctor, 164 SW 987; another one is Ex Parte Vick, 292 SW 889; and the other one is Veevers versus State, 354 SW2d 161. Now, in that case there was a Motion to Quash the indictment on the ground that the Indictment did not allege, that the abortion didn't come under the exception of 1196 and the Court held that that's a proper matter when it's raised as an affirmative defense and no need to quash the Indictment, which is directly related to the point I'd like to argue concerning 1196, that it is unconstitutional on the ground that it places the burden technically of introducing evidence on a Defendant licensed, practicing physician.

I think the Court and everyone here will agree that the State certainly could not pass a law making it a crime for a licensed, practicing physician to perform an abortion to save the life of a mother or where she would die within a few hours if the abortion wasn't performed and it is certainly not the law as it exists now. However, the State does not have any burden when it prosecutes a physician of introducing any evidence that the abortion—why it was performed, and I think when a doctor performs an operation or a procedure such as an abortion, there are two essential elements of the crime as to a doctor. One is that he did perform the abortion, and the other is that his purpose was unlawful. Surely you could not class it a crime just for a doctor to perform an abortion.

Concerning this matter, I think if this exception were viewed as if it were a presumption it would clearly be unconstitutional. If you had a statute saying it shall be unlawful for a physician to perform an abortion, it shall be presumed that the State shows an abortion was performed, that it was performed for an unlawful purpose then clearly those facts are more likely than not, and it would clearly fall, I submit, under the Leary decision that it must be substantially certain and it is more likely than not that the presumption is valid or that the interference is valid. I'm sure the State will distinguish and say, "This is just an affirmative defense, it's not a presumption", and I would like to call one case not mentioned in the original Brief to the Courts' attention, being Morrison versus California, 291 U.S., and on page 83 the Court deals with strictly the burden of introducing evidence, and it concerned in a case in California being a crime for an alien to be in possession or own real property, and the statute merely provided that the State need only prove that he was in possession, and the burden was on him as a defense to show that he actually had citizenship, and the Court held that placing the burden upon that Defendant was a violation of due process, and in various other cases it implied it can be under the Fifth, Ninth, and the Fourteenth Amendments.

I think the Leary cases and the cases preceding them—Trop and Gainey, if read closely, deal with the problem of presumptions in the same manner in which the Court in Morrison dealt with the burden of proof.

Judge Hughes: I think we've had enough of this argument.

Mr. Floyd: Your Honor, I got out of line and I apologize to Counsel.

Judge Goldberg: That's all right.

Mr. Floyd: Your Honor, the validity of State statutes are in question, the State has an interest of course when those statutes are attacked; we have requested leave of the Court to respond to the pleadings and we have been granted that relief and leave, and we are here to present an argument on behalf of the State of Texas.

Your Honors, our first contention is that the parties in this lawsuit have no standing before this Court and that if this Court so decides that there is no controversy to be decided. Now the fundamental aspect of standing, I think, is that the Court focuses its attention on the parties instead of the issues before the Court. This was brought out in the Flast versus Cohen case. Though the issue may be justiciable, if the parties have no standing, the Court will not go forward to decide that issue.

I am under the impression that Jane Roe no longer is seeking an abortion; that she has either had her baby or is having it—

Judge Goldberg: She may in the future want to have an abortion?

Mr. Floyd: Yes, but at the present time, Your Honor, I am speaking of.

Judge Goldberg: At the time she filed this suit—are we going to let the delay in the hearing of the case abort the case?

Mr. Floyd: Your Honor, I think the law is whether or not the party has standing at the time the issues are decided in the case.

Judge Goldberg: Well, a lot of these civil rights cases and school desegregation cases, I understand that some of the children are through college by the time they remand and remand and so forth, but go ahead with your argument.

Mr. Floyd: Then my point, Your Honor, is the fact that it is problematical if she will become pregnant in the future, and if so, whether or not she will want to abort the child that she is bearing at that particular time.

The Plaintiff Mary Doe is not pregnant at this time, by the Admissions in her Complaint.

Judge Hughes: If it's to be determined as of today, we don't know, do we?

Mr. Floyd: I have no Amended Complaint or anything of this nature, Your Honor, to indicate that she is pregnant at this time, or that—Judge Goldberg: But she may want to engage in activities by which she'll become pregnant and maybe she will then want to have an abortion. Does she have any right to present the issue under those circumstances?

Mr. Floyd: But, Your Honor, aren't we becoming involved in contingencies—contingent events that may or may not occur in the future?

Judge Hughes: There's nothing contingent about the Doctor's difficulty, he's been charged and indicted and the case is pending.

Mr. Floyd: That is correct.

Judge Goldberg: And if he has standing, do we need more?

Mr. Floyd: You do not need more, Your Honor.

Of course each of these Plaintiffs has brought a class action and all others similarly situated must fall within or stand in the shoes of the Plaintiff, you might say.

Dr. Hallford's complaint, his Intervenor's complaint, alleges that he has been deprived of certain relationships with his patients, that is, discussing abortions and performing abortions; that his rights or his patient's [sic] rights are violated; that he desires to perform abortions in the future. Now, I will make note, Your Honors, for what it's worth to the Court that there may be an injection of monetary benefit in performing an abortion; that he's presently under indictment; that he did not bring this suit or intervene in this action until after the indictments had been handed down by the Dallas County Grand Jury.

Judge Goldberg: He might have presumed the State wouldn't go forward on an unconstitutional statute.

Mr. Floyd: I don't believe that the State can presume that they must go forward with it, it's their duty, I think, Your Honor.

Judge Goldberg: Well, if they came to the conclusion that it's unconstitutional, the statute was passed a long time ago, and they may not prosecute it.

Mr. Floyd: That is correct, they could—the State very easily could.

Judge Goldberg: Go ahead.

Mr. Floyd: Your Honor, we do not believe the parties have standing in this court, that they have not shown an actual controversy before this Court at this time; that this Court is being asked to render an advisory Opinion; that just because maybe there are common interests among the public does not mean that these parties have standing to bring this suit.

As to the matter of a substantial constitutional question—

Judge Goldberg: What would you do with a situation where there was no question about standing, but by the time it got to the Appellate Court it had been mooted because the Plaintiff had the baby? What are you going to do with that kind of situation?

Mr. Floyd: Your Honor, I can't say that they have standing because their standing depends upon a future, contingent event.

Judge Hughes: What would give them standing in a case like this to test the constitutionality of this statute? Apparently you don't think that anybody has standing?

Mr. Floyd: I think that if the matter is adjudicated as in the Vuitch case or else the statute is declared unconstitutional in a State Court, then this is where the standing would come in, not in the Federal Court, but this is where this matter could be resolved. Now, the Vuitch case is before the Supreme Court of the United States and Dr.

Hallford of course can attack the constitutionality of this statute in this present State proceedings.

The constitutional rights—I cannot perceive, Your Honors, how it would fall under religion, speech, or press of the First Amendment.

Judge Hughes: We agree with you on that.

Judge Goldberg: No—go to the Ninth Amendment and what about vagueness?

Mr. Floyd: It appears it is directed to the right of privacy under the Ninth Amendment, and I will not discuss the other constitutional amendments alleged, I think it's unnecessary. However, the Intervenor has contended that his right to practice medicine has been impaired or abridged, and we do not see that it has been. Maybe he cannot do all of the things he wants to do and what he considers to be the practice of medicine, but there has been no denial by him of his right to practice medicine. No one has attempted to deny him that right.

That the physician-client relationship has been impaired or abridged—such a relationship does exist, however, I think you can't stop there and say "the physician-client relationship", I think you have to go further and show some right under that relationship that has been impaired.

Now, Your Honors, they have raised a question of the equal protection of the laws, and I do not see that this is relevant.

Judge Goldberg: Skip it.

Mr. Floyd: They have raised the question of privacy, the fundamental right to choose, or the woman to choose whether or not she will bear a child, which goes to her privacy. Now of course Your Honors will discuss this more in detail, but I will point out here under that particular topic that in the Belous case, where this principle, I think, was established or else followed, and then the Vuitch case, but going back to the Belous case, the Court went further there than to consider the fundamental right of a woman to choose whether or not to bear a child and a right to privacy, and stated further that the critical issue is not whether such rights, and they were enumerated and listed, many rights involving privacy, exist, but whether the State has a compelling interest in the regulation, or whether the regulation is necessary.

Now, Your Honors, there have been many, many arguments advanced as to when an embryo becomes a human being. There have been religious groups that have joined into this controversy, and it's my understanding, and I'm not setting forth the Catholic faith—

Judge Goldberg: This statute is applicable no matter when the embryo comes in to effect—at the first week?

Mr. Floyd: That is correct.

Judge Goldberg: I don't see how that's getting you anywhere.

Mr. Floyd: But the point is that the State's interest is that it may be a consideration of whether or not murder occurs, that is, if this embryo is considered a human being?

Judge Goldberg: You mean if the embryo is considered a human being the moment of pregnancy?

Mr. Floyd: Yes, Your Honor. Now, I'm not advocating this, I'm saying there's some controversy in regard to this, that at no matter what stage of the pregnancy, the embryo is a human being. There is controversy to that effect. Medical practitioners disagree and speaking of medical advances, we have now reached a point, I think, where a medical practitioner can operate on an unborn child, perform surgery.

The State must give considerations to these various interests and opinions in deciding whether or not it has an interest in the subject matter or a compelling interest in the subject matter.

Judge Goldberg: Well, the State here has asserted its compelling interest to the extent that it make any abortion under any condition practically illegal.

Mr. Floyd: Except to save the life of the mother.

Judge Goldberg: Well, yes, except that.

Mr. Floyd: That is correct.

Judge Hughes: But you don't know what that means—the case which you quoted held that that was too vague and indefinite—the Belous case, and knocked the statute out on that ground.

Mr. Floyd: That is correct—on the right of privacy—there's no question about that.

Judge Hughes: Well then your case isn't authority for your argument.

Mr. Floyd: No, the Belous case—I'm not saying it's authority, I'm getting to the right of privacy.

Judge Goldberg: The Vuitch case says this: "The asserted constitutional right of privacy. Here the unqualified right to refuse to bear children has limitations. Congress can—" it's Congress in this case because it's the District of Columbia and the State would be in the same situation. "Congress can undoubtedly regulate abortion practice in many ways, perhaps even establishing different standards at various phases of pregnancy, if its own legislative findings were made after a modern review of medical, social and constitutional problems presented."

That's the best statement that I can find in any of the cases for your position, but what I say to you, Sir, is that I don't see anything in the Texas statute that would form the basis for this sort of compelling interest.

Mr. Floyd: Well, Your Honor, that particular case—now, the Vuitch case, as I understand it, a Motion for a Hearing has been granted by the Supreme Court, and it is my understanding that that case went further than to preserve the life of the mother. It said to preserve the life and health of the mother. This is not an argument along that point, but of course this case has not been decided finally as yet, as the Court well understands.

The State of Texas is—there are many opinions on privacy, Your Honor, and I don't know whether privacy in my opinion—I'm speaking personally now, and I'm not speaking—

Judge Goldberg: Well, I think it's a bad word in this area, but apparently everybody wants to use it. I think it's something different from privacy, but I haven't come up with a phrase myself yet, but I just know "privacy" won't do, but I know what you're talking about.

Mr. Floyd: Well, it seems to me that privacy would mean that a person is entitled to be secluded, left alone.

Judge Goldberg: This is a right to make a decision about a completely subjective matter which only involves the individual, but we won't get into that.

Mr. Floyd: As to vagueness and uncertainty, Your Honor, I think looking at the Texas Abortion statute, I think the criteria would be what a man of ordinary intelligence would have to guess at the meaning, and I do not believe that anyone would have to guess at the meaning of this particular statute.

Judge Goldberg: What time factor are we going to talk about in saving the life of a mother? Would that be imminent or can the doctor say her life may be shortened by a decade?

Mr. Floyd: Your Honor, in my understanding, it's whether or not that it might result from the birth of this particular child, death might result from the birth of this particular child.

Judge Goldberg: Even though she might die a year later?

Mr. Floyd: Well, I can't say a projection into the future.

Judge Goldberg: It's a medical judgment, it could be a scientific judgment?

Mr. Floyd: Your Honor, I think all things could be possible, but I think they have to make a decision, and I think it's left up to a medical examiner to make this decision as to whether or not the mother's life is in danger as a result of the birth of this child.

Judge Goldberg: I think you have gone over your time, if you want your associate to have his time to make his presentation.

Mr. Tolle: If the Court please, my name is John Tolle, and I represent the Defendant Henry Wade.

Mr. Floyd got into areas I wish to discuss and I'm going to have to overlap a little bit on his argument. It seems they have a disagreement, we have one too. We are not arguing with Dr. Hallford's standing, this Defendant Wade is not, he is being prosecuted under the statute and if he hasn't got standing, nobody does, so I think we're clear on that.

I think as to the Plaintiff Roe bringing a class action, she probably has standing as a class, not herself any more than as a class.

We say that Mary Doe and Joe Doe—these are two prospective applications, however, I think as we set out in that very short Brief we filed, the State only has one interest and that is the protection of the life of the unborn child. There's a lot of medical opinion on both sides of this issue, and I think that Mrs. Weddington in her argument in a sense upheld our position. We say that at some time in the life of that child before it's born, it becomes a living child. I don't know when and I don't think medical science knows exactly when. The article we cited is a recognized work, I believe, and is Grey's Anatomy for Attorneys.

Judge Goldberg: You do not think that a legitimate Judgment could be made, that even though on some technical definition there was life at this particular time, a medical Judgment could be made that there should be an abortion because the mother's health was in being and was in being for a number of years should be continued on a more equitable basis?

Mr. Tolle: It's possible that could be.

You're talking now about the State's right to regulate this field of human life, which is the termination of pregnancy. I believe that in itself gives the State the interest. The only remaining question is whether it is vague or indefinite. However, to answer your first question further, I don't believe there is any—I have not been able to find any firm body of medical opinion that says at what point in the life of an embryo fetus or unborn child or whatever you want to call it, that life occurs. This particular work I referred to says that in their opinion life occurs at conception. The old common-law rule was the term "quickening" which was at the time the mother could feel the child move. As the author of Grey's textbook on medicine pointed out, modern science is able now and at a much earlier age to determine things like fetal heartbeat and muscular movement—things which indicate a living organism of some kind. They refer to the human organism.

Our position is this basically, that the life of every person starts somewhere. Every person in this room at one time was the most primitive form of embryo. We say the State has got a right to protect life that is in being at whatever stage it may be in being, and if there is no absolute fact as to when life occurs, then it becomes, I think, for the purpose of public order, a legislative problem as to when they're going to set up an arbitrary time.

Judge Goldberg: But the statute didn't address itself to that.

Mr. Tolle: That's correct, Your Honor, it doesn't. It says "to save the life of the mother".

Judge Hughes: Suppose we struck out the phrase which we've discussed before—severed it—would that make the statute constitutional, assuming that that phrase does make it unconstitutional on account of its vagueness, would striking it out be a possibility and would it then be constitutional?

Mr. Tolle: I think if you struck it out, it wouldn't make it unconstitutional, it would make the statute virtually meaningless, if it could be done on medical advice—Hallford of course would have no complaint and I don't believe we would have any more controversy on it. I don't think it would be unconstitutional, no. I don't think it's necessary. I believe the statute is constitutional. I believe that when we're talking about rights, I think that the most persuasive right that the Plaintiffs urge as was held in the Babbitz case, and all the cases refer to it quite heavily, is the right of privacy, the Ninth Amendment right of privacy, for want of a better term, and there you get to the point where the State has to regulate conflicting rights—whether the State has got an interest in the life of the unborn child sufficient to regulate the woman's right to privacy. This is a very difficult question, and I think that is properly a legislative question.

Judge Hughes: Would you discuss the abstention doctrine as applied to this case?

Mr. Tolle: I haven't, Your Honor. Quite frankly, I believe that the Vuitch case and the Babbitz case—the ones that are presently in the process of going before the Supreme Court—I believe in each case, abstention, and as to this case, would not be proper for this reason. Those statutes are different in material aspects from ours. The Vuitch case is very material and one of the things that was struck down was this vague word of "to preserve the life or health" and I believe you could distinguish our case on that ground. The Wisconsin statute goes further than ours in establishing, I believe, a medical review system provided for an abortion, and I believe it says in the case that two doctors agreed that conclusive evidence was needed and prosecution can't occur.

I don't believe that those cases, except for the Ninth Amendment right, will be determining in this case. Now, of course, I think as far as the Ninth Amendment right goes, it will, because if the Supreme Court holds that the right of the female or the mother to privacy under the Ninth Amendment is superior to the right of a young fetus to survive, then of course that will foreclose this issue.

I think that our position is that that is a matter for legislative determination. I don't think a State has to have a law at all regulating abortion. I believe the field is such that it can regulate it constitutionally. I personally, and I think the State's position will be and it is, that the right of that child to life is superior to that woman's right to privacy. That's basically our position on that.

If I may answer just briefly—of course I think vagueness has been gone over quite heavily in here. We say to preserve the life of the mother means to prevent her death. That's self-explanatory to me. If we're talking about what Dr. Hallford can understand, I can't speak for him. His affidavit refers to his opinion about what he understands and about what other people understand. It doesn't set out as a medical fact or as an absolute fact that other doctors don't understand. It talks about their opinion.

Judge Goldberg: Do you think medical advice can come from a book?

Mr. Tolle: I don't think so. I don't think it will ever be interpreted that way. I don't think there's a statute in the world you couldn't put some unconstitutional interpretation on it, if you look for a way to do it. I believe that this will be—if it ever is attacked and if the statute does stand—will not refer to advice from a book. No—I believe it's going to refer to advice from a doctor or a medical person qualified to give it.

As far as the last thing that was raised of touching very briefly this business about putting the burden on the Defendant to prove his innocence. Mr. Merrill cited two cases—one was Dr. Leary's case and the other one was the case from California preventing aliens from owning land. I think the distinction there is that in each of those cases the thing that was presumed was an element of the offense which the Government had to prove, whereas in this case—this case—our statute is in no way different from the Federal statute regulating tax evasion, 26 U.S.C. 7201.

Judge Goldberg: Or the Dyer Act cases—we have that every day.

Mr. Tolle: Yes—affirmative offenses are present in every case—every criminal prosecution. If the Government makes out a prima facie case, the Defendant has the burden of putting himself under the exception. I believe that answers that. Thank you.

Judge Goldberg: I'd like to ask Miss Coffee or Mrs. Weddington one question—suppose that the only Defendant in this case is enjoined? Where does that leave us with respect to the rest of the State of Texas?

Mrs. Weddington: Excuse me, would you repeat the question?

Judge Goldberg: Suppose the injunction is granted in this case against Henry Wade, District Attorney of Dallas County, every other District Attorney would be free to go ahead, would he?

Mrs. Weddington: It was my understanding that since the Attorney General's Office had chosen to come in and since they are now a party-defendant to the suit—

Judge Goldberg: How are they a party defendant?

Mrs. Weddington: Well, I thought by—Judge Hughes: I don't believe they have intervened. Has the State intervened?

Mr. Floyd: No.

Judge Goldberg: I don't think so.

Mr. Tolle: If the Court please, I believe we can cite another example—in the Buchanan case, the Courts' injunction ran against Henry Wade only and I don't think it binds anybody else.

Judge Goldberg: Do you have any response to the question?

Mrs. Weddington: We goofed.

Judge Hughes: Miss Coffee, these two cases have not yet been consolidated by Order. Would you prepare one?

Miss Coffee: Yes, Your Honor.

Judge Goldberg: We appreciate very much your argument. We will take the matter under advisement. Thank you very much.

The Marshal: All rise, please.

Court is adjourned.

Opinion of the District Court, Filed June 17, 1970

IN THE

UNITED STATES DISTRICT COURT

FOR THE NORTHERN DISTRICT OF TEXAS

DALLAS DIVISION

Civil Action 3-3690-B

Civil Action 3-3691-C

[TITLE OMITTED IN PRINTING]

Before GOLDBERG, Circuit Judge, and HUGHES and TAYLOR, District Judges.

PER CURIAM:

Two similar cases are presently before the Court on motions for summary judgment pursuant to Rule 56 of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure. The defendant in both cases is Henry Wade, District Attorney of Dallas County, Texas. In one action plaintiffs are John and Mary Doe, and in the other Jane Roe and James Hubert Hallford, M.D., intervenor.[1]

From their respective positions of married couple, single woman, and practicing physician, plaintiffs attack Articles 1191, 1192, 1193, 1194, and 1196 of the Texas Penal

[1] On March 3, 1970, plaintiff Jane Roe filed her original complaint in CA-3-3690-B under the First, Fourth, Fifth, Eighth, Ninth, and Fourteenth Amendments to the United States Constitution. She alleged jurisdiction to be conferred upon the Court by Title 28, United States Code, Sections 131, 1343, 2201, 2202, 2281, and 2284 and by Title 42, United States Code, Section 1983. On

Code,[2] hereinafter referred to as the Texas Abortion Laws. Plaintiffs allege that the Texas Abortion Laws deprive April 22, plaintiff Roe amended her complaint to sue "on behalf of herself and all others similarly situated."

On March 23, James Hubert Hallford, M.D., was given leave to intervene. Hallford's complaint recited the same constitutional and jurisdictional grounds as the complaint of plaintiff Roe. According to his petition for intervention, Hallford seeks to represent "himself and the class of people who are physicians, licensed to practice medicine under the laws of the State of Texas and who fear future prosecution."

On March 3, 1970, plaintiffs John and Mary Doe filed their original complaint in CA-3-3691-C. The complaint of plaintiffs Doe recited the same constitutional and jurisdictional grounds as had the complaint of plaintiff Roe in CA-3-3690 and, like Roe, plaintiffs Doe subsequently amended their complaint so as to assert a class action.

Plaintiffs Roe and Doe have adopted pseudonyms for purposes of anonymity.

[2] Article 1191 Abortion

If any person shall designedly administer to a pregnant woman or knowingly procure to be administered with her consent any drug or medicine, or shall use towards her any violence or means whatever externally or internally applied, and thereby procure an abortion, he shall be confined in the penitentiary not less than two nor more than five years; if it be done without her consent, the punishment shall be doubled. By "abortion" is meant that the life of the fetus or embryo shall be destroyed in the woman's womb or that a premature birth thereof be caused.

Article 1192 Furnishing the Means

Whoever furnishes the means for procuring an abortion knowing the purpose intended is guilty as an accomplice.

Article 1193 Attempt at Abortion

If the means used shall fail to produce an abortion, the offender is nevertheless guilty of an attempt to produce abortion, provided it be shown that such means were calculated to produce that result, and shall be fined not less than one hundred nor more than one thousand dollars.

Article 1194 Murder in Producing Abortion

If the death of the mother is occasioned by an abortion so produced or by an attempt to effect the same it is murder.

Article 1196 By Medical Advice

married couples and single women of the right to choose whether to have children, a right secured by the Ninth Amendment.

Defendant challenges the standing of each of the plaintiffs to bring this action. However, it appears to the Court that Plaintiff Roe and plaintiff-intervenor Hallford occupy positions vis-a-vis the Texas Abortion Laws sufficient to differentiate them from the general public. Compare Pierce v. Society of Sisters, 268 U.S. 510 (1925), and Griswold v. Connecticut, 381 U.S. 479 (1965),[3] with Frothingham v. Mellon, 262 U.S. 447 (1923). Plaintiff Roe filed her portion of the suit as a pregnant woman wishing to exercise the asserted constitutional right to choose whether to bear the child she was carrying. Intervenor Hallford alleged in his portion of the suit that, in the course of daily exercise of his duty as a physician and in order to give his patients access to what he asserts to be their constitutional right to choose whether to have children, he must act so as to render criminal liability for himself under the Texas Abortion Laws a likelihood. Dr. Hallford further alleges that Article 1196 of the Texas Abortion Laws is so vague as to deprive him of warning of what produces criminal liability in that portion of his medical practice and consultations involving abortions.

On the basis of plaintiffs' substantive contentions,[4] it appears that there then exists a "nexus between the status asserted by the litigant[s] and the claim[s] [they present]." Flast v. Cohen, 392 U.S. 83, 102 (1968).

[3] By the authority of Griswold, Dr. Hallford has standing to raise the rights of his patients, single women and married couples, as well as rights of his own.

[4] "[I]n ruling on standing, it is both appropriate and necessary to look to the substantive issues * * * to determine whether there is a logical nexus between the status asserted and the claim sought to be adjudicated." Flast v. Cohen, 392 U.S. 83, 102 (1968).

Further, we are satisfied that there presently exists a degree of contentiousness between Roe and Hallford and the defendant to establish a "case of actual controversy" as required by Title 28, United States Code, Section 2201. Golden v. Zwickler, 394 U.S. 103 (1969).

Each plaintiff seeks as relief, first, a judgment declaring the Texas Abortion Laws unconstitutional on their face and, second, an injunction against their enforcement. The nature of the relief requested suggests the order in which the issues presented should be passed upon.[5] Accordingly, we see the issues presented as follows:

I. Are plaintiffs entitled to a declaratory judgment that the Texas Abortion Laws are unconstitutional on their face?

II. Are plaintiffs entitled to an injunction against the enforcement of these laws?

I.

Defendants have suggested that this Court should abstain from rendering a decision on plaintiffs' request for a declaratory judgment. However, we are guided to an opposite conclusion by the authority of Zwickler v. Koota, 389 U.S. 241, 248-249 (1967):

> "The judge-made doctrine of abstention • • • sanctions • • • escape only in narrowly limited 'special circumstances.' • • • One of the 'special circumstances • • • is the susceptibility of a state statute of a construction by the state courts that would avoid or modify the constitutional question."

[5] Zwickler v. Koota, 389 U.S. 241, 254 (1967); Cameron v. Johnson, 390 U.S. 611, 615 (1968).

The Court in Zwickler v. Koota subsequently quoted from United States v. Livingston, 179 F.Supp. 9, 12-13 (E.D.S.C. 1959):

> "Regard for the interest and sovereignty of the state and reluctance needlessly to adjudicate constitutional issues may require a federal District Court to abstain from adjudication if the parties may avail themselves of an appropriate procedure to obtain state interpretation of state laws requiring construction. • • • The decision in [Harrison v. N.A.A.C.P., 369 U.S. 167], however, is not a broad encyclical commanding automatic remission to the state courts of all federal constitutional questions arising in the application of state statutes. • • • Though never interpreted by a state court, if a state statute is not fairly subject to an interpretation which will avoid or modify the federal constitutional question, it is the duty of a federal court to decide the federal question when presented to it. Any other course would impose expense and long delay upon the litigants without hope of its bearing fruit." [6]

Inasmuch as there is no possibility that state question adjudication in the courts of Texas would eliminate the necessity for this Court to pass upon plaintiffs' Ninth Amendment claim or Dr. Hallford's attack on Article 1196 for vagueness, abstention as to their request for declaratory judgment is unwarranted. Compare Chicago v. Atchison T. & S.F.R. Co., 357 U.S. 77, 84 (1958), with Reetz v. Bozanich, 38 U.S.L.W. 4170, —— U.S. —— (1970).

On the merits, plaintiffs argue as their principal contention[7] that the Texas Abortion Laws must be declared unconstitutional because they deprive single women and married couples of their right, secured by the Ninth Amendment,[8] to choose whether to have children. We agree.

The essence of the interest sought to be protected here is the right of choice over events which, by their character and consequences, bear in a fundamental manner on the privacy of individuals. The manner by which such interests are secured by the Ninth Amendment is illustrated by the concurring opinion of Mr. Justice Goldberg in Griswold v. Connecticut, 381 U.S. 479, 492 (1965):

> "[T]he Ninth Amendment shows a belief of the Constitution's authors that fundamental rights exist that are not expressly enumerated in the first eight amendments and intent that the list of rights included there not be deemed exhaustive." • • •
> "The Ninth Amendment simply shows the intent of the Constitution's authors that other fundamental personal rights should not be denied such protection or disparaged in any other way simply because they are not specifically listed in the first eight constitutional amendments." (Emphasis added.)[9]

[7] Aside from their Ninth Amendment and vagueness arguments, plaintiffs have presented an array of constitutional arguments. However, as plaintiffs conceded in oral argument, these additional arguments are peripheral to the main issues. Consequently, they will not be passed upon.

[8] "The enumeration in the Constitution, of certain rights shall not be construed to deny or disparage others retained by the people."

Relative sanctuaries for such "fundamental" interests have been established for the family,[10] the marital couple,[11] and the individual.[12]

Freedom to choose in the matter of abortions has been accorded the status of a "fundamental" right in every case coming to the attention of this Court where the question has been raised. Babbitz v. McCann, —— F.Supp. —— (E.D.Wis. 1970); People v. Belous, 80 Cal. Rptr. 354, 458 P.2d 194, (Cal. 1969); State v. Munson, —— (South Dakota Circuit Court, Pennington County, April 6, 1970). Accord United States v. Vuitch, 305 F.Supp. 1032 (D. D.C. 1969). The California Supreme Court in Belous stated:

> "The fundamental right of the woman to choose whether to bear children follows from the Supreme Court's and this Court's repeated acknowledgment of a 'right of privacy' or 'liberty' in matters related to marriage, family, and sex." 458 P.2d at 199.

of their personal and private notions. Rather, they must look to the 'traditions and [collective] conscience of our people' to determine whether a principle is 'so rooted [there] . . . as to be ranked as fundamental.' Snyder v. Massachusetts, 291 U.S. 97, 105. The inquiry is whether a right involved 'is of such a character that it cannot be denied without violating those 'fundamental principles of liberty and justice which lie at the base of all our civil and political institutions. . . .' Powell v. Alabama, 287 U.S. 45, 67."

The District Court in Vuitch wrote:

> "There has been • • • an increasing indication in the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States that as a secular matter a woman's liberty and right of privacy extends to family, marriage and sex matters and may well include the right to remove an unwanted child at least in early stages of pregnancy." 305 F. Supp. at 1035.

Writing in Griswold v. Connecticut, supra, and the decisions leading up to it, former Associate Justice Tom C. Clark observed:

> "The result of these decisions is the evolution of the concept that there is a certain zone of individual privacy which is protected by the Constitution. Unless the State has a compelling subordinating interest that outweighs the individual rights of human beings, it may not interfere with a person's marriage, home, children and day-to-day living habits. This is one of the most fundamental concepts that the Founding Fathers had in mind when they drafted the Constitution." [13]

Since the Texas Abortion Laws infringe upon plaintiffs' fundamental right to choose whether to have children, the burden is on the defendant to demonstrate to the satisfaction of the Court that such infringement is necessary to support a compelling state interest.[14] The defendant has failed to meet this burden.

To be sure, the defendant has presented the Court with several compelling justifications for state presence in the area of abortions. These include the legitimate interests of the state in seeing to it that abortions are performed by competent persons and in adequate surroundings. Concern over abortion of the "quickened" fetus may well rank as another such interest. The difficulty with the Texas Abortion Laws is that, even if they promote these interests,[15] they far outstrip these justifications in their impact by prohibiting all abortions except those performed "for the purpose of saving the life of the mother."[16]

It is axiomatic that the fact that a statutory scheme serves permissible or even compelling state interests will not save it from the consequences of unconstitutional overbreadth. E.g., Thornhill v. Alabama, 310 U.S. 88 (1940);

[14] "In a long series of cases this Court has held that where fundamental personal liberties are involved, they may not be abridged by the States simply on a showing that a regulatory statute has some rational relationship to the effectuation of a proper state purpose. 'Where there is a significant encroachment upon personal liberty, the State may prevail only upon showing a subordinating interest which is compelling,' Bates v. Little Rock, 361 U.S. 516, 524." Griswold v. Connecticut, 381 U.S. 479, 497 (1965) (Concurring opinion of Mr. Justice Goldberg). See also Kramer v. Union Free School District, 395 U.S. 621 (1969).

[15] It is not clear whether the Texas laws presently serve the interests asserted by the defendant. For instance, the Court gathers from a reading of the challenged statutes that they presently would permit an abortion "for the purpose of saving the life of the mother" to be performed anywhere and quite possibly by one other than a physician.

Buchanan v. Batchelor, —— F.Supp. —— (N.D. Tex. 1970). While the Ninth Amendment right to choose to have an abortion is not unqualified or unfettered, a statute designed to regulate the circumstances of abortions must restrict its scope to compelling state interests. There is unconstitutional overbreadth in the Texas Abortion Laws because the Texas Legislature did not limit the scope of the statutes to such interests. On the contrary, the Texas statutes, in their monolithic interdiction, sweep far beyond any areas of compelling state interest.

Not only are the Texas Abortion Laws unconstitutionally overbroad, they are also unconstitutionally vague. The Supreme Court has declared that "a statute which either forbids or requires the doing of an act in terms so vague that men of common intelligence must necessarily guess at its meaning and differ as to its application violates the first essential of due process of law." Connally v. General Construction Co., 269 U.S. 385, 391 (1926). "No one may be required at peril of life, liberty, or property to speculate as to the meaning of penal statutes. All are entitled to be informed as to what the State commands or forbids." Lanzetta v. New Jersey, 306 U.S. 451, 453 (1929). See also Giaccio v. Pennsylvania, 382 U.S. 399, 402-403 (1966). Under this standard the Texas statutes fail the vagueness test.

The Texas Abortion Laws fail to provide Dr. Hallford and physicians of his class with proper notice of what acts in their daily practice and consultation will subject them to criminal liability. Article 1196 provides:

> "Nothing in this chapter applies to an abortion procured or attempted by medical advice for the purpose of saving the life of the mother."

It is apparent that there are grave and manifold uncertainties in the application of Article 1196. How likely must death be? Must death be certain if the abortion is not performed? Is it enough that the woman could not undergo birth without an ascertainably higher possibility of death than would normally be the case? What if the woman threatened suicide if the abortion was not performed? How imminent must death be if the abortion is not performed? Is it sufficient if having the child will shorten the life of the woman by a number of years? These questions simply cannot be answered.

The grave uncertainties in the application of Article 1196 and the consequent uncertainty concerning criminal liability under the related abortion statutes are more than sufficient to render the Texas Abortion Laws unconstitutionally vague in violation of the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment.

II.

We come finally to a consideration of the appropriateness of plaintiffs' request for injunctive relief. Plaintiffs have suggested in oral argument that, should the Court declare the Texas Abortion Laws unconstitutional, that decision would of itself warrant the issuance of an injunction against state enforcement of the statutes. However, the Court is of the opinion that it must abstain from granting the injunction.

Clearly, the question whether to abstain concerning an injunction against the enforcement of state criminal laws is divorced from concerns of abstention in rendering a declaratory judgment. Quoting from Zwickler v. Koota,

> "[A] request for a declaratory judgment that a state statute is overbroad on its face must be considered independently of any request for injunctive relief against enforcement of that statute. We hold that a federal district court has the duty to decide the appropriateness and merits of the declaratory request irrespective of its conclusion as to the propriety of the issuance of the injunction." 389 U.S. at 254.

The strong reluctance of federal courts to interfere with the process of state criminal procedure was reflected in Dombrowski v. Pfister, 380 U.S. 479, 484-485 (1965):

> "[T]he Court has recognized that federal interference with a State's good-faith administration of its criminal laws is peculiarly inconsistent with our federal framework. It is generally to be assumed that state courts and prosecutors will observe constitutional limitations as expounded by this Court, and that the mere possibility of erroneous initial application of constitutional standards will usually not amount to the irreparable injury necessary to justify a disruption of orderly state proceedings."

This federal policy of non-interference with state criminal prosecutions must be followed except in cases where "statutes are justifiably attacked on their face as abridging free expression," or where statutes are justifiably attacked "as applied for the purpose of discouraging protected activities." Dombrowski v. Pfister, 380 U.S. at 489-490.

and Ninth Amendments, we do not believe that plaintiffs can seriously argue that the Texas Abortion Laws are vulnerable "on their face as abridging free expression." [17] Further, deliberate application of the statutes "for the purpose of discouraging protected activities" has not been alleged. We therefore conclude that we must abstain from issuing an injunction against enforcement of the Texas Abortion Laws.

Conclusion

In the absence of any contested issues of fact, we hold that the motions for summary judgment of the plaintiff Roe and plaintiff-intervenor Hallford should be granted as to their request for declaratory judgment. In granting declaratory relief, we find the Texas Abortion Laws unconstitutional for vagueness and overbreadth, though for the reasons herein stated we decline to issue an injunction. We need not here delineate the factors which could qualify the right of a mother to have an abortion. It is sufficient to state that legislation concerning abortion must address itself to more than a bare negation of that right.

Ga. 1970).

Judgment of the District Court, Filed June 17, 1970

IN THE

UNITED STATES DISTRICT COURT

FOR THE NORTHERN DISTRICT OF TEXAS

DALLAS DIVISION

Civil Action 3-3690-B

Civil Action 3-3691-C

[TITLE OMITTED IN PRINTING]

This action came on for hearing on motions for summary judgment before a three-judge court composed of Irving L. Goldberg, Circuit Judge, Sarah T. Hughes and W. M. Taylor, Jr., District Judges. The defendant in both cases is Henry Wade, District Attorney of Dallas County, Texas. In one action plaintiffs are John and Mary Doe, husband and wife, and in the other Jane Roe and James Hubert Hallford, M.D., intervenor.

The case having been heard on the merits, the Court, upon consideration of affidavits, briefs and arguments of counsel, finds as follows:

Findings of Fact

(1) Plaintiff Jane Roe, plaintiff-intervenor James Hubert Hallford, M.D. and the members of their respective classes have standing to bring this lawsuit.

(2) Plaintiffs John and Mary Doe failed to allege facts sufficient to create a present controversy and therefore do not have standing.

(3) Articles 1191, 1192, 1193, 1194 and 1196 of the Texas Penal Code, hereinafter referred to as the Texas Abortion Laws, are so written as to deprive single women and married persons of the opportunity to choose whether to have children.

(4) The Texas Abortion Laws are so vaguely worded as to produce grave and manifold uncertainties concerning the circumstances which would produce criminal liability.

Conclusions of Law

(1) This case is a proper one for a three-judge court.

(2) Abstention, concerning plaintiffs' request for a declaratory judgment, is unwarranted.

(3) The fundamental right of single women and married persons to choose whether to have children is protected by the Ninth Amendment, through the Fourteenth Amendment.

(4) The Texas Abortion Laws infringe upon this right.

(5) The defendant has not demonstrated that the infringement of plaintiffs' Ninth Amendment rights by the Texas Abortion Laws is necessary to support a compelling state interest.

(6) The Texas Abortion Laws are consequently void on their face because they are unconstitutionally overbroad.

(7) The Texas Abortion Laws are void on their face because they are vague in violation of the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment.

(8) Abstention, concerning plaintiffs' request for an injunction against the enforcement of the Texas Abortion Laws is warranted.

It is therefore ORDERED, ADJUDGED and DECREED that: (1) the complaint of John and Mary Doe be dismissed; (2) the Texas Abortion Laws are declared void on their face for unconstitutional overbreadth and for vagueness; (3) plaintiffs' application for injunction be dismissed.

Dated this the 17 day of June, 1970.

Notice of Appeal by Plaintiffs Jane Roe, John Doe, Mary Doe, and James Hubert Hallford, M.D., From the Judgment of the District Court to the Supreme Court of the United States, Filed With the District Court August 17, 1970

IN THE

UNITED STATES DISTRICT COURT

FOR THE NORTHERN DISTRICT OF TEXAS

DALLAS DIVISION

Civil Actions Nos. 3-3690-B and 3-3691-C

[TITLE OMITTED IN PRINTING]

Notice is hereby given that Jane Roe, Plaintiff, John Doe, Plaintiff, and Mary Doe, Plaintiff, as well as James Hubert Hallford, M.D., Intervenor, Appellants, hereby appeal to the Supreme Court of the United States from that part of the final judgment entered in the above causes on the 17th day of June, 1970, in favor of Defendant Henry Wade, and Responding Party Defendant, State of Texas, wherein the Court denied all injunctive relief prayed for by said Plaintiffs and Intervenor.

Notice is also given that John Doe and Mary Doe, Plaintiffs, Appellants, hereby appeal to the Supreme Court of the United States from that part of the final judgment entered in the above cause on the 17th day of June, 1970 in favor of Defendant, Henry Wade, and Responding Party Defendant, State of Texas, wherein the Court denied the standing of John Doe and Mary Doe to attack the constitutionality of the Texas Abortion Laws, Articles 1191, 1192, 1193, 1194 and 1196, Texas Penal Code.

This appeal is taken pursuant to Title 28, U.S.C., Section 1253.

I.

The Clerk will please prepare a transcript of the record in these causes, for transmission to the Clerk of the Supreme Court of the United States, and include in said transcript the following:

A. All pleadings of the parties in these causes including all briefs in support of the Plaintiffs' and Intervenor's pleadings.

B. The court reporter's transcription of the proceedings before the Court.

C. All evidentiary items on file in this cause including depositions, stipulations and request for admissions and replies thereto, if any.

D. All orders of the Court.

II.

The following questions are presented by this appeal:

A. Whether the Plaintiffs John Doe and Mary Doe had standing to challenge the constitutionality of Articles 1191, 1192, 1193, 1194, and 1196, Texas Penal Code?

B. Whether the Plaintiffs and Intervenor were entitled to a permanent injunction restraining Defendant Henry Wade from enforcing Articles 1191, 1192, 1193, 1194, and 1196, Texas Penal Code?

Motion of Plaintiffs Roe, Doe, and Hallford to Hold Appeal to Fifth Circuit by Defendant Wade in Abeyance Pending Decision by the Supreme Court of the United States, Filed October 13, 1970

IN THE

UNITED STATES COURT OF APPEALS

FOR THE FIFTH CIRCUIT

No. 30329

[TITLE OMITTED IN PRINTING]

I. INTRODUCTION

The present appeal to this Court was taken by Appellant Wade from a declaratory judgment rendered below by a statutory three-judge federal district court that the Texas Abortion Laws violate the federal constitution by reason of unconstitutional vagueness and overbreadth. The judgment below, while granting declaratory relief, denied an injunction against future enforcement of the aforesaid statutes. From that portion of the judgment, Appellees here have taken an appeal directly to the Supreme Court of the United States pursuant to 28 U.S.C. §1253 (1964 ed.). Appellees make the present motion to hold the appeal in abeyance pending disposition by the Supreme Court. In the event that the Supreme Court's action allows the appeal here to go forward, Appellee respectfully requests an additional 20 days time within which to file a brief, and leave to file a brief of 50 pages.

II. Reasons for Holding Appeal in Abeyance

Title 28, U.S. Code §1253, authorizes an appeal from a three-judge district court order "granting or denying . . . an interlocutory or permanent injunction . . . ." The decision below denied such an injunction. While it is unusual that declaratory relief is granted, and an injunction denied, there have been such cases from time to time in the past, and the Supreme Court has heard such appeals. See, e.g., Carter v. Jury Comm'n of Greene County, 396 U.S. 320, 328 (1970); Williams v. Rhodes, 393 U.S. 23, 26-28 (1968). It is the action on the injunction which governs appealability.

When the appeal goes up properly, the entire case is opened for review. As Dandridge v. Williams, 397 U.S. 471 (1970) teaches:

> "The prevailing party may, of course, assert in a reviewing court any ground in support of his judgment . . . ." 397 U.S. at 475 n. 6.

Hence Appellant Wade may contest the declaratory judgment in the Supreme Court by way of defense to the propriety of not granting an injunction. Wade is in no way prejudiced by the holding of the present appeal in abeyance. He need do little more than change the heading on the brief already submitted to this Court.

III. Relief Requested

Accordingly, Appellee respectfully requests the following:

(1) That the present appeal be held in abeyance pending disposition of this case by the Supreme Court of the United States, in an appeal filed by Appellee (See Jurisdictional Statement attached hereto);

(2) That the record on this appeal be certified to the District Court for transmission to the Supreme Court of the United States for use in the appeal of this case docketed there as No. 808, October 1970 Term;

(3) That in the event this appeal is ultimately allowed to go forward, Appellee be granted an additional 20 days within which to file a brief, and that leave be granted to file a printed brief of 50 pages length, exclusive of indices and appendices.

Respectfully submitted,

CIVIL CASE
NO. 13676

COMPLAINT FOR DECLARATORY AND INJUNCTIVE RELIEF

1. This is an action for a temporary restraining order, preliminary and permanent injunction against the enforcement of the Ga. Code Ann. § 26-1201, et seq. (sometimes referred to as the Georgia Abortion Act), which provides as follows:

"26-1201. Criminal Abortion

Except as otherwise provided in Section 26-1202, a person commits criminal abortion when he administers any medicine, drug or other substance whatever to any woman or when he uses any instrument or other means whatever upon any woman with intent to produce a miscarriage or abortion.

26-1202. Exception

(a) Section 26-1201 shall not apply to an abortion performed by a physician duly licensed to practice medicine [8] and surgery pursuant to Chapter 84-9 or 84-12 of the Code of Georgia of 1933, as amended, based upon his best clinical judgment that an abortion is necessary because:

(1) A continuation of the pregnancy would endanger the life of the pregnant woman or would seriously and permanently injure her health; or

(2) The fetus would very likely be born with a grave, permanent, and irremediable mental or physical defect; or

(3) The pregnancy resulted from forcible or statutory rape.

(b) No abortion is authorized or shall be performed under this section unless each of the following conditions is met:

(1) The pregnant woman requesting the abortion certifies in writing under oath and subject to the penalties of false swearing to the physician who proposes to perform the abortion that she is a bona fide legal resident of the State of Georgia.

(2) The physician certifies that he believes the woman is a bona fide resident of this State and that he has no information which should lead him to believe otherwise.

(3) Such physician's judgment is reduced to writing and concurred in by at least two other physicians duly licensed to practice medicine and surgery pursuant to Chapter 84-9 of the Code of Georgia of 1933, as amended, who certify in writing that based upon their separate personal medical examinations of the pregnant woman, the abortion is, in their judgment necessary because of one or more of the reasons enumerated above.

(4) Such abortion is performed in a hospital licensed by the State Board of Health and accredited [9] by the Joint Commission on Accreditation of Hospitals.

(5) The performance of the abortion has been approved in advance by a committee of the medical staff of the hospital in which the operation is to be performed. This committee must be one established and maintained in accordance with the standards promulgated by the Joint Commission on the Accreditation of Hospitals, and its approval must be by a majority vote of a membership of not less than three members of the hospital's staff; the physician proposing to perform the operation may not be counted as a member of the committee for this purpose.

(6) If the proposed abortion is considered necessary because the woman has been raped, the woman makes a written statement under oath, and subject to the penalties of false swearing, of the date, time and place of the rape and the name of the rapist, if known. There must be attached to this statement a certified copy of any report of the rape made to any law enforcement officer or agency and a statement by the solicitor general of the judicial circuit where the rape occurred or allegedly occurred that, according to his best information, there is probable cause to believe that the rape did occur.

(7) Such written opinions, statements, certificates, and concurrences are maintained in the permanent files of such hospital and are available at all reasonable times to the solicitor general of the judicial circuit in which the hospital is located.

(8) A copy of such written opinions, statements, certificates, and concurrences is filed with the Director [10] of the State Department of Public Health within ten (10) days after such operation is performed.

(9) All written opinions, statements, certificates, and concurrences filed and maintained pursuant to Paragraphs (7) and (8) of this subsection shall be confidential records and shall not be made available for public inspection at any time.

(c) Any solicitor general of the judicial circuit in which an abortion is to be performed under this section, or any person who would be a relative of the child within the second degree of consanguinity, may petition the superior court of the county in which the abortion is to be performed for a declaratory judgment whether the performance of such abortion would violate any constitutional or other legal rights of the fetus. Such solicitor general may also petition such court for the purpose of taking issue with compliance with the requirements of this section. The physician who proposes to perform the abortion and the pregnant woman shall be respondents. The petition shall be heard expeditiously and if the court adjudges that such abortion would violate the constitutional or other legal rights of the fetus, the court shall so declare and shall restrain the physician from performing the abortion.

(d) If an abortion is performed in compliance with this section, the death of the fetus shall not give rise to any claim for wrongful death.

(e) Nothing in this section shall require a hospital to admit any patient under the provisions hereof for the purpose of performing an abortion, nor shall any hospital be required to appoint a committee such as contemplated under subsection (b)(5). A physician, or any other person who is a member of or associated with the staff of a [11] hospital, or any employee of a hospital in which an abortion has been authorized, who shall state in writing an objection to such abortion on moral or religious grounds shall not be required to participate in the medical procedures which will result in the abortion, and the refusal of any such person to participate therein shall not form the basis of any claim for damages on account of such refusal or for any disciplinary or recriminatory action against such person.

26-1203. Punishment

A person convicted of criminal abortion shall be punished by imprisonment for not less than one nor more than 10 years."

The plaintiffs seek a declaratory judgment that the above statute is unconstitutional in that it deprives physicians, their patients, and women desiring abortions of rights protected by the First, Fourth, Fifth, Ninth, and Fourteenth Amendments to the United States Constitution.

2. The plaintiffs invoke this Court's jurisdiction under the First, Fourth, Fifth, Ninth, and Fourteenth Amendments to the United States Constitution; Title 28, U.S.C.A. §§ 2281 and 2284; and Title 42, U.S.C.A. § 1983.

3. The plaintiffs seek a declaration that the Georgia Abortion Statute is unconstitutional on its face, and as applied, under the Declaratory Judgment Act, Title 28 U.S.C.A. §§ 2201 and 2202.

4. This is a proper case to be heard by a three-judge court, in that plaintiffs are challenging the validity of a State Statute under the United States Constitution and under Title 28, U.S.C.A. §§ 2281 and 2284, and seek an injunction against the enforcement and other implementation and effects of the Statute.

5. Plaintiffs bring this action as a class action pursuant to Rule 23 of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure because the questions of law and fact are common to plaintiffs and to the classes they represent; [12] the members of the classes are so numerous as to make joinder impracticable; the claims of plaintiffs are typical of the claims of all members of the class; plaintiffs fairly and adequately represent the claims of all the members of the classes; defendants are acting on grounds generally applicable to the entire class; the questions of law and fact common to the class predominate over any question affecting individual members; and because a class action will best provide a fair and efficient adjudication of the important issue herein.

6. Plaintiff referred to herein as Mary Doe is a natural person employing a fictitious name in order to protect her true identity. It is her belief that the use of her true name would subject plaintiff to unfavorable publicity resulting in public embarrassment, ridicule and intimidation. A sealed affidavit containing plaintiff's true identity will be filed with the court.

7. Plaintiff Mary Doe is a 22 year old citizen of the United States and of the State of Georgia residing in the Northern District of Georgia. Plaintiff Doe states that she is presently nine weeks pregnant; she has been advised that an abortion can be performed on her with less danger to health than if she should give birth to such child. Plaintiff has given birth to three children; as to the third child born to her (July 19, 1969), she was placed with adoptive parents. The other two children have recently been placed in a foster home because of plaintiff's poverty and inability to care for said children. Plaintiff's husband recently abandoned her, forcing plaintiff to live with her indigent parents and their eight small children. Out of five years marriage, she and her husband have lived together only about two years. She and her husband have become reconciled, however, they are financially unable to support and care for a child. Mr. Doe is a construction worker and is sporadically employed. Plaintiff has been a mental patient at the Georgia State Hospital in Milledgeville, Georgia. If forced to continue with this pregnancy, plaintiff will suffer irreparable mental anguish and harm, and she will be unable to care for or support such resulting child.

8. On or about March 25, 1970 plaintiff Doe made application to the Abortion Committee of Grady Memorial Hospital to be considered an appli[13]cant for a legal therapeutic abortion as allowed by Ga. Code Ann. § 26-1202. Plaintiff's application was denied on April 10, 1970, by the said Committee on grounds that her present situation did not come within the terms of Ga. Code Ann. § 26-1202(a)(1).

9. Because the Committee has denied plaintiff's application for a therapeutic abortion, plaintiff Doe has been forced to either relinquish her right to decide when and how many children she will bear or to seek an abortion which must be termed illegal under Ga. Code Ann. § 26-1201 in violation of her constitutional rights guaranteed by the First, Ninth, and Fourteenth Amendments. Plaintiff sues on her own behalf and on behalf of all others similarly situated.

10. Plaintiff physicians, listed below, are residents of the State of Georgia, and are licensed to practice medicine in the State of Georgia, namely: Peter G. Bourne, Psychiatrist, Mental Health Director, Atlanta Southside Comprehensive Health Center, Faculty member Emory University Medical School; Robert Hatcher, Director, Family Planning Services, Grady Memorial Hospital; Lillas L. James, private practitioner of medicine specializing in health problems of children and women; James Waters, Director of the Adolescent Pregnancy Program, Grady Memorial Hospital; Corbett Turner, Child Psychiatrist at Atlanta Southside Comprehensive Health Center and Faculty member Emory University Medical School; Newton Long, Director of Maternal-Infant Project at Grady Memorial and professor Obstetrics and Gynecology, Emory University Medical School; Edward Leader, William H. Biggers, Psychiatrists engaged in private practice; George Violin, physician.

Patricia S. Smith, Jennie Williams, Judith Bourne, Suzanne Dunaway, Joyce Parks, Lou Ann Irion and Mary Long are registered nurses licensed to practice in the State of Georgia and are residents of said State.

The above listed physicians (obstetricians, gynecologists) and nurses are, on numerous occasions, consulted by pregnant women about unwanted pregnancies. In instances where an abortion is needed, under the medical judgment of such physician, they are placed in the position of [14] being unable to provide for their patients optimum medical care. Because an abortion must be performed in a hospital, Ga. Code § 26-1202(b)(4); because of the burdensome procedure of obtaining two other physicians' concurring opinions and presentation to the hospital abortion committee; and further because of the vagueness of the grounds for abortion, plaintiffs have been chilled and deterred from practicing their professions as medical practitioners to give their patients the benefit of their best medical knowledge and treatment as guaranteed by the First, Fourth and Fourteenth Amendments of the Constitution. Plaintiffs sue on their own behalf and on behalf of all others similarly situated.

11. Reverend J. Emmett Herndon, Presbyterian Campus Minister, Emory University, Reverend Samuel L. Williams, Minister, Friendship Baptist Church; Reverend Eugene Pickett, Minister, Unitarian Universalist Congregation; Reverend Richard Devor, Methodist Campus Minister, Emory University, and Reverend Donald Daughtry, First Congregation Church, and Judith Zorach and Karen Weaver, social workers, are residents of the State of Georgia. As ministers and social workers they are consulted by pregnant women concerning where to obtain safe, speedy and adequate medical care to terminate pregnancies. Plaintiffs wish to provide confidential counselling services to such individuals and offer information concerning such medical care, however, they are chilled and deterred in the practice of their professions and the exercise of their constitutionally guaranteed right of free speech because of the unconstitutional Georgia law referred to above. Plaintiffs sue on their own behalf and on behalf of all others similarly situated.

12. The Honorable Arthur K. Bolton, defendant, is sued in his official capacity as the Attorney General of the State of Georgia; he is charged with the state-wide enforcement and administration of the challenged statutes.

13. The Honorable Lewis R. Slaton, defendant, is sued in his official capacity as District Attorney of Fulton County, Georgia. He is charged with the enforcement and administration of the challenged statutes [15] in Fulton County.

14. Defendant Herbert T. Jenkins is sued in his official capacity as the Chief of Police and is charged with the initial enforcement of the challenged statutes in the City of Atlanta, Georgia.

15. Planned Parenthood Association of Atlanta, Inc., and Georgia Citizens for Abortion, Inc., are non-profit corporations engaged in birth control counselling and are consulted by pregnant women regarding safe, speedy and adequate medical care to terminate unwanted pregnancies.

First Cause of Action

16. As a result of the above statute, plaintiff Mary Doe, and the class she represents, can only obtain a legal abortion if she has been raped, the child would likely be born with a severe mental or physical defect, or the "continuation of her pregnancy would endanger the life of the pregnant woman or would seriously and permanently injure her health . . ." The quoted basis for abortion is vague and indefinite in that the term health is not defined and it is not clear that it includes varying degrees of mental health as well as physical health. Nor is the degree of possible danger to life from natural causes specified, therefore, the provision as to danger to life is subject to many and varied interpretations. Further, there are no guide lines as to what constitutes serious and permanent injury to health and this is subject to diverse interpretations and plaintiff believes that the law is being interpreted restrictively by some hospital committees and more liberally by others.

17. As a result of the above statute, plaintiff Mary Doe, and the class she represents, can only obtain a legal abortion if she obtains the assistance of psychiatrists and physicians and has them present her request to a hospital abortion committee. The committee must then be convinced that an abortion is necessary to preserve her life or prevent serious and permanent injury to her health. This is a burdensome and costly procedure and denies plaintiffs and other poor persons equal access to medical care and facilities thereby denying equal protection of the laws in contravention of rights guaranteed under the Fourteenth Amendment of [16] the United States Constitution. Additionally, because of the time limitations inherent in pregnancy and the desire of pregnant women for privacy, it is rarely possible to test the denial of an abortion by a hospital committee by request for review or redress in the courts.

18. Further, the challenged statute is unconstitutional on its face and as applied in that it:

(a) invades plaintiff's right of privacy or liberty in matters related to marriage, family and sex, the sacred right of every individual to the possession and control of her own person; and the right to be left alone as guaranteed by the First, Fourth, Fifth, Ninth, and Fourteenth Amendments to the Constitution;

(b) chills and deters plaintiff in the exercise of her rights of association, privacy and sexual and family relations as guaranteed by the First, Fourth, Fifth, Ninth and Fourteenth Amendments;

(c) deprives plaintiff of the fundamental right of a woman to choose whether to bear children as guaranteed by the Fourth, Fifth, Eighth, Ninth and Fourteenth Amendments;

(d) deprives plaintiff of the right to safe, speedy and adequate medical care on the basis of wealth in violation of the constitutional guarantee of equal protection of the laws;

(e) denies plaintiff life and liberty without due process of law despite a lack of compelling state interest, in that it forces her to expose herself to the hazards and risks of illegal non-medical abortion in order to terminate an unwanted pregnancy;

(f) deprives plaintiff of safe and adequate medical care on the basis of the religious beliefs of others in violation of the First Amendment guarantee against the establishment of religion;

(g) denies plaintiff access to information concerning her health, safety and welfare and the availability of safe, speedy and adequate medical care in violation of the guarantees of the First Amendment;

(h) deprives plaintiff of guarantees of due process of law in that the criteria for a legal abortion are unconstitutionally vague and [17] without standards;

(i) deprives plaintiff of what little access she might have to a legal abortion without due process in violation of the Fourteenth Amendment in that it chills and deters doctors and hospitals from performing such medical procedures because of fear of prosecution under the unconstitutionally vague statutes;

(j) constitutes cruel and unusual punishment in violation of the Eighth Amendment in that it forces plaintiffs to bear and raise unwanted children;

(k) deprives plaintiff of equal access to both public and private medical facilities which on information and belief receive substantial federal, state, county, and city funding, such equal access being guaranteed by the Fifth and Fourteenth Amendments to the Constitution.

Second Cause of Action

Plaintiff physicians, psychiatrists, nurses, ministers and social workers named above reallege each allegation specified in paragraphs 16-18 and in addition allege that:

19. The challenged statute is unconstitutional on its face and as applied in that:

(a) the threat of grand jury subpoena and/or prosecution under a statute which is void for vagueness under the First and Fourteenth Amendments chills and deters plaintiffs from exercising their rights of free speech guaranteed by the First Amendment to the Constitution in that they are unable to inform women or others seeking information on their behalf, where they can obtain safe, speedy and adequate medical care for the termination of an unwanted pregnancy.

Third Cause of Action

Plaintiff physicians named above in paragraph 10 reallege each and every allegation specified in paragraphs 16-19 and in addition allege that:

20. The challenged statute is unconstitutional on its face and [18] as applied in that:

(a) it is unconstitutionally vague in violation of the Fourteenth Amendment in that the statute does not establish a formal administrative procedure or body for establishing rules, regulations or official interpretation of the provisions of said statute. Thus, the law is subject to many interpretations by hospital abortion committees and is not uniformly applied throughout the state.

(b) it requires plaintiffs as persons charged with the health of their patients, to determine whether an abortion is necessary to preserve the life of the mother, an incorrect judgment subjecting them to possible criminal prosecution and loss of license to practice medicine;

(c) it chills and deters plaintiffs from practicing their profession as medical practitioners to give their patients the benefit of their best medical knowledge and from fulfilling their duties and responsibilities in the highest traditions of their professions as guaranteed by the First, Fifth and Fourteenth Amendments to the Constitution.

21. Plaintiffs have no adequate remedy at law.

WHEREFORE, plaintiffs respectfully pray that:

1. Pursuant to Title 28 U.S.C. §§ 2282 and 2284 a three-judge district court be convened to hear and determine this proceeding;

2. A declaratory judgment be issued holding the Georgia Abortion Statute, Ga. Code Ann. § 26-1201, et seq. to be in violation of the rights of plaintiffs as protected by the First, Fourth, Fifth, Ninth, and Fourteenth Amendments to the United States Constitution;

3. Pending the hearing and determination of the prayers for permanent relief the Court enter an interlocutory injunction restraining the defendants, their agents, and successors from in any way enforcing or threatening to enforce the aforementioned statutes;

4. A permanent injunction be entered restraining and enjoining defendants, their agents, and successors from enforcing, threatening to [19] enforce, or otherwise applying the challenged statute in derogation of the rights of plaintiffs;

5. They be granted such other relief as may seem to this Court appropriate.

MOTION FOR TEMPORARY RESTRAINING ORDER

Comes now the plaintiff in the above-styled action and moves this Court for a Temporary Restraining Order enjoining and restraining the defendants, and each of them, from enforcing, threatening to enforce, or otherwise applying the Georgia Abortion Statute, 26 Ga. Code Ann. § 1201, et seq., in derogation of the rights of plaintiff. As grounds, plaintiff shows that:

(a) She has challenged the constitutionality of the Georgia Abortion Statute, 26 Ga. Code Ann. § 1201, et seq.

(b) Plaintiff, Mary Doe, is a pregnant woman (9 weeks) who desires an abortion.

(c) Plaintiff has attempted to obtain an abortion by applying to the Therapeutic Committee of Grady Memorial Hospital as allowed by 26 Ga. Code Ann. § 1202.

(d) Plaintiff's application was denied by the committee on the grounds that her situation did not come within the terms of 26 Ga. Code Ann. § 1202(a)(1).

(e) If forced to comply with the Georgia Abortion Statute, plaintiff will suffer irreparable mental anguish, be forced to bear an unwanted child whom plaintiff will be unable to care for or support, and will thus be caused irreparable harm and injury.

(f) In order to receive good medical care, plaintiff must obtain an abortion before she is 16 weeks pregnant.

(g) Plaintiff believes that she has a right to receive an abortion, and any infringement upon this right is a denial of basic constitutional guarantees.

(h) Plaintiff has no administrative remedy by which she can seek review or question the decision of the Abortion Committee.

(i) Plaintiff has been advised that a licensed physicial has [23] agreed to perform an abortion on her if this Court enjoins defendants from enforcing of said Statute as to him.

(j) The named defendants will not be injured by the issuance of such a Temporary Restraining Order.

CIVIL ACTION NO. 13676

ANSWER OF GUARDIAN AD LITEM OF UNBORN CHILD OF MARY DOE

Comes now the guardian ad litem of the unborn child of Mary Doe, and files this answer to plaintiffs' complaint in behalf of said unborn child.

FIRST DEFENSE

Said complaint fails to state a claim upon which relief can be granted to Mary Doe or to any of the other plaintiffs named in said complaint.

SECOND DEFENSE

Said complaint fails to state a claim for equitable relief in behalf of Mary Doe or any of the other plaintiffs named in said complaint.

THIRD DEFENSE

As to plaintiff Mary Doe, said action is not being prosecuted in the name of a real party in interest as required by Rule 17(a) of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure.

FOURTH DEFENSE

Said complaint fails to join the father of the [45] unborn child of Mary Doe and therefore said complaint fails to join an indispensable party as required by Rule 19(a) of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure.

The unborn child of Mary Doe denies that plaintiffs are entitled to any relief sought in paragraphs 1 and 2 of said complaint, and specifically denies that any right of plaintiffs protected by the First, Fourth, Fifth, Ninth or Fourteenth Amendment to the United States Constitution is at issue in this action.

2.

The unborn child of Mary Does denies that plaintiffs are entitled to the relief sought in paragraph 3 of said complaint.

3.

The unborn child of Mary Doe denies that plaintiffs are entitled to the relief sought in paragraph 4 of said complaint.

4.

The unborn child of Mary Doe denies that plaintiffs are entitled to the relief sought in paragraph 5 of said complaint.

Answering paragraph 6 of said complaint, the unborn child of Mary Doe avers that for want of information sufficient to form a belief, said unborn child is unable to admit or deny the allegations of paragraph 6 of said complaint but demands strict proof thereof. Further answering said allegations, said unborn child denies that it is necessary or proper for said plaintiff to conceal her [46] identity from the Court or from the unborn child.

Answering paragraph 7 of said complaint, the unborn child of Mary Doe avers on information and belief that Mary Doe is at least fifteen weeks pregnant, but for want of information sufficient to form a belief, the unborn child is unable to admit or deny the remaining allegations of said paragraph of said complaint, except that the allegations of the last sentence of paragraph 7 of said complaint are specifically denied.

7.

For want of information sufficient to form a belief, the unborn child of Mary Doe can neither admit nor deny the allegations of paragraph 8 of said complaint.

8.

The unborn child of Mary Doe denies the allegations of paragraph 9 of said complaint.

9.

Answering paragraph 10 of said complaint, for want of information sufficient to form a belief, the unborn child of Mary Doe is unable to admit or deny the allegations of the first two paragraphs of paragraph 10 of said complaint and the first sentence of the third paragraph of paragraph 10 of said complaint. However, the remaining allegations of paragraph 10 of said complaint are specifically denied.

10.

Answering paragraph 11 of said complaint, for want of information sufficient to form a belief, the unborn child of Mary Doe is unable to admit or deny the allegations [47] of the first two sentences of paragraph 11 of said complaint. The unborn child of Mary Doe denies the allegations of the last two sentences of paragraph 11 of said complaint.

11.

The unborn child of Mary Doe admits the allegations of paragraphs 12, 13 and 14 of said complaint.

12.

For want of information sufficient to form a belief, the unborn child of Mary Doe can neither admit nor deny the allegations of paragraph 15 of said complaint.

13.

The unborn child child of Mary Doe denies the allegations of paragraphs 16, 17, 18, 19, 20 and 21 of said complaint.

14.

Further answering said complaint and specifically paragraph 21 thereof, the unborn child of Mary Doe avers that plaintiffs have an adequate remedy at law insofar as concerns the alleged application of Mary Doe to the Abortion Committee of Grady Memorial Hospital to obtain an abortion in that they can appeal the alleged denial of that Committee to the Fulton Superior Court for the purpose of determining whether or not that Committee has acted illegally.

15.

Further answering said complaint, if Mary Doe does not wish to have children after the birth of this unborn child, she has an adequate remedy at law under the provisions of the Georgia "Voluntary Sterilization Act", Ga. Laws 1966, p. 453, Ga. Code § Ann. 84-931, et seq.

COUNTER-CLAIM

Further answering said complaint, and by way of [48] counter-claim, the unborn child of Mary Doe avers as follows:

1.

The unborn child of Mary Doe is a legal person in contemplation of law and as such is entitled to the full protection of all laws of the United States and of the State of Georgia.

The plaintiffs have conspired to deprive the unborn child of Mary Doe of life in violation of the following legal rights of the unborn child of Mary Doe:

(a) The right of the unborn child of Mary Doe under the Fourth Amendment to the United States Constitution to be secure in his person against unreasonable seizure.

(b) The right of the unborn child of Mary Doe under the Fifth Amendment of the United States Constitution not to be deprived of life without due process of law.

(c) The right of the unborn child of Mary Doe under the Sixth Amendment of the United States Constitution to a trial by jury and an opportunity to confront witnesses against him.

(d) The rights of the unborn child of Mary Doe as guaranteed by the Ninth Amendment to the United States Constitution.

(e) The right of the unborn chlid of Mary Doe to due process and the equal protection of the law under the Fourteenth Amendment to the United States Constitution.

(f) The right of the unborn child of Mary Doe under the Eighth Amendment to the United States Constitution and Article I, Section I, Paragraph IX, of the Georgia Constitution of 1945 (Ga. Code Ann. § 2-109) not to have cruel and unusual punishment inflicted upon him.

(g) The right of the unborn child of Mary Doe under Article IX, Section I, Paragraph II, of the Georgia Constitution of 1945 (Ga. Code Ann. § 2-102) to the impartial and complete protection of his person by the state and local governments of the State of Georgia.

(h) The right of the unborn child of Mary Doe under Article I, Section I, Paragraph XVI of the Georgia Constitution of 1945 (Ga. Code Ann. § 2-116) to be secure in his person from unreasonable seizure.

(i) The right of the unborn child of Mary Doe under Article I, Section I, Paragraph III, of the Georgia Constitution of 1945 (Ga. Code Ann. § 2-103) not to be deprived of life except by due process of law.

(j) The right of the unborn child of Mary Doe under Title 42, Section 1981, of the United States Code to the full and equal benefit of all laws and proceedings for the security of his person.

(k) The right of the unborn child of Mary Doe under Title 42, Section 1985, of the United States Code to be free from any conspiracy to deprive him of the equal protection of the laws of the United States and of the State of Georgia and the equal privileges and immunities under said laws.

(l) The right of the unborn child of Mary Doe to the protection of his person and all civil rights secured to him by the laws of the United States and the State of Georgia as provided in Title 42, Section 1988, of the United States Code.

Plaintiffs Peter G. Bourne, Robert Hatcher, James Waters, Corbett Turner and Newton Long are acting in the [50] aforesaid conspiracy and in this action in their capacity as agents of Grady Memorial Hospital, and such action therefore constitutes state action.

4.

The unborn child of Mary Doe brings this action for himself and as representative of the class of unborn children.

5.

The unborn child of Mary Doe brings this action under Title 42, Section 1983, of the United States Code seeking an injunction against plaintiffs depriving him of the aforesaid rights, privileges and immunities.

6.

The unborn child of Mary Doe avers that whether or not the Court upholds the validity of those provisions of Georgia law challenged in the plaintiffs' complaint, under the provisions of the common law of the State of Georgia he is entitled to life.

WHEREFORE, the unborn child of Mary Doe prays as follows:

(a) That the prayers of plaintiffs' complaint be denied;

(b) That plaintiffs be temporarily and permanently enjoined from conspiring to deprive the unborn child of Mary Doe of his civil rights.

ANSWER OF LEWIS R. SLATON, DISTRICT ATTORNEY OF FULTON COUNTY

Comes now, Defendant, LEWIS R. SLATON, District Attorney of Fulton County, and files this answer to plaintiff's complaint and shows the court as follows:

FIRST DEFENSE

Said complaint fails to state a claim upon which relief can be granted to Mary Doe or to any of the other plaintiffs named in said complaint.

SECOND DEFENSE

Said complaint fails to state a claim for equitable relief in behalf of Mary Doe or any of the other plaintiffs named in said complaint.

THIRD DEFENSE

As to plaintiff, Mary Doe, said action is not being prosecuted in the name of a real party in interest as required by Rule 17(a) of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure.

FOURTH DEFENSE

Said complaint fails to join the father of the unborn [54] child of Mary Doe and therefore said complaint fails to join an indispensable party as required by Rule 19(a) of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure.

FIFTH DEFENSE

Said complaint fails to show said Mary Doe complied with the provisions of Georgia Code Ann. § 26-1201, et seq. (sometimes referred to as the Georgia Abortion Act.).

1.

Respondent, Lewis R. Slaton, denies that plaintiffs are entitled to any relief sought in paragraphs 1 and 2 of said complaint, and specifically denies that any right of plaintiffs protected by the First, Fourth, Fifth, Ninth and Fourteenth Amendments to the United States Constitution is at issue in this action.

2.

Respondent denies that plaintiffs are entitled to the relief sought in paragraph 3 of said complaint.

3.

Respondent denies that plaintiffs are entitled to the relief sought in paragraph 4 of said complaint.

4.

Respondent denies the allegations of paragraph 5 of said complaint and specifically denies that plaintiffs are entitled to the relief sought in paragraph 5 of said complaint.

Respondent avers that for want of information sufficient [55] to form a belief, he is unable to admit nor deny the allegations of paragraph 6 of said complaint and demands strict proof thereof. In further answer, Respondent denies that it is necessary or proper for said plaintiff, Mary Doe, to conceal her identity from the court or Respondent. Respondent further shows that Mary Doe's identity is necessary for Respondent to properly prepare his defense to plaintiff's factual allegations.

Respondent specifically denies the allegations of the last sentence of paragraph 7 of said complaint. For want of sufficient information to form a belief, Respondent is unable to admit nor deny the remaining allegations of said paragraph of said complaint.

7.

For want of information sufficient to form a belief, Respondent can neither admit nor deny the allegations of paragraph 8 of said complaint.

8.

Respondent specifically denies the allegations of paragraph 9 of said complaint.

9.

Respondent is unable to admit or deny the allegations of the first two paragraphs of paragraph 10 and the first sentence of the third paragraph of paragraph 10 of said complaint for want of information sufficient to form a belief. Respondent specifically denies the remaining allegations of paragraph 10 of said complaint.

Respondent is unable to admit or deny the allegations of the first two sentences of paragraph 11 of said complaint for want of information sufficient to form a belief. Respondent denies the remaining portions of paragraph 11 of said complaint.

11.

Respondent is unable to admit or deny the allegations of paragraph 12 of said complaint as worded, for want of information sufficient to form a belief.

12.

Paragraph 13 of said complaint is admitted.

13.

Respondent is unable to admit nor deny the allegations of paragraph 14 of said complaint, as worded, for want of sufficient information to form a belief.

14.

Respondent is unable to admit or deny the allegations of paragraph 15 of said complaint for want of sufficient information to form a belief.

15.

Respondent denies the allegations of paragraph 16, 17, 18, 19, 20, 21 and every sub-paragraph thereof of said complaint.

WHEREFORE, Respondent prays:

a) That the prayers of plaintiff's complaint be denied;

b) That the Respondent have such further relief as is just and equitable.

FIFTH DEFENSE

The Complaint fails to state a claim against this defendant upon which relief can be granted under any provision of the Fifth Amendment to the Constitution of the United States of America.

SIXTH DEFENSE

The Complaint fails to state a claim against this defendant upon which relief can be granted under any provision of the Ninth Amendment to the Constitution of the United States of America.

SEVENTH DEFENSE

The Complaint fails to state a claim against this defendant upon which relief can be granted under any provision of the Fourteenth Amendment to the Constitution of the United States of America.

EIGHTH DEFENSE

The Complaint fails to state a claim against this defendant upon which relief can be granted under any provision of the Eighth Amendment to the Constitution of the United States of America.

NINTH DEFENSE

The Complaint fails to state a claim against this defendant upon which relief can be granted under any provision of Title 42 USC Section 1983.

TENTH DEFENSE

The Complaint fails to state a claim against this defendant upon which relief can be granted under any provision of Title 28 USC Sections 2201 and 2202.

ELEVENTH DEFENSE

This defendant is without knowledge or information sufficient to form a belief as to the truth of the averments contained in [60] paragraph 1 of the Complaint except that the law quoted therein is a part of the laws of the State of Georgia so far as defendant is informed and believes.

This defendant denies any averment in paragraphs 2, 3, 4, 5, 7, 8, 9, 10, 11, 16, 17, 18, 19, 20 and 21 as to which a response from this defendant is required by any rule of law.

This defendant denies any averment in paragraph 6 of the Complaint as to which a response from him is required. Defendant further states that the refusal of plaintiff to disclose her true identity in the pleadings prevents this proceeding from being a case or controversy to which the jurisdiction of this court extends within the meaning of Article 3, Section 2, Clause 1 of the Constitution of the United States of America.

Defendant admits the averments of paragraphs 12, 13 and 14 of the Complaint insofar as the names, titles and general duties of defendant and the other officers are concerned.

WHEREFORE, this defendant demands the court enter judgment against all plaintiffs with all costs taxed against plaintiffs.

} CIVIL ACTION NUMBER 13676

The court having heretofore appointed a guardian ad litem for the unborn foetus in the within matter and said guardian having filed an answer seeking affirmative relief by way of injunction against the plaintiffs

Now, upon consideration, it appears that said appointment was improvidently entered in that said foetus is not entitled to representation by a guardian ad litem; at least not to the extent of being able to ask for affirmative relief. Cf. Ga. Code Ann. §26-1103; Ga. Code Ann. §26-1101; Biegun v. The State, 206 Ga. 618 (1950); White v. The State, 114 Ga. App. 437 (1966); Hunter v. The State, 29 Ga. App. 366 (1923); contra, Hornbuckle v. Accordingly, said appointment is hereby revoked and set aside. However, the guardian is free to proceed as amicus curiae in the case now referred to a three-judge panel.

ARTHUR K. BOLTON, as Attorney General of the State of Georgia, et al.,

CIVIL ACTION
NO. 13676

BRIEF IN SUPPORT OF MOTION TO DISMISS

FACTS:

"Arthur K. Bolton, as Attorney General of the State of Georgia", is named as a party defendant in the above-styled action. It is alleged in the Complaint that "he is charged with the State-wide enforcement and administration of the challenged statutes." (Complaint, Par. 12). This is the only basis given for joining him.

The suit challenges the constitutionality of that portion of the Criminal Code of Georgia which deals with abortion, i.e., Sections 26-1201 through 26-1203. It prays for a declaration of unconstitutionality and an injunction against enforcement and application of the subject statutes.

ARGUMENT:

It is submitted that none of the various forms of relief prayed for by plaintiffs can be awarded against the Attorney General of Georgia. That being so, as will be further explained below, the suit does not lie against him and, therefore, it is respectfully urged that he be dismissed as a party defendant.

The Attorney General is not charged generally with the enforcement, application, or administration of the criminal [65] statutes of this State. He is an elected executive officer of the State. Constitution of the State of Georgia of 1945, Art. V, § II, Par. I; Art. VI, § X, Par. I (Ga. Code § 2-3101, § 2-4501). As such, certain of his duties are enumerated in the Constitution;

> "It shall be the duty of the Attorney General to act as the legal adviser of the Executive Department, to represent the State in the Supreme Court in all capital felonies; and in all civil and criminal cases in any court when required by the Governor and to perform such other services as shall be required of him by law." Constitution, supra, Art. VI, § X, Par. II (Ga. Code § 2-4502).

In addition to these duties, the authority of the Attorney General is prescribed as follows:

> "The General Assembly shall have power to prescribe the duties, authority, and salaries of the executive officers, ..." Constitution, supra, Art. V, § II, Par. I (Ga. Code § 2-3102).

Pursuant to the Constitutional mandate, numerous duties have been prescribed, none of which involve the enforcement or administration of the criminal laws here subject. Georgia Code, Ch. 40-16 contains the bulk of them. Thus, in addition to the statutorily listed duties required by the Governor (Ga. Code § 40-1602), the Department of Law, of which the Attorney General is the head, is vested with complete and exclusive authority in matters of law relating to the Executive Branch of the State government. Ga. Laws 1966, pp. 43-45; Ga. Code Ann.

§ 40-1612, -1614. As chief legal officer of the State, [66] the Attorney General has only limited, clearly proscribed authority and power to prosecute certain criminal cases. Ga. Laws 1943, pp. 284, 286-287 (Ga. Code Ann. § 40-1616, -1619). Nowhere is there a general blanket authority to prosecute all types of criminal cases, which would include those arising under the statutes here subject.

That duty is delegated to the district attorneys, as representatives of the State. Constitution, supra, Art. VI, § XI, Par. II (Ga. Code Ann. § 2-4602). It is therefore his duty: ". . . (4) to draw up all indictments or presentments, when requested by the grand jury, and to prosecute all indictable offenses." Ga. Code § 24-2908. It is only in cases of emergency, when a district attorney "is absent or indisposed, or disqualified from interest or relationships to engage in a prosecution," that the Attorney General, among others, may serve in the place of the district attorney. Ga. Code § 24-2913; § 40-1603. That, of course, is not the situation here.

The combination of specific constitutional and statutory provisions defines the boundaries of the Attorney General's authority and duties. ". . . (W)here the Constitution creates an office and prescribes the duties of the holder thereof, and declares that other duties may be imposed on him by statute, he has no authority to perform any act not legitimately within the scope of such statutory and constitutional provisions." Walker ex rel. Mason v. Georgia Railway and Power Company, 146 Ga. 655 (1917); State ex rel. Boykin v. Ball Investment Company, 191 Ga. 382, 387 (1940); Boykin v. Martocello, 194 Ga. 867, 870 (1942); Board of Commissioners v. Clay, 214 Ga. 70, 73 (1958). Thus, the Attorney General has no power or authority to determine who is to be prosecuted for an alleged offense under the criminal abortion statutes, nor can he as a part of his official [67] duties enforce, administer, or apply those statutes except in the limited instances referred to above.

It is also pointed out that the district attorneys are not his agents but are elected by the people and are answerable to them. Constitution, supra, Art. VI, § XI, Par. I (Ga. Code § 2-4601). The district attorneys are independent of the Attorney General, who therefore has no control over them as to prosecutions under the subject criminal statutes; nor do they act under his supervision or his direction. Neither does he have any authority or power to direct the chief of police as his agent.

Inasmuch as none of the relief prayed for can be directed against the Attorney General, he is an improper party defendant and should hence be dismissed as a party defendant.

Inasmuch, however, as the procedure contained in 28 U.S.C. § 2284 has been called into operation by the plaintiffs' assertion of the necessity of a three-judge court pursuant to 28 U.S.C. § 2281, the Attorney General respectfully requests permission to appear as amicus curiae with respect to the defense of the State statutes' constitutional validity.

CIVIL ACTION
NO. 13676

MOTION FOR RECONSIDERATION OF ORDER REVOKING APPOINTMENT OF GUARDIAN AD LITEM OF UNBORN FOETUS

Comes now the undersigned, appearing as amicus curiae, and moves the Court to reconsider and revoke its Order of May 5, 1970, revoking appointment of the undersigned as guardian ad litem for the unborn foetus of Mary Doe upon the following grounds:

It is alleged in the complaint that at the time of filing the complaint Mary Doe was nine weeks pregnant. Mrs. Hames, of counsel for Mary Doe, has stated to the undersigned that the aforesaid allegation was mistaken and that Mary Doe has been pregnant for approximately four to five weeks longer than alleged in the complaint. Thus, the foetus is now between sixteen and one-half weeks and seventeen and one-half weeks old.

It is probable that the foetus is now quick as a matter of law, but if this is not the case, it is at least a question of fact whether or not the foetus is quick and the vast preponderance of the evidence would demand a finding that it is is.

[70] 3.

There is no party present before the Court who is representing the interests of the foetus.

4.

If the guardian ad litem filed a claim for affirmative relief which should not have been filed in behalf of the foetus, the Court can correct any error in that regard without depriving the foetus of representation by a guardian ad litem.

WHEREFORE, the undersigned prays that said Order of May 5, 1970, be revoked and that the undersigned or some other qualified person be appointed guardian ad litem for the foetus.

MARY DOE, et al.,
Plaintiffs
v.
ARTHUR K. BOLTON, et al.,

MOTION OF FERDINAND BUCKLEY TO INTERVENE

Comes now Ferdinand Buckley, who respectfully requests this Court for leave to intervene in the above styled action on behalf of the unborn child of Mary Doe and on behalf of all unborn children in the State of Georgia who are or might be affected by a judgment in the above styled action upon the following grounds:

Plaintiffs have filed an action in behalf of themselves and as representatives of the several classes to which they belong, claiming that the abortion laws of the State of Georgia adversely affect them and their respective classes and are violative of the United States Constitution.

2.

Each of the named defendants is allegedly charged with the duty of enforcing the abortion laws under attack.

3.

Neither the unborn child of Mary Doe nor any of the unborn children who are or might be affected by a judgment in this case have been named defendants in this case, and no one purports to represent the unborn child [101] of Mary Doe or the class of unborn children in general who are or might be affected by a decision in this case.

The granting of the relief prayed for in the plaintiffs' complaint would deprive the unborn child of Mary Doe and other children similarly situated of their lives and liberty without due process of law and without the actual protection of the law in violation of the United States Constitution.

5.

The granting of the relief prayed for in plaintiffs' complaint would subject the unborn child of Mary Doe and other children similarly situated to cruel and unusual punishment in violation of the United States Constitution.

6.

The granting of the relief prayed for in plaintiffs' complaint would deprive the unborn child of Mary Doe and other children similarly situated of their civil rights in violation of Title 42, §§ 1981, 1985 and 1988 of the United States Code.

7.

The number of the members of the class which movant seeks to represent in this litigation is so large that the joinder of all members of the class would be impractical if not impossible. There are questions of law and fact in this case which will determine the rights of every member of this class to life and liberty.

Your movant will fairly, adequately and aggressively protect the interests of each member of this class, and movant therefore requests appointment as guardian ad [102] litem for and on behalf of the unborn child of Mary Doe and other unborn children in the State of Georgia.

9.

The class of unborn children will be irreparably injured if intervention is not allowed by this Court.

10.

While movant has been granted by the court leave to participate in the action as an amicus curiae, the rights of the class which movant seeks to represent will not be adequately protected unless movant is permitted to participate fully, as representative of a party in every phase of the action.

WHEREFORE, movant respectfully requests leave to intervene in this action in behalf of the unborn child of Mary Doe and other unborn children similarly situated, and for such other relief as this Court may deem appropriate.

ANSWERS TO INTERROGATORIES

Comes now Plaintiff Mary Doe and makes the following responses to Interrogatories propounded by defendant Lewis R. Slaton and served upon my attorney on June 10, 1970.

INTERROGATORY NO. 1: I do not remember the names and specific dates of all doctors that have examined me concerning my pregnancy. I do recall that I went to Grady Memorial Hospital on or about March 15 or 16, 1970. I remember being seen by a Dr. White and a Dr. Butler. In late April, 1970, I was examined by Dr. Donald Block and a Dr. Bourn. I saw another doctor but do not recall his name. I saw Dr. Block at his office and Dr. Bourn at the Southside Comprehensive Medical Center. The other doctor was at Lenox Towers.

INTERROGATORY NO. 2: My husband and I are now separated.

INTERROGATORY NO. 3: No response required.

INTERROGATORY NO. 4: I object to answering this question because any conviction of crime is completely irrelevant to My right to an abortion.

INTERROGATORY NO. 5: I object to answering this interrogatory for the same reason.

INTERROGATORY NO. 6: The denial of my application by Grady Memorial Hospital was not in writing.

[466] INTERROGATORY NO. 7: My recollection is that I was notified by a doctor from Grady, Dr. Butler, as I recall.

INTERROGATORY NO. 8: My husband and I were separated at the time I applied for the abortion at Grady.

INTERROGATORY NO. 9: Yes, to the best of my knowledge.

INTERROGATORY NO. 10: I do not have copies of the certifications made by the physicians.

INTERROGATORY NO. 11: My application for abortion was denied by Grady Memorial Hospital, on or about April 10, 1970. Georgia Baptist Hospital, Atlanta, Georgia, approved my application on May 5, 1970.

INTERROGATORY NO. 12: I am an indigent person qualified for medical services at Grady Memorial Hospital. I do not have the money to pay my doctors. I was not approved as a charity patient at Georgia Baptist Hospital and I did not have the money to pay for the abortion there.

INTERROGATORY NO. 13: I am unemployed, have no income, receive no support from my husband and do not yet qualify for welfare assistance. I do qualify, so I am advised, for free medical services at Grady Memorial Hospital. I received one emergency check from the Welfare department in an amount under $20.00.

MOTION FOR A CONTINUANCE

Now comes LEWIS R. SLATON, District Attorney of Fulton County and requests that this Court grant a continuance for a reasonable time after the identity of the Plaintiff, Mary Doe, is disclosed in order that the defendants may properly prepare a defense to the allegations in said Petition.

That the plaintiffs have refused to disclose the identity of said Mary Doe which has hampered and rendered impossible an adequate investigation by the defendants;

2.

That the Defendants have been unable to obtain a deposition from Mary Doe by the avowed refusal of the plaintiffs to disclose her identity;

3.

That the Defendants have been unable to obtain a mental and physical examination of said Mary Doe by her avowed refusal to disclose her identity;

[472] 4.

That the Defendant, Lewis R. Slaton, has been denied the right to be confronted by a real person whose identity is known to him in order to properly prepare his sundry defense.

WHEREFORE, the Defendant respectfully requests a continuance for a reasonable time after the disclosure of the identity of Mary Doe, in order to properly prepare his defense and defend his person under due process of law.

UNITED STATES DISTRICT COURT
NORTHERN DISTRICT OF GEORGIA
ATLANTA DIVISION

MARY DOE, et al,
Plaintiffs
vs.
ARTHUR K. BOLTON, as Attorney General of the State of Georgia; LEWIS R. SLATON, as District Attorney of Fulton County, Georgia; and HERBERT T. JENKINS, as Chief of Police of the City of Atlanta, Defendants

PER CURIAM.

This is an action for declaratory and injunctive relief brought pursuant to 28 U.S.C.A. §2201 and 2202, and 42 U.S.C.A. §1983 and 28 U.S.C.A. §1343. It is a class action attacking Ga. Code Ann. §26-1201, et seq. (1969) Georgia's "Abortion Act."

Plaintiffs claim to represent four sub-classes: pregnant women, single or married, wishing legal abortions; licensed physicians who wish to perform or counsel performance of legal abortions; registered nurses who desire to participate in performing or counsel performance of legal abortions; and ministers and social workers who wish to be free to advise abortion in counselling pregnant women.

Plaintiffs seek an order declaring Georgia's Abortion Statute unconstitutional and enjoining its enforcement on various grounds:

(1) the Statute is unconstitutionally vague and indefinite on its face and as applied, failing to provide sufficient [605] warning of the conduct proscribed, in violation of the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment to the United States Constitution;

(2) Georgia's Abortion Statute unconstitutionally abridges a woman's right to decide to terminate an unwanted pregnancy, in restricting that fundamental liberty without an overriding compelling state interest;

(3) the Statute unconstitutionally restricts the right of the physicians, nurses, ministers and social workers to practice their professions;

(4) Georgia's Abortion Statute produces discrimination against poor and non-white women in violation of the Equal Protection Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment to the United States Constitution.

PENDING MOTIONS

Arthur K. Bolton, sued in his official capacity as Attorney General of Georgia has moved for an order dismissing the claim against him on the ground that no relief could be granted against him since he is not charged generally with the enforcement, application or administration of the Georgia criminal statutes.

As plaintiffs observe, Article VI, § X, Par. II of the Georgia Constitution, Ga. Code Ann. §2-4502 (1933) requires the Attorney General to represent the State in any civil or criminal case when required by the Governor. Furthermore, he may be required to give the Governor advisory opinions on the abortion statute. Ga. Code Ann. §40-1602 (1933). Finally, the Attorney General is head of the Department of Law, which is vested with [606] authority and jurisdiction in all matters of law relating to governmental departments, boards and agencies. Ga. Code Ann. §40-1614 (1943). The Attorney General has sufficient connection with enforcement of the statutes attacked to justify retaining him as a party.[1] See Arneson v. Denny, 25 F.2d 993 (W.D. Wash. 1928); Jackson v. Colorado, 294 F. Supp. 1065, 1072 (D. Colo. 1968); James v. Almond, 170 F. Supp. 331, 341-342 (E.D. Va. 1959); International Longshoremen's & W. U. v. Ackerman, 82 F.Supp. 65, 124 (D. Haw. 1948), rev'd on other grounds 187 F.2d 860 (9th Cir. 1951); Revins v. Prindable, 39 F. Supp. 708, 710 (E.D. Ill. 1941). Accordingly, that motion is denied.

The Attorney General has also objected to interrogatories which plaintiffs served for answer by a witness, Roger Rochat, M.D. In view of the disposition of this case made below, no ruling on this motion is necessary.

The motion of Ferdinand Buckley, Esquire, for reconsideration of the revocation of his appointment as guardian ad litem will be dealt with in connection with the discussion under MERITS below.

The motion of the National Legal Program on Health Problems of the Poor to submit a brief as amicus curiae is granted.

[1]The Court is also aware that the Attorney General regularly interprets State criminal laws and decisions in published opinions and circulars to State judges and law enforcement officers.

The defendant Lewis R. Slaton, District Attorney of Fulton County, filed motions seeking orders requiring disclosure of plaintiff's identity, granting a continuance for discovery for a reasonable time thereafter, and requiring plaintiff to submit to a [607] physical and mental examination. In view of the reasons for which it is held that the complaint of this plaintiff presented a justiciable controversy, these motions are directed toward obtaining information which is not relevant to the case. Accordingly, they are denied.

JURISDICTION

A. Substantial Constitutional Question.

A three-judge court was convened pursuant to 28 U.S.C.A. §2281 and 2284. Such action is proper where plaintiffs attack the constitutionality of a state statute, raising a substantial constitutional question, and seek equitable relief against its enforcement. Idlewild Bon Voyage Liquor Corp. v. Epstein, 370 U.S. 713, 715 (1962).

Plaintiffs here attack the constitutionality of Ga. Code Ann. §26-1201 et seq. (1969) on the grounds that it infringes rights protected by various Amendments to the United States Constitution. They seek an injunction against enforcement. In light of recent cases on the subject of the Constitutional right to an abortion, this Constitutional question appears substantial. See Roe v. Wade, ... F. Supp. ..... (N.D. Tex., No. 3-3690-B, June 17, 1970); Doe v. Randall, ... F. Supp. ..... (D. Minn., No. 3-70-Civ.-97, May 19, 1970); Doe v. Scott, ... F. Supp. ..... (N.D. Ill., No. 70-C-395, March 27, 1970); Babbitz v. McCann, 310 F. Supp. 293 (E.D. Wis. 1970);

United States v. Vuitch, 305 F. Supp. 1032 (D.D.C. 1969), app. docketed, No. 1155 (February 5, 1970); California v. Belous, 71 Cal. 2d 991, 458 P.2d 194 (1969), cert. den. 397 U. S. 915 (1970).

B. Justiciability.

Standing

By motion to dismiss, Lewis R. Slaton, District Attorney of Fulton County, contends that all plaintiffs other than Mary Doe lack standing to maintain this action. The basis for the claims of these plaintiffs is that because they are not free to perform or counsel the obtaining of abortions, they are unconstitutionally restricted in the practice of their professions.

There are certainly instances in which any of these plaintiffs would have standing to claim a constitutional right to practice his profession, and infringement thereof. For instance, few would dispute that a social worker being prosecuted for conspiracy because he (or she) counselled obtaining an abortion, and referred the client to a physician for the abortion, would have standing to seek a declaratory judgment of his (or her) asserted constitutional right and infringement thereof. See Griswold v. Connecticut, 381 U. S. 479 (1965).

But absent prosecution or indictment, that these plaintiffs do have standing is more difficult to see. Whether their claim is otherwise justiciable is irrelevant. Flast v. Cohen, 392 U. S. 83, 100 n. 21 (1968). The sole issue is whether there is a logical link between the status they assert (physician, nurse) and the claim they seek adjudicated, or between their status and both the type of enactment attacked and the nature of the constitutional infringement alleged. 392 U. S. at 102.

Under either test, all the plaintiffs have standing. As physicians, nurses, ministers or social workers they attack a [609] criminal statute potentially applicable to them, on the grounds that it unconstitutionally restricts their right to practice. Accordingly, the motion to dismiss for lack of standing is denied.

Collision of Interests

Article III of the United States Constitution limits the jurisdiction of the federal courts to cases and controversies. And it is well established that in actions for declaratory judgments, a District Court may not render an advisory opinion on the constitutionality of a state statute. Rather there must be "exigent adversity," an actual controversy in which the constitutionality of the statute is drawn into question in a truly adversary context. See Golden v. Zwickler, 394 U. S. 103, 108 (1969); Poe v. Ullman, 367 U. S. 497 (1961); United Public Workers of America v. Mitchell, 330 U. S. 75, 89 (1947).

Most akin to the instant case is Poe v. Ullman, 367 U. S. 497 (1961). There, a married couple, a married woman and their physician sought a declaratory judgment that Connecticut's statutes prohibiting the use of contraceptive devices and the giving of medical advice in the use of such devices violated plaintiffs' Fourteenth Amendment rights, depriving them of life and liberty without due process of law. None of the plaintiffs had been indicted or prosecuted under the statutes. There had been only one recorded prosecution for violation of the statutes in the seventy-five years since their enactment, and that single instance occurred twenty years before the declaratory judgment action was brought. The Supreme Court suggested that the lack of a pending prosecution or immediate threat of such prosecution against the particular plaintiffs made the claims non-justiciable, [610] citing United Public Workers of America v. Mitchell, 330 U. S. 75 (1947). 367 U. S. at 501. But the Justices went on to find that the lack of recorded prosecutions, the unchallenged, open, ubiquitous public sales of contraceptive devices showed a deeply embedded State policy against enforcement, amounting to a tacit agreement not to prosecute violators of the statutes. The majority therefore held:

> "It is clear that the mere existence of a state penal statute would constitute insufficient grounds to support a federal court's adjudication of its constitutionality in proceedings brought against the State's prosecuting officials if real threat of enforcement is wanting." 367 U. S. at 507.

However, these three cases seem precedent for the proposition that in the absence of a pending or threatened indictment or prosecution of the particular plaintiffs bringing a declaratory judgment action, a federal court cannot consider the constitutionality of the challenged criminal statute.

However in 1968, the Supreme Court decided Epperson v. Arkansas, 393 U. S. 97 (1968), in which a public school teacher argued that the Arkansas statute prohibiting the teaching of evolution was unconstitutional. There was no pending or threatened indictment or prosecution against the teacher. There was no record of any prosecutions under the challenged statute. The teacher's dilemma was solely that (1) the new biology textbooks she was supposed to use in the approaching term contained a chapter on evolution, and (2) her action for a declaratory judgment in state court, granted on the trial level, had been reversed by [611] the Arkansas Supreme Court. The United States Supreme Court majority reached the merits and reversed the decision of the Arkansas Supreme Court in an opinion which summarily brushed aside the question of justiciability. 393 U. S. at 101-102. Apparently, then, the majority felt that the appeal presented a "substantial controversy . . . of sufficient immediacy and reality." Golden v. Zwickler, 394 U. S. 103, 108 (1969).

In the instant case, the plaintiff Mary Doe alleges that having properly applied to the Abortion Committee of Grady Memorial Hospital for a legal therapeutic abortion allowed by Ga. Code Ann. §26-1202 (1969), she was denied an abortion solely on the grounds that her present situation did not come within the terms of Ga. Code Ann. §26-1202(a)(1)(1969).

Georgia's Abortion Act defines a criminal abortion as the act performed by a person who administers a substance or uses an instrument or other means with intent to produce a miscarriage or abortion. Ga. Code Ann. §26-1201 (1969). However, Ga. Code Ann. §26-1202-(a) establishes three circumstances under which an abortion shall not be considered a criminal abortion. And Ga. Code Ann. §26-1202(b) (1969) prescribes procedure which must be followed if an abortion is to be authorized by or performed under 1202(a).

Ga. Code Ann. §26-1202(b)(1969) provides in relevant part:

"No abortion is authorized or shall be performed under this section unless each of the following conditions is met:

(6) The performance of the abortion has been approved in advance by a committee of the medical staff of the hospital in which the operation is to be performed. This committee must be one established and maintained in accordance with the standards promulgated by the Joint Commission on the Accreditation of Hospitals, and its approval must be by a majority vote of a membership of not less than three members of the hospital's staff; the physician proposing to perform the operation may not be counted as a member of the committee for this purpose.

Thus, the denial of plaintiff's application for an abortion, on the grounds alleged, was not the decision of a private physician declining to render professional services, occasioned by the mere existence of Georgia's Abortion Act. The statute confers upon the hospital committee power to grant or deny abortions. A decision denying an application for abortion on the ground that the woman's situation does not fall within one of the three enumerated exceptions is an exercise of that power, which allegedly violated plaintiff's constitutional rights. To this extent then, this statute has been invoked against the plaintiff Mary Doe, causing an alleged constitutional deprivation. Here, there has been actual interference with a claimed constitutional right by the decision of a body which the State has vested [613] with power to grant or deny legal abortions. These circumstances put plaintiff and the defendants on opposite sides of a very real and lively controversy, amenable to judicial resolution.

Accordingly, it appears that May Doe's complaint, in this context, presents a justiciable controversy. Since the claims of the other plaintiffs do not stand in such a posture, the Attorney General's motion to dismiss must be granted to that extent.

C. Exhaustion.

There is no merit to the defendant Slaton's motion to dismiss for failure to exhaust state remedies. It does not appear that there are any administrative remedies for the denial by a hospital committee of an application for an abortion. And however desireable such a requirement might be for orderly judicial administration, there is no requirement that a litigant in federal court exhaust state judicial remedies, where he is asserting a claim in proceedings other than habeas corpus involving a subject over which the federal and state courts have concurrent jurisdiction. As will appear below, the instant case does not involve granting injunctive relief.

THE MERITS

Plaintiff asserts that certain cases leading up to and following Griswold v. Connecticut, 381 U. S. 479 (1965) establish a Constitutional right to privacy broad enough to encompass the right of a woman to terminate an unwanted pregnancy in its early stages, by obtaining an abortion. See Stanley v. Georgia, 394 U.S. [614] 557 (1969); Loving v. Virginia, 388 U. S. 1 (1967); Skinner v. Oklahoma, 316 U. S. 535 (1942); Olmstead v. United States, 277 U. S. 438, 478 (1928) (disenting opinion of Mr. Justice Brandeis); Pierce v. Society of Sisters, 268 U. S. 510 (1925); Meyer v. Nebraska, 262

U. S. 390 (1923). While the Court agrees that the breadth of the right to privacy encompasses the decision to terminate an unwanted pregnancy, we are unwilling to declare that such a right reposes unbounded in any one individual. Rather, we are of the view that although the state may not unduly limit the reasons for which a woman seeks an abortion, it may legitimately require that the decision to terminate her pregnancy be one reached only upon consideration of more factors than the desires of the woman and her ability to find a willing physician.

In Griswold v. Connecticut, 381 U. S. 479 (1965), the Supreme Court held that the decision to use contraceptive devices is an aspect of a relationship lying within a penumbral zone of privacy created by several fundamental constitutional guarantees, and that a state law forbidding the use of such devices unduly invades that area of protected freedoms with maximum destructive effect upon that relationship. 381 U. S. at 485. In a concurring opinion, Mr. Justice Goldberg differed with the majority only to the extent of stipulating that the right to marital privacy is encompassed in his concept of personal liberty because of the Ninth Amendment, rather than because of penumbral emanations of specific constitutional guarantees.

For whichever reason, the concept of personal liberty embodies a right to privacy which apparently is also broad enough to include the decision to abort a pregnancy.[2] Like the decision [615] to use contraceptive devices, the decision to terminate an unwanted pregnancy is sheltered from state regulation which seeks broadly to limit the reasons for which an abortion may be legally obtained. However, unlike the decision to use contraceptive devices, the decision to abort a pregnancy affects other interests than those of the woman alone, or even husband and wife alone.

[2]We see no connection between this theory and the claimed unlimited right of a woman "to use her body in any way she wishes" read into Griswold by some. There are obvious limitations to the latter such as self abuse, e.g. disease, drugs, suicide, etc. and the rights of others in which the state clearly has an interest. Any such theory in its ultimate is flatly rejected.

Once conception takes place and an embryo forms, for better or for worse the woman carries a life form with the potential of independent human existence.[3] Without positing the existence of a new being with its own identity and federal constitutional rights, we hold that once the embryo has formed, the decision to abort its development cannot be considered a purely private one affecting only husband and wife, man and woman.

A potential human life, together with the traditional interests in the health, welfare and morals of its citizenry under the police power, grant to the state a legitimate area of control short of an invasion of the personal right of initial decision.

The whole thrust of the present Georgia statute[4] is to [616] treat the problem as a medical one. Such approach

[3]This view of the impact of conception on the decision not to have children implies that the distinction between a quick and unquick fetus, and even that between embryo and fetus is not relevant here.
And since the Court does not postulate the existence of a new being with federal constitutional rights at any time during gestation, the motion of Mr. Ferdinand Buckley for reconsideration of the order revoking his appointment as guardian ad litem for the embryo (or fetus) is denied. Mr. Buckley's motion to intervene in such capacity is also denied. However, he has the Court's appreciation for his participation in this litigation as amicus curiae.

[4]Apparently patterned after the American Law Institute, Model Penal Code §230.3 (Proposed Official Draft, 1962).

is reasonable and seemingly sound inasmuch as medical practitioners are in the best position by virtue of training to judge concurrently the basis as well as the risk inherent in such a decision. In this respect, the state moreover has a legitimate interest in seeing to it that the decision—personal and medical—is not one undertaken lightly and without careful consideration of all relevant factors, whether they be emotional, economic, psychological, familiar or physical. For example, the legislature might require any number of conditions such as consultation with a licensed minister or secular guidance counselor as well as the concurrence of two licensed physicians or any system of approval related to the quality and soundness of the decision in all its aspects. It certainly has a clear right to circumscribe a decision made by a woman alone or by a woman and a single physician and to guard against the establishment of transient "abortion mills" by the occasional opportunistic or unethical practitioner and the concomitant dangers to his patrons and the public. Such controls and requirements, so long as they do not restrict the reasons for the initial decisions and do not violate the Due Process and Equal Protection Clauses of the Fourteenth Amendment, are properly within the sphere of legislative discretion. In that respect, where abortions may be obtained only from licensed physicians and surgeons, and only after psychiatric consultation, the mere fact that physicians and psychiatrists are more accessible to rich people than to poor people, making abortions more available to the wealthy than to the indigent, is not in itself a violation of the Equal Protection Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment to the United States Constitution. Cf. Dandridge v. Williams, 397 U. S. 471 (1970); MacQuarrie v. McLaughlin, 294 [617]

F. Supp. 176 (D. Mass. 1968), aff'd 394. U. S. 456 (1969).

Moreover, there is an overriding interest in the manner of performance as well as the quality of the final decision to abort. Obvious need for control through licensing, sanitation requirements and proper medical standards in the execution of a legal abortion are examples. Again such decisions address themselves to legislative decision based upon informed judgment.

Having decided that the reasons for an abortion may not be proscribed, but that the quality of the decision as well as the manner of its execution are properly within the realm of state control, the present statute must be examined in such light.

Rather than regulating merely the quality of the decision to have an abortion, and the manner of its performance, the Georgia statute also limits the number of reasons for which an abortion may be sought. This the State may not do, because such action unduly restricts a decision sheltered by the Constitutional right to privacy. See Griswold v. Connecticut, 381 U. S. 479 (1965); California v. Belous, 71 Cal. 2d 991, 458 P. 2d 194 (1969), cert. den. 397 U. S. 915 (1970). The question becomes a matter of statutory overbreadth.

Based upon the above, the court finds the following portions of Georgia Code §26-1202 to be in violation of the constitutional rights of petitioner:

A. Section (a) beginning with the word "because" on line 5 and through subsection (a)(3) in its entirety.

B. Section (b) subsection (3) beginning with the word "because" on line 6 and through the end of said subsection.

C. Section (b) subsection (6) in its entirety.

D. Section (c) in its entirety.

There being no showing to the contrary, the court further finds the remainder of said Code §26-1202 to constitute a proper exercise of state power within the context of this opinion.[5]

An appropriate formal declaratory judgment may be presented upon request of any party.

ABSTENTION

It is recognized that there is no pending state court proceeding against which the injunction prayed by plaintiff would operate. Nevertheless, the request for injunctive relief is denied, on the same basis as such a prayer would be denied were a state proceeding actually in progress:

> ". . . the vindication of the defendant's federal rights is left to the state courts except in the rare situations where it can be clearly predicted . . . that those rights will inevitably be denied by the very act of bringing the defendant to trial in the state court." City of Greenwood v. Peacock, 384 U. S. 808, 828 (1968).

[619] However under the authority of Zwickler v. Koota, 389 U. S. 241 (1967), the Court has proceeded to issue the declaratory relief, in spite of its unwillingness to broadly enjoin future prosecutions under the Act. Accordingly, plaintiff's request for a declaratory judgment is hereby granted. Judgment shall issue in the form described above.

IT IS SO ORDERED.

JUDGMENT

This action came on for hearing on defendants' motions to dismiss on June 15, 1970, before a three-Judge Court composed of Lewis R. Morgan, United States Circuit Judge, Sidney O. Smith, Jr., and Albert J. Henderson, Jr., United States District Judges.

Plaintiffs' request to introduce evidence in proof of allegations of the complaint was denied; defendants' motions to dismiss were treated as motions for summary judgment; argument was heard on the Court's jurisdiction and the constitutional issues raised. The Court issued its opinion on July 31, 1970.

Having determined that a substantial constitutional question was raised, one which created a justiciable controversy between plaintiff Mary Doe and the defendants, over which question this Court has jurisdiction and which it does not abstain from exercising; and

[621] Judgment is hereby entered as follows:

1. The following portions of the Criminal Code of Georgia, §26-1202[1], are declared to be in violation of the constitutional rights of Petitioner Mary Doe, within the context of the aforesaid opinon:

A. Section (a) beginning with the word "because" on line 5 and through subsection (a)(3) in its entirety.

B. Section (b) subsection (3) beginning with the word "because" on line 6 and through the end of said subsection.

C. Section (b) subsection (6) in its entirety.

D. Section (c) in its entirety.

2. The remainder of the said section 26-1202 of the Criminal Code of Georgia is declared to constitute a proper exercise of state power, within the context of the court's opinion.

IT IS THEREFORE ORDERED, that the complaint of all plaintiffs except Mary Doe be dismissed; that the above sections of the Georgia Abortion Statute are declared void on their face for unconstitutional overbreadth; that plaintiffs' application for injunction be dismissed; costs of this cause are taxed against defendants.

The request for stay of this order pending any appeal is denied.

IT IS SO ORDERED.

This the 24th day of August, 1970.

MOTION OF FERDINAND BUCKLEY AS NEXT FRIEND OF UNBORN CHILD OF MARY DOE TO ALTER OR AMEND JUDGMENT

Comes now the unborn child of Mary Doe, acting through his next friend, and pursuant to Rule 59 (e) of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure moves the Court to alter or amend its judgment of August 24, 1970 upon the following grounds:

Said judgment contains no express ruling upon the motion of the unborn child of Mary Doe to intervene in the above styled action.

Said judgment contains no express ruling upon the motion of the guardian ad litem of the unborn child of Mary Doe for reconsideration of this Court's order revoking the appointment of a guardian ad litem for the unborn child of Mary Doe.

Said judgment contains no express ruling upon the prayers contained in the answer and counterclaim which were filed in behalf of the unborn child of Mary Doe prior to revocation of the appointment of the guardian ad litem for the unborn child [623] of Mary Doe, and said answer and counterclaim were never stricken or acted upon by the Court.

WHEREFORE, the unborn child of Mary Doe, acting through his next friend, prays that this Court alter or amend its judgment of August 24, 1970 so as to expressly rule upon the issues raised in the aforesaid motions, answer and counterclaim and that said rulings be in accordance with the prayers of the aforesaid motions, answer and counterclaim.

PETITION OF JANE ROE TO INTERVENE AS PLAINTIFF AND TO CLARIFY AND ENFORCE THE COURTS' OPINION OF JULY 31, 1970

1. Comes now, Jane Roe, and petitions and moves the Court that she be permitted to intervene in this action as a party plaintiff and that Georgia Baptist Hospital, a Georgia corporation with its principal place of business in Atlanta, Georgia, and R. Mitchell Sealey, M.D., in his capacity as Chief of Obstetrical and Gynecological Services of Georgia Baptist Hospital, be intervened as defendants. Plaintiffs' action and the original have a question of law in common and intervention is authorized under Rule 24.

2. Plaintiff seeks a temporary restraining order, preliminary and permanent injunction against the enforcement of Ga. Code Ann. § 26-1201(b), (d) and (e) (hereafter called the "Georgia Abortion Act or Statute"), and enforcing this Court's Opinion in this case dated July 31, 1970.

3. Plaintiff seeks a declaratory judgment that the above sections of the Georgia Abortion Statute are unconstitutional on their face and as applied in that they deprived her and her physician of rights protected by the First, Fourth, Fifth, Ninth and Fourteenth Amendments to the United States Constitution.

4. This Court's jurisdiction has heretofore been invoked under the above constitutional amendments and Title 28, U.S.C. §§ 2281 and 2284; 42 U.S.C. § 1983; and 28 U.S.C. § 2201-2. This is a petition [625] to enforce and clarify the Court's prior order and to further consider the constitutionality of the above section of the Georgia Abortion Statute on its face and as applied.

5. The three judge panel heretofore convened in this case is requested to grant an oral hearing for the presentation of evidence and argument of questions raised in this petition to intervene.

6. Plaintiff files this motion to intervene as a member of the class of pregnant women heretofore represented by Mary Doe and as representative of the members of a class who have been denied use of hospital facilities by abortion committees without due process of law or in denial of equal protection of the law or other constitutional rights.

7. Plaintiff herein referred to as Jane Roe is a natural person employing a fictitious name in order to protect her true identity. It is her belief that the use of her true name would subject her to unfavorable publicity resulting in great embarrassment, ridicule and intimidation. A sealed affidavit containing intervening plaintiff's true identity will be filed with the Court upon direction.

8. Intervening plaintiff is unmarried, presently unemployed and approximately eight to ten weeks pregnant. After consulting with and being counseled by her physician and two psychiatrists, she applied through her doctor to Georgia Baptist Hospital for a therapeutic abortion. There were no medical indications that the abortion should not be performed. The two consulting psychiatrists counseled with her physician that in their best clinical judgment an abortion was necessary. She certified that she was a resident of Georgia and her physician, she believes, completed all documents, papers and procedural requirements of the Georgia law and rules of said hospital. On or about September 11, 1970, she was advised by her physician that her application had been denied. Plaintiff was never furnished a written explanation of the reason for the denial of her request for this medical service.

[626] 9. Intervening plaintiff's attorney sought to have said decision reviewed by an appellate review board of said hospital but was advised by defendant Dr. Sealey that there was no established procedure for appealing decisions of the committee. After much urging, Dr. Sealey, on September 14, 1970, at 7:00 p.m. agreed to bring the matter of establishing an appeal procedure and Jane Roe's case before the Executive Committee of the Obstetrical and Gynecological Service of the hospital on September 15, 1970, at 7:00 a.m. provided Jane Roe or her doctor or her attorney would be present with "her file." Plaintiff was unable to comply because the psychiatric consultation letters had been returned to her and they were in the hands of another physician for presentation to another hospital abortion committee. Plaintiff was not able to obtain her file, neither was her Georgia Baptist physician or her attorney. A copy of all of plaintiff's consultations, certificates, etc., are maintained in her file by Georgia Baptist Hospital and should have been available to the abortion committee or Dr. Sealey and the Executive Committee of his department.

10. Plaintiff was advised by Dr. Sealey that the Georgia Baptist Abortion Committee had adopted the standards of the American College of Obstetricians and Gynecologists as standards which the Committee would apply in deciding whether or not an abortion would be approved. The "ACOG" standards are as follows:

> "Termination of pregnancy by therapeutic abortion is a medical procedure. It must be performed only in a hospital accredited by the Joint Commission on Accreditation of Hospitals and by a licensed physician qualified to perform such operations.
> "Therapeutic abortion is permitted only with the informed consent of the patient and her husband, or herself if unmarried, or of her nearest relative if she is under the age of consent. No patient should be compelled to undergo, or a physician to perform, a therapeutic abortion if either has ethical, religious or [627] any other objections to it.
> "A consultative opinion must be obtained from at least two licensed physicians other than the one who is to perform the procedure. This opinion should state that the procedure is medically indicated. The consultants may act separately or as a special committee. One consultant should be a qualified obstetrician-gynecologist and one should have special competence in the medical area in which the medical indications for the procedure reside.

"Therapeutic abortion may be performed for the following established medical indications:

"a. When continuation of the pregnancy may threaten the life of the woman or seriously impair her health. In determining whether or not there is such risk to health, account may be taken of the patient's total environment, actual or reasonably foreseeable.

"b. When pregnancy has resulted from rape or incest: in this case the same medical criteria should be employed in the evaluation of the patient.

"c. When continuation of the pregnancy is likely to result in the birth of a child with grave physical deformities or mental retardation."

Plaintiff's attorney was advised that if Jane Roe's abortion was denied it was because she did not fall within any of the reasons for abortion within the "ACOG" standards used by the Georgia Baptist Abortion Committee. Plaintiff alleges that said standards are unconstitutionally vague and improperly adopted and applied by said Committee. Plaintiff alleges that such standards violate her constitutional rights and are in conflict with the decision of this Court (Opinion of July 31, 1970).

[628] 11. Because the Committee has denied plaintiff's application for a therapeutic abortion, she has been forced to seek an abortion at another hospital thereby incurring additional expenses for another physician, or seek an abortion termed illegal under Georgia law, or to borrow money in order to obtain a therapeutic abortion outside the State of Georgia involving great expense and inconvenience to her. Said alternatives and procedures are unnecessarily expensive and burdensome requiring a great expenditure of money and time and deny her equal access to medical care and facilities thereby depriving her of due process and equal protection of the laws. Further, said action negates and invades her right of privacy in deciding when and the number of children she will bear such action being in violation of the First, Fourth, Fifth, Ninth and Fourteenth Amendments to the United States Constitution.

12. Plaintiff alleges that under this Court's decision of July 31, 1970, the decision of whether or not one will bear a child is a personal and medical decision to be arrived at by a woman, her physician and two consulting physicians or psychiatrists; that the Abortion Committee of a hospital may not substitute its judgment or values for that of a woman and her physicians and rule that one's reason is not sufficient; that under the Court's decision and the statute as it now remains, the duty of the abortion committee is merely an administrative rather than a judicial function; and that the Court should clarify its prior opinion.

13. The delegation of authority to decide if an abortion may be performed and for what reasons, to hospital abortion committees is an unlawful delegation of state authority thereby depriving plaintiffs and members of her class, of due process and to equal protection of the laws.

14. The statute is unconstitutional on its face and as applied in that it deprives plaintiff of equal access to both public and private medical facilities which on information and belief receive [629] substantial federal and state funding, such equal access being guaranteed by the Fifth and Fourteenth Amendments to the Constitution. Further, said statute is unconstitutional on its face in that it permits an abortion to be performed only in a hospital accredited by the Joint Commission on Accreditation of Hospitals. Plaintiff is advised and alleges that only 82 out of 214 licensed Georgia hospitals have been accredited by said Joint Commission and the statute which limits abortions to accredited hospitals is unconstitutional because it deprives many members of Mary Doe and Jane Roe's class who live in an area served only by a licensed but not accredited hospitals of access to abortion service.

15. The Georgia Abortion Statute provides that Abortion Committees will be established and maintained in accordance with "standards" of the "Joint Commission on Hospital Accreditation" without specifying whether said commission is an existing state or national agency or otherwise fully identifying said Commission. That plaintiffs and other Georgia citizens have no rule making safeguards over a national organization known as the Joint Commission on Hospital Accreditation, of Chicago, Illinois, and the delegation of authority to such an organization to set standards for Georgia abortion committees is a denial of procedural due process. The present commission standards (which will be exhibited by Appendix to the Court) are vague and indefinite and do not delineate rights of patients or physicians with adequate definiteness resulting in many interpretations by various hospital abortion committees and lack of uniformity throughout the state.

16. That plaintiff has incurred medical expenses, hospital bills, attorney's fees, court costs, court reporter fees, etc., as a result of the wrongful action of defendant Georgia Baptist Hospital through its Abortion Committee's unlawful infringement of plaintiff's constitutional rights.

WHEREFORE, plaintiff Jane Roe prays:

1. That she be permitted to intervene as a party plaintiff [630] and member of the class originally represented by Mary Joe and that the named defendants be intervened as such.

2. That the three-judge court previously convened pursuant to 28 U.S.C. §§ 2282 and 2284 hear and determine this proceeding.

3. That a declaratory judgment be issued holding the Georgia Abortion Statute, section 26-1202(b), (d) and (e) to be in violation of the rights of plaintiff as protected by the First, Fourth, Fifth, Ninth and Fourteenth Amendments to the United States Constitution.

4. Pending the hearing and determination of the prayers for permanent relief, the Court enter an interlocutory injunction restraining the original and intervened defendants from denying the use of its operating facilities to plaintiff's physician for the purpose of terminating plaintiff's pregnancy.

5. That a permanent injunction be entered restraining and enjoining the original and intervened defendants from enforcing or in any way effectuating the provisions of Ga. Code Ann. § 26-1202(b), (d) and (e), or otherwise applying said sections in derogation of plaintiff's rights or the rights of members of her class.

6. That plaintiff be awarded damages in an amount deemed appropriate by this Court together with an amount of punitive damages and tax the costs of this cause against the intervened defendants.

7. For such other relief as may be deemed proper by this Court.

Respectfully submitted,

UNITED STATES DISTRICT COURT
NORTHERN DISTRICT OF GEORGIA
ATLANTA DIVISION

MARY DOE, et al., Plaintiffs,
v.
ARTHUR K. BOLTON, et al., Defendants.
CIVIL ACTION NO. 13676

MEMORANDUM IN OPPOSITION OF MOTION TO INTERVENE

Arthur K. Bolton, Attorney General of the State of Georgia, a Defendant in the above-styled cause, opposes the Petition of Jane Roe to intervene filed September 15, 1970, on the following grounds:

(1) The alleged complaint, particularly insofar as it involves the original defendants, is entirely moot. The basis for Petitioner's attempt to intervene was that she allegedly had been denied approval for an abortion by a hospital not party to this cause. This Defendant has been advised by Petitioner's attorney that Jane Roe has subsequently been granted approval for abortion by the hospital attempted to be intervened as an additional party defendant. Consequently, she has no standing as a plaintiff in the instant suit to challenge the Georgia Criminal Abortion Law. The only prayer which might remain is Petitioner's claim for monetary damages, which in no way involves, or is sought to involve, any of the original defendants.

[648] (2) The attempted intervention fails to show a claim of Petitioner which contains a question of law or fact in common with the main action, particularly in light of the described mootness.

Even assuming there is no question of mootness, Petitioner's attempt to intervene is for the purpose of compelling a private hospital, not an original party, to permit the use of its facilities for an abortion to be performed on her. This raises no question of law or fact common to the original action, except as to the constitutional challenge to certain sections of the Law. This, of course, merely attempts to raise again an issue raised, argued, considered, and rejected by the Court in the main cause. Recourse is by appeal, which has already been commenced. No purpose will be served by adding another unknown plaintiff, represented by the same counsel as the original plaintiff, to pursue the same position. There is no allegation or showing that Jane Roe's interests in seeking appellate review of this Court's decision with respect to subsections (b) (d) and (e) of the Law, will not be adequately represented by existing parties. Thus, the "common" question has already been finally litigated in this Court.

With that exception thus disposed of, an analysis of Petitioner's complaint shows that it is against a nondefendant hospital, and, in her view, its chief of obstetrical and gynecological services. Entirely new issues of fact are raised, since her pre-mootness circumstances and Mary Doe's bear nothing in common other than that they both seek an abortion. Entirely [649] new issues of law are raised since the allegations challenged the legality of a private hospital's internal administrative policy based on medically proposed standards, not on the State's criminal statute which was challenged in the principal cause.

Whether or not mootness is considered, other issues, not even collateral to the principal cause but rather totally unrelated to it, are raised by Petitioner's claim for money damages. Both issues of fact and law are obviously injected by this claim, which has no bearing on the original parties and is of no consequence or substantial interest to them. The relationship between non-plaintiff Roe and non-defendants Sealey and Georgia Baptist Hospital contains no nexus with the principal parties. Damages she may have suffered by the Hospital's and Doctor Sealey's actions bear no common interest to the main cause. If collection is her goal, a separate suit should be instituted. It is submitted that she has an adequate remedy at loss for any damages, and the complex questions involved therein are not germane to the instant cause.

(3) The attempted intervention will unduly delay and prejudice the final adjudication of the rights of Defendant and the State of Georgia.

Petitioner has not alleged that she has an absolute right to intervene, and in fact, she does not have such a right. Rule 24(a), Federal Rules of Civil Procedure. Rather, she seeks to intervene pursuant to the permissive provision of Rule 24(b). Defendant recognizes that such interventions are purely discretionary on the part of the Court, and that the Court's principal [650] consideration is whether or not a permissive intervention will unduly delay or prejudice the adjudication of the rights of the principal parties. An intervention at this late point would unduly delay and prejudice the ultimate conclusion of the cause, which has already been finalized by this Court. Appeal to the United States Supreme Court has been commenced by all parties to the principal action. The necessity for further proceedings, pleadings by new parties, hearings, and determinations should intervention be permitted would inevitably delay the final outcome of the cause. As notably recognized in Crosby Steam Gauge and Valve Co. v. Manning, Maxwell & Moore, Inc., 51 F.Supp. 972 (D. Mass. 1943):

> "Additional parties always take additional time. Even if they have no witnesses of their own, they are the source of additional questions, objections, briefs, arguments, motions, and the like which tend to make the proceeding a Donnybrook Fair. Where he presents no new questions, a third party can contribute usually most effectively and always most expeditiously by a brief amicus curiae and not by intervention."

The interests of this Defendant and the State of Georgia in obtaining an ultimate judicial determination of the validity of a State criminal statute of state-wide application at the earliest possible time, are obvious and legitimate. No possible purpose could be served in further delaying that goal. Particularly when it may be construed that the Court has suggested, as here, [651] that further legislative action be taken with respect to the statute in question, it is imperative that that opportunity not be jeopardized by an intervention, such as Jane Roe's, that is not absolutely compelled. It is submitted that the purpose of Rule 24 is to avoid undue delay and expense to all parties. The attempted intervention in this case would not only fail to serve this purpose, but, to the contrary, would aggravate and increase delay and expense to parties totally unaffected by Jane Roe's non-mooted claims.

The Court, in considering permissive intervention, may also consider other factors besides the possible delay cause. The court in Durkin v. Pet Milk Co., 14 F.R.D. 374 (1953), quoting the United States Supreme Court in Allen Calculators, Inc. v. National Cash Register Co., 322 U.S. 137, at 141, noted:

> " 'It is common knowledge that, where a suit is of large public interest, the members of the public often desire to present their views to the court in support of the claim or defense. To permit a multitude of such interventions may result in accumulating proofs and arguments without assisting the court.' " Durkin v. Pet Milk Co., supra, p. 380.

The court in Durkin felt that the attempt to intervene was merely a reassertion of precisely the same claims made in the principal suit, and that when considered with the slight delay that the intervention might occasion, the motion to intervene [652] should be denied. Since in this case, the Court's final decision has already been rendered, the attempt to relitigate the issues which plaintiffs may be dissatisfied with, should be denied.

(4) The attempted intervention is not timely, having been filed about six weeks after the Court's opinion had been rendered on the merits of the principal action, and almost a month after the final judgment had been entered. Intervention after judgment is unusual and not often granted. Turner v. Willard, 157 F.Supp. 451

At this state of the proceedings, and in consideration of her present status as known, Jane Roe has merely a general interest in the subject matter of the litigation. This is insufficient. Jewel Ridge Coal Corporation v. Local No. 6167, United Mine Workers of America (W.D. Va. 1943), 3 F.R.D. 251. She must have an enforceable right. Bernstein v. N. V. Nederlandsche-Amerikaansche Stoomvaart-Maatschappij, 76 F.Supp. 335 (S.D.N.Y. 1948). She has no enforceable right, that under the circumstances, would involve the principal defendants. As to her petition for a declaratory judgment, her rights have already been declared, in the Court's opinion and judgment entered in this cause; and by virtue of the hospital's subsequent approval, her rights have been granted and afforded. Her petition to intervene must present a judiciable controversy. Rose v. Brotherhood of R.R.&S.S. Clerks, 181 F.2d 944 (4th Cir. 1950), cert. den. 340 U.S. 851; Wilson v. Illinois Cent. R. R., 21 F.R.D. 588 (N.D. Ill. 1957), 21 F.R.D. 588.

CONCLUSION

For all of the foregoing reasons, it is respectfully submitted that the petition of Jane Roe be denied and dismissed.

} CIVIL ACTION NO. 13676

MEMORANDUM IN SUPPORT OF THE PETITION OF JANE ROE TO INTERVENE AS PLAINTIFF AND TO CLARIFY AND ENFORCE THE COURT'S OPINION OF JULY 31, 1970

Jane Roe, by and through her attorneys, files this Memorandum in support of her Petition to Intervene and Motion to Clarify and Enforce the Court's Opinion of July 31, 1970, and shows to the Court the following:

I

SUMMARY OF CASE

On September 11, 1970, Jane Roe's application to the Georgia Baptist Hospital Abortion Committee for an abortion was denied. She was advised of this denial by her physician who presented her request to the committee. The abortion was considered "necessary" in his best clinical judgment and that of two psychiatrists consulting with him on this matter. The abortion committee ruled that the abortion was not necessary in accordance with their best medical or clinical judgment and in arriving at that judgment apparently applied the American College of Obstetricians and Gynacologists standards which specifies that abortions may be performed for only three reasons (basically those which this Court declared unconstitutional on July 31, 1970). On the date September 15, 1970, this action was filed seeking a temporary restraining order and declaratory relief that the standards applied by Georgia Baptist Hospital were unconstitutional and further that the portion of the statute requiring approval by abortion committees (and other requirements) was unconstitutional. [663] The decision of the abortion committee was reversed; notice of said reversal was dated September 16, 1970, but not received by plaintiff's attorney until September 23, 1970.[1] Plaintiff's attorney was advised by Jane Roe that her request for an abortion was also turned down by Crawford Long Hospital but she was approved at Piedmont Hospital. Said abortion was scheduled several days ago, however, plaintiff's attorney has been unable to reach Jane Roe to confirm that the abortion has in fact been performed.

[1]The Objections of said Hospital and Dr. Sealy filed by their attorney Mr. Pearce do not accurately reflect what happened at the time of filing. Most of the events are now irrelevant, however, it is implied that counsel acted unreasonably or improperly. Notice of plaintiff's intent to file this proceeding was given Dr. Sealey September 14th and Mr. Pearce on the 15th prior to 10:00 a.m., said petition and request for TRO to be presented to Judge Smith at noon on the 15th. Mrs. Hames did receive a call from Mr. Pearce that the decision had been reversed and advised he would be available to come talk with Judge Smith about same. After Judge Smith set an in-chambers conference at 1:45 p.m., Mr. Pearce was called; he had "left the office for the day." Unsigned papers were mailed Mr. Pearce on an informal basis since copies of all papers had been furnished the clerk for service by the Marshall. The members of the Abortion Committee were not named as parties because Georgia Baptist has a rotating com-

The status of this matter, in all probability, is that Jane Roe has received an abortion; however, that does not moot other requests and allegations of the petition to clarify the Opinion of the Court. Plaintiff seeks a declaratory judgment that Ga. Code Ann. Sec. 26-1201 (b), (d) and (e) are unconstitutional. She alleges that she is a member of the class of pregnant women heretofore represented by Mary Doe and she is representative of a class of persons who have been denied use of hospital facilities by abortion committees without due process of law and in denial of equal protection of the laws. She further requests that the Court clarify its opinion of July 31, 1970, as to the role of abortion committees under the statute if the Court refuses to declare the remaining sections of said law unconstitutional.

The Attorney General asserts that this is an attempt to relitigate issues argued, raised, considered and rejected by the Court in the main cause. Plaintiff's attorney would merely state that in the original case an effort was made to have the court consider evidence on the matters of [664] due process and equal protection problems in the statute; however, the Court saw fit to refuse to hear any evidence on these arguments. For that reason, plaintiff Mary Doe did not have her "full day in Court" and intervenor Jane Roe, having suffered at the hands of the remaining portion of the statute, now seeks her day in Court to litigate the unlitigated issues and to seek enforcement and clarification of the Court's Opinion. First, the two procedural questions raised will be discussed, namely, intervention and clarification of the opinion.

mittee and Mr. Pearce has refused to advise the names of physicians who sat on the committee.

II

A PETITION TO INTERVENE UNDER RULE 24 OF THE FEDERAL RULES OF CIVIL PROCEDURE IS PROPER FOR INTERVENTION AFTER JUDGMENT.

Intervention is authorized as a matter of right by Rule 24(a)(2), F.R.C.P, or as a matter of permission by Rule 24(b)(2). Intervention of right, Rule 24(a) provides:

> Upon timely application any one shall be permitted to intervene in an action: . . . or (2) when the representation of the applicant's interest by existing parties is or may be inadequate and the applicant is or may be bound by a judgment in the action;

The rule permitting intervention as a matter of right is to be liberally construed. See United States v. C. M. Lane Life-Boat Co., Inc., 25 F. Supp. 411 (1938) and Twentieth Century Fox Film Corp. v. Jenkins, 7 F.R.D. 197 (1947). The present applicant for intervention, Jane Roe, is bound by the Judgment in this Court dated July 31, 1970, which held:

> There being no showing to the contrary, the court further finds the remainder of said Code Sec. 26-1202 to constitute a proper exercise of state power within the context of this opinion.[5]

Foot note "5" reads as follows:

> [5]It is not thereby implied that those provisions constitute the only or best means of state control. On the whole, the present system appears unnecessarily cumbersome, a potential hazard under due process and equal protection considerations.

The "remainder" of said Code are those which have operated to deprive Jane Roe of the benefits of the court's opinion that portions of the Georgia Abortion Statute were unconstitutional. That is, the requirements [665] of Sections (b), (d) and (e) deny her due process, equal protection of the laws and infringe upon her right of privacy. Unless Intervenor, as a member of the class represented by Mary Doe, is permitted to intervene, her interests may not be represented by existing parties or said representation will not be adequate. Since the filing of the petition by Mary Doe, the "law" in Georgia relating to abortions has substantially changed. Before the Court's decision of July 31, 1970, a physician and two consultants applied to an abortion committee for approval of an abortion; before the abortion could be approved, the committee had to perform an administrative-judicial function and decide if the statutory criteria had been met, that is one of three permitted reasons was present. The Court's opinion sets forth that the designation of reasons is unconstitutional but left the requirements for residency, approval of three physicians, performance in a licensed-accredited hospital, and approval by an abortion committee of said hospital. The statute as it remains provides that the criminal abortion proscription does not apply > to an abortion performed by a physician duly licensed to practice medicine and surgery pursuant to Chapter 84-9 or 84-12 of the Code of Georgia of 1933, as amended, based upon his best clinical judgment that an abortion is necessary. (b) No abortion is authorized or shall be performed under this section unless each of the following conditions is met: . . . (5) The performance of the abortion has been approved in advance by a committee of the medical staff of the hospital in which the operation is to be performed. This committee must be one established and maintained in accordance with the standards promulgated by the Joint Commission on the Accreditation of Hospitals, and its approval must be by a majority vote of a membership of not less than three members of the hospital's staff; the physician proposing to perform the operation may not be counted as a member of the committee for this purpose.

[666] Jane Doe asserts that Mary Doe does not adequately represent the interests of pregnant women members of their class in view of the change in the law and in view of the change in the role of the abortion committees provided for under the statute. The role of the abortion committee is unclear and the procedural requirements of the remainder of the statute place an undue hardship on pregnant women seeking an abortion and subject them to the confused role of the committees which was not present in the main action. The role of the committee is discussed later, however, the foregoing is set forth to demonstrate that the interests of pregnant woment of Georgia today may not be fully and adequately represented in the main action in view of the present state of the law and certainly they are affected substantially by said Judgment and may be bound thereby. For these reasons, Jane Doe should be permitted to intervene as a matter of right. If intervention is not deemed a matter of right, then Jane Roe should be permitted to intervene under Rule 24(b)(2) because her claim and the main action have questions of law or fact in common. This intervention is discretionary and may be permitted if it will not unduly delay or prejucide the rights of the original parties. Jane Roe is in no way attempting to delay the appeal in this case. This portion of the proceeding may be considered ancillary or severed from the main cause and may be consolidated with the main action during appeal. Intervention after judgment has often been held timely when used to enforce rights conferred in the original action's judgment. Jane Roe originally sought to enforce rights under the Court's Opinion of July 31, 1970, and now seeks a declaration that procedures of the abortion committee denied her due process, equal protection, etc., and that the remainder of said statute infringe her constitutional rights.

In deciding timeliness, the Court should consider not only the period of time that has elapsed and the fact that Judgment has been entered, but should take into consideration the circumstances leading to the necessity for intervention, including the fact that Jane Roe had been denied the benefits of the Judgment of this Court. In Pellegrino v. [667] Nesbit, 203 F.2d 463 (9th Cir. 1953), intervention after judgment was allowed because the court found that it had become necessary only after judgment. Only then did it become clear that the original parties action would not protect intervenor's rights adequately by filing notice of an appeal.

Similarly, in Wilson v. City of Paducah, 100 F.Supp. 116, 118 (W.D. Ky. 1951), judgment was entered in favor of two Negro plaintiffs seeking entrance into college. Later two other Negroes who were subsequently denied entrance were permitted to intervene as members of the original class. The Court held that "intervention after entry of judgment was permissible to members of the class in whose behalf the action was originally filed, even though such intervenors were not specifically named as parties in the original action." Citing System Federation No. 91, Rwy. Employees v. Reed, 180 F.2d 991 (6th Cir. 1950). More recently, this Court has twice permitted intervention after judgment by non-named members of the original class of plaintiffs. In Hunter v. Allen, Civil Action No. 11328 (N.D. Ga), intervenor George Dean, by order dated February 19, 1969, was allowed to intervene after judgment and to receive damages for civil contempt against the original defendants. Dean complained that the original defendants, the mayor and the police chief of the City of Atlanta, had continued to enforce provisions of the City Code against him after such had been held unconstitutional in the original action. See also Wilson v. Kelley, Civil Action No. 11647 (N.D. Ga.) conferring upon intervenors the benefits of an earlier prison desegregation decree and granting them civil contempt damages against two non-named members of the class of defendants (June, 1970).

Intervenor Jane Roe asserts that the petition for intervention and clarification is a proper procedural vehicle to obtain the benefits of the Court's prior opinion and to seek clarification thereof.

As to the timeliness of the application to clarify the Court's opinion, it should be noted that at the time of filing the request to [668] clarify the 30 day time for appeal provided by the Federal Rules had not expired. (Final Judgment entered August 24, 1970, petition filed September 15, 1970). Hence the judgment had not yet acquired the degree of immutability normally associated with a final judgment. It appears from the following that there is considerable latitude within said period to proceed with respect to the judgment:

> The Fifth Circuit has announced what may be a somewhat broader doctrine that, at least in non-jury cases, the judge on his own motion may grant rehearing at any time prior to expiration of the time for appeal. (Citing McDowell v. Celebrezze, 310 F. 2d 358 (2d Cir. 1955); Gila River Ranch, Inc. v. United States, 368 F. 2d 354 (9th Cir. 1966) Schildhaus v. Moe, 335 F. 2d 529, 531 (2d Cir. 1964)). If the judge can do this on his own motion, he surely can do it on the motion of counsel. 3A W. Barron & A. Holtzoff, Federal Practice and Procedure, Sec. 1553 at 28 (Supp. 1968).

In this respect, it should also be noted that the Court has inherent power to effectuate its judgments. If confusion has resulted from a judgment, and intervenor asserts that it has, then a motion to enforce or clarify judgment is a proper procedure and is aimed at securing a just, speedy and inexpensive determination of the problems. Federal Rules of Civil Procedure, Rule 1. It is presumed that the defendants herein are urging that Jane Roe must file a separate action to obtain benefit of the judgment in this case. This was an argument asserted in the United States Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit in Mary Doe, et al, v. General Hospital, ... F.2d ..... (May 15, 1970, No. 24,011). There hospital officials failed to abide by a lower court's decision in abortion cases:

> Our primary concern is not the good faith of the city and hospital officials, but the deprivation of medical care suffered by indigent patients. This class action asserts the rights of people who have been overwhelmed by poverty, wretched medical care, unemployment, inadequate education, substandard housing, and a [669] cluster of poverty-related problems. If every poor person must bring a law> suit each time her rights are infringed either by insensitivity or by the ignorance of city and hospital officials, all will be effectively deprived of those rights. There are limits to the ability of the most able volunteer counsel to maintain the state of alert watchfulness — and the caseload — that would be necessary to protect against wrongs on such a scale.

It is not the intention of Jane Roe or her attorneys to burden this Court's already crowded calendar, however, it is earnestly urged (by Mary Doe and Jane Roe's volunteer counsel), that the Court clarify its opinion as to the procedural aspects of the statute as it remains. A separate action involving Polly Poe vs. The Fulton-DeKalb Hospital Authority d/b/a Grady Memorial Hospital is being filed in this Court. That action seeks relief for Polly Poe and additionally seeks to adjudicate the role of the abortion committee and the constitutionality of the procedural requirements left in the statute. If this Court is inclined to dismiss this action, it is requested that the petition to intervene be severed and treated as a separate suit.

THE ABORTION STATUTE AS IT REMAINS PROVIDES NO PROCEDURAL DUE PROCESS FOR WOMEN SEEKING ABORTIONS; THE ROLE OF THE ABORTION COMMITTEE IS VAGUE AND AMBIGUIOUS AND IS AN UNLAWFUL DELEGATION OF STATE AUTHORITY.

As set forth above, the Court left the procedural requirements of the Georgia Abortion Statute in the law. In order to obtain an abortion, one must be a resident of Georgia, one must convince her physician that an abortion is necessary, they must convince an abortion committee of a hospital that it is necessary and the abortion may be performed only in an accredited-licensed hospital. This, the court observed, appears "unnecessarily cumbersome, a potential hazard under due process and equal protection considerations." This is exactly the problem and is operating to deny many women abortions and denying many physicians the right to render medical services to their patients that they deem necessary in their best clinical judgment.

The procedure requires that a woman be able to juggle physicians and hospitals into a winning combination—the odds are probably no better [670] than those for a line of lemons on a Las Vegas slot machine. Assume, however, that Jane Roe sees a physician and in his best clinical judgment he deems an abortion necessary and after two consulting opinions which concur, her case is presented to the abortion committee. What are the problems then? Here, Jane Roe's case demonstrates what can actually happen. A physician submits a written request to the abortion committee—there is no time for presentation of cases on an oral basis because of the time it would require not only from the proposer's stand point but from the stand point of the committee members. The committee then must approve. Query, what type of approval is necessary. Under the statute as originally written by the legislature, the abortion committee had to decide whether one of the three reasons for abortions was present. Now there are no reasons—what is the role of the committee. The committees are acting in many different ways over the state. For example, Georgia Baptist Hospital abortion committees had been using the ACOG standards according to Dr. Sealey. It should also be noted that the General Counsel for the Medical Association of Georgia and the Georgia Hospital Association issued an opinon (which was circulated over the State) which defined the role of the committee to be the same as the woman's physicians and consultants, i.e., the committee must find that an abortion is necessary in their best clinical judgment. THUS—Jane Roe and the other women of Georgia must convince an administrative arm of the State without an opportunity to appear before the committee, or an opportunity to be heard. Her fate is guided by the written requests and opinions of her physicians. Can it be really said that the members of the committee, without seeing the patient or examining her or discussing the matter with her, is in a position to substitute their judgment for that of the three physicians who have seen her. There is no appeal from the decision of the committee; the woman and her physician have no recourse. It might be said that she could go into court and seek to enforce her right, but this is no practical answer to the problems of the Mary Doe's of Georgia. Those people who are turned down generally do not have the resources to seek legal assistance to pursue their rights. It has been advanced that one may go to another hospital—that is precisely what Jane Roe did—she went to three. It is frequently stated that one may go out of state—explain that to an indigent woman who has no money to go from Grady to Georgia Baptist much less Atlanta to New York!

It is submitted that the abortion committee is not needed in the statutory structure. There is no other medical procedure which requires the concurrence of at least five physicians. If all the practice of medicine had to be submitted to this procedure our residents would die before treatment was available—just as today, the time in which one may obtain the needed medical service (an abortion), passes before the approval can be obtained. If the abortion committee has any role to play, it should be a purely administrative role. They should not be permitted to substitute their judgment for the judgment of the woman's physician. They should check to see that all paper work has been completed, that there are no contra-medical indications, that hospital facilities may be allocated within the time in which they are needed, that a physician proposing an abortion is qualified to render the service and other matters of an administrative nature. They should not have a veto power over the physician's judgment. If the abortion committee is left in the law, its role should be limited to an administrative function. If its role is not limited, then there should be an appeal procedure whereby a woman and her physician may obtain review. Absent such a procedure, there is certainly an absence of fair play and due process.

It should be noted here that the committee procedures and practices vary from hospital to hospital. At Georgia Baptist the committee is a rotating one among staff members of the OB-GYN department. Thus, if the committee is made up of persons who have moral or ethical objections to abortions, the woman is subject to this subjective criteria without a remedy. Such is the case with the physician. Who is to insure that the committee does not act arbitrarily? This Court, nor these attorneys, certainly may not be the watch dog of the committees. If the role of the committee is an administrative one, women will not be subjected to the caprice of anti-abortion members and their right of privacy will not thereby be invaded.

Again, the alternatives of poor women who are members of Mary Doe's class. If she is turned down by Grady Memorial Hospital, she has but two alternatives. First, she may carry the baby to term and suffer the burdens of pregnancy and an unwanted child or place the child for adoption. These alternatives place extreme psychological and social burdens on the individuals involved, mothers and children, and are a major source of psychiatric problems of our population today. The other alternative is to seek out an illegal abortionist. This forces the woman to take her life to the hands of a non-medical person for possible slaughter. This is what is still happening in our state and in our City. Women are turning to illegal abortions; they are getting infections and must be treated then to save their lives. Would it not be a better allocation of hospital dollars and facilities to perform the abortion rather than treat the botched up job? A woman determined to get an abortion will certainly resort to illegal means if she has no money and is denied a safe, medical one.

Abortion committees frequently refuse to give reasons why an abortion is turned down. If there are contrary medical indications, a woman should certainly be told. If the facilities are not available, she should be told. The reason women are being turned down is they are healthy women who do not fall within any of the three reasons previously authorized under the statute. This certainly smacks of a denial of equal protection of the laws—if one is healthy, she cannot obtain an abortion. If one is unhealthy, her chances are better. If an opportunity to prove this assertion were given, Plaintiffs assert that the evidence would show that abortions are being performed only where the prior standards are met. Once an institution seeks to perform abortions, that service must be granted equally. See United States v. Vuitch, 305 F. Supp. 1032 (D.D.C. 1969); and Mary Doe v. General Hospital, supra.

If given an opportunity to present evidence, it would show that women over the state are being denied equal protection because the statute permits abortions only in accredited hospitals. There are only 82 of 214 Georgia licensed hospitals accredited in Georgia, thereby depriving the poor resident of a rural county access to such service particularly [673] in the situation where the county hospital, even though licensed by the state, is not accredited by the Joint Commission on Hospital Accreditation. Thus, if indigent hospital care is available only at a non accredited hospital, the statute serves to deny those women residents of that county of abortion services. Travel, even assuming alternate facilities would be available in some other city, to another city can effectively make such a service unavailable. The requirement that an abortion be performed in an accredited hospital denies many women needed medical services and deprives physicians of the right to practice their profession.

The accreditation process is currently carried out by the Joint Commission on Hospital Accreditation, Inc., a private group situated at 645 North Michigan Avenue, Chicago, Illinois 60611. The Commission is self-appointed and subject to no government check and balances or governmental regulation. The Commission promulgates Standards for hospitals to meet to attain accreditation. There have been six differing versions and a 111 page massive revision is now pending. Apparently the Georgia abortion law refers to whatever version is currently in force even though this is not clear. These Standards are changed from time to time and such standards are subject to no rule making procedures which would safe guard residents of Georgia subject to its requirements. Not only is it an unlawful delegation of State authority to abortion committees to decide when abortions will be granted, it is an unlawful delegation of authority to the Commission to give them power to set standards for abortions in Georgia. This gives the Commission power to legislate reasons for abortions in Georgia. Secondly, numerous provisions in the current Standards are arbitrary and have no relationship to health needs of a patient seeking an abortion. For example, a hospital must be in operation for twelve months before it can be accepted for accreditation. This excludes many new facilities, for example Northside Hospital in Atlanta, Georgia. A hospital must have radiology facilities and emergency care for mass casualties. These are unreasonable requirements especially in view of the fact that licensed hospitals perform other surgery and are not required to be accredited for those procedures.

Thus, it appears that the court's refusal to hear evidence on the due process and equal protection objections to the statute has left many difficult practical and legal questions. If this court is not inclined to grant a hearing on the remaining constitutional problems under the statute, it is Intervenor's request that this petition be consolidated with the Polly Poe vs. The Fulton-DeKalb County Hospital Authority (Grady Memorial Hospital), Civil Action No. ....., for determination of the issues presented herein.

Respectfully submitted,

JUNE 15, 1970

oOo

JUDGE MORGAN: Gentlemen, I call the case of Mary Doe, et al, versus Arthur K. Bolton, et al. Who represents Mary Doe?

MRS. HAMES: Your Honor, I am Margie Hames. I am one of a team of attorneys. This is Tobiane Schwartz on my right and Mrs. Elizabeth Rindskopf on my left, and we represent all the plaintiffs.

JUDGE MORGAN: All right. Who represents the defendants?

MRS. HAMES: We have asserted several different rights on behalf of different groups of plaintiffs. The first right on behalf of Mary Doe being the First and Ninth Amendment right of privacy and right to control her own body, that is to determine for herself whether or not she will have an abortion, seek an abortion. The right on behalf of the doctors is their right to practice medicine in accordance with their [679] best medical judgment. It is their claim that they are being deprived of this right without due process by virtue of the Georgia abortion statute since it is vague and indefinite and imposes a cumbersome procedural requirement on the process of getting abortions for their patients; and further, that there is an unlawful delegation of authority to the abortion committees, state authorities, to the abortion committees since they are the arm that interprets the law. Ministers, social workers and nurses claim that their rights, First Amendment rights of association and free speech have been infringed.

JUDGE SMITH: Mr. Buckley, how important is it that you have the legal status of guardian ad litem? To me that question is really wound up with the final question, and that is the balancing of rights between the mother and the unborn child. If the law is that the unborn child has rights, then undoubtedly that unborn child should be represented. If the law is that the unborn child does not have rights, then there is no need for representation. So, I think the ultimate answer to the legal question of whether there should be officially a guardian ad litem is all tied up in the problems on the merits.

MR. BUCKLEY: I agree with the Court in this sense, as Your Honor suggests, if the Court decided there [686] isn't any legal entity, obviously you wouldn't need a guardian ad litem. On the other hand, the need of someone to advocate and certainly uphold procedure for litigation is an adversary type of proceeding, but the need is for someone to try to help the Court to be certain that it has considered all issues that have any conceivable bearing on the matter.

JUDGE SMITH: Let me stop there. All this business about witnesses and discovery, as I read the attack of the plaintiff, it is on the statute as written. It is a facial attack on the statute and an all-out broad attack on the facial, alleged facial unconstitutionality of the statute. I don't see what we need any evidence for to reach that question.

MR. BUCKLEY: It is a facial attack in part, but is also, as I understand the pleadings and the evidence, it is also an attack based on particular facts. Now, one of the facts that would seem to me to be of vital importance in this case is the stage of pregnancy, if the alleged plaintiff is, in fact, pregnant. Every case that is cited in the plaintiff's briefs, certainly the three principal ones, Babbitz, Vuitch and Belous, all involved early pregnancy cases. I can't tell from a reading of the Municipal Court calendar for Georgia cases—maybe I have forgotten, but I don't remember whether those were early pregnancy or not.

JUDGE SMITH: Well, the Georgia law makes no distinction. I think all of these would be covered in the facial attack, and if this is some effort to mute it or something like that, I don't see any point in [689] that.

MR. BUCKLEY: It goes to your jurisdictional point, too, and in other words, this court, as I understand the law, and it is true, you have already asked we submit briefs on this, and I don't want to burden you, but it looks to me like the facts would be relevant to determine whether you have controversy.

JUDGE MORGAN: I was under the impression there wouldn't be any evidence.

JUDGE SMITH: Let's assume there was no controversy. Couldn't there be a controversy shown?

MR. BUCKLEY: Certainly, as Your Honor says, assuming that this Mary Doe or whoever she may be does not have a controversy, then someone else could come along tomorrow. Of course, I would rather the issue be decided now.

JUDGE SMITH: This is my feeling. All these little technicalities about whether the Attorney General enforces a law or not. We just spend a lot of wasted effort on that. Why don't we go on and grope with it either jurisdictionally or on the merits?

JUDGE SMITH: That was my feeling. I see no need for any evidence. I think we have two basic features. One, is there Federal jurisdiction; and if there is Federal jurisdiction, what are the merits. What is the answer on the merits, the question of constitutionality of this statute. I don't see why we ought to spend a lot of time going down these trials that will carry us away from those two central issues, and I think this Court ought to meet those two issues. If we don't have jurisdiction, that ends it. If we have,

* * * * *

JUDGE SMITH: Aren't they all doctors?

MRS. HAMES: Yes, they are.

JUDGE SMITH: As I conceive it, part of this statute is to make a medical decision the test. Now, usually the doctors complain because the Courts are interfering with their right to make a medical decision. Apparently they are saying the opposite.

MRS. HAMES: They are saying that their right to make a medical decision as to advisable medical procedure—in order to do that they must get the consent of two other physicians and then, they must convince a panel of three other physicians who interpret the law.

JUDGE SMITH: There is not a lot of difference in that and the hospital regulations, and they have recommended this hospital regulation as requiring a witness to the operation or approval of it by a committee before certain medical procedure is carried out is lawful and constitutional. This has been true since 1920 in a Texas case.

JUDGE MORGAN: What would you propose to prove by evidence, Mrs. Hames?

MRS. HAMES: We would propose to prove by Dr. Donald Block that in his practice of obstetrics that he has patients who come to him seeking an abortion and [694] that he sends them to psychiatrists and other physicians for consultations and that upon the recommendation of these physicians that is presented to the committee at Georgia Baptist Hospital, I believe is where he is staffed there, and that there is no way to predict what they will do. In some instances they are approved and in some instances they are not approved, and the law is applied in some way unknown to him so that all people who are recommended by three physicians for abortion cannot get it; they must then convince the abortion committee that this is a burdensome procedure, it takes up to five or six weeks and by that time a safe period in which an abortion can be performed is passed, that this is not only replacing his medical judgment with the medical judgments of three other people who never see the patient, by the way.

JUDGE MORGAN: That is set by the statute.

JUDGE SMITH: What does he propose as an alternative?

MRS. HAMES: He proposes that the abortion committee not have control of them.

JUDGE SMITH: Does he propose that he himself alone be able to make that decision?

MRS. HAMES: I would have to ask Dr. Block his [695] personal opinion. We say we propose as a legal matter that the abortion committee is unconstitutional in that it deprives the physicians of their right to practice.

JUDGE SMITH: Is there any question about the statute providing for the committee?

JUDGE MORGAN: Isn't it just facially on the statute as it provides for these 3 physicians? Would evidence help?

MR. BUCKLEY: You might get in some of the argument about how burdensome it is, and how facially burdensome it is might provide some question. They have a psychiatrist who is in the department and the procedures require that he be the one to examine these people, so I think it is suggested in some of the briefs that they have to go looking around for weeks to get an appointment.

JUDGE MORGAN: I mean the statute itself is what we are talking about. I can't see why we can't approach the constitutional question without evidence.

MRS. HAMES: Well, if our allegations are taken as true that it does infringe on the physician's right to practice medicine in accordance —.

JUDGE SMITH: You wouldn't want them to stipulate themselves out of court. If it is taken as true, it infringes on their constitutional right to practice medicine and the case would be over.

BLEED THROUGH

MR. BUCKLEY: Your Honor, if I can't stipulate as [696] Amicus —

JUDGE SMITH: I think you meant to say can your allegations about what is necessary to go through be stipulated as true. Is there any objection to that?

MR. BUCKLEY: Not as stated up to now. It might be that after some evaluation, it might be possible to stipulate.

MR. HIGHT: Your Honor, I think we would have an objection because as stated in the statute itself the doctors can be from a hospital abortion committee instead of, say, five or six doctors, you may have a maximum of four.

JUDGE MORGAN: What does the statute provide for, three doesn't it?

MR. HIGHT: Yes, sir, but it also provides that they can be part of the abortion committee, that you have to have a certain number in the case, some of them are on the abortion committee.

JUDGE MORGAN: What evidence do you plan to present and how many witnesses? What evidence do you plan to present?

MRS. HAMES: I had planned to present Dr. Newton Long who is a member of the abortion committee at Grady Memorial Hospital to testify as to the operations of the abortion committee and how differing opinions [697] in the areas are and how they apply the law.

I had planned to introduce Dr. Hillis James from Macon, Georgia to testify regarding the rules and regulations of the Macon City Hospital which requires a unanimous decision of the abortion committee, which is contrary to law, which says the majority of the committee must approve.

JUDGE MORGAN: I don't follow you on Macon. We are not trying that; the attack is on this.

MRS. HAMES: This would be evidence which shows that Dr. James is deprived of her right to practice medicine by rules and regulations purportedly promulgated to comply with the statute. It is a misinterpretation of the statute.

JUDGE SMITH: Really, I think we are all shadow boxing. If these doctors propose to get up and say that any procedure like this interferes with their right to practice medicine, then I am sure that everybody can agree they would so testify. Isn't this basically what they are saying?

MRS. HAMES: That is correct.

JUDGE SMITH: I think you have two different questions. If a particular hospital has a local regulation that it will not permit an abortion in its institution except under certain rules, that is a [698] different question from what the state statute provides, because hospitals are free to set their own regulations. They can have their abortions elsewhere as far as that institution is concerned.

JUDGE MORGAN: If this court is properly concerned, it is on the question of the constitutionality of this statute and that is what we —

JUDGE SMITH: Is there any problem of assuming that the plaintiff doctors say that the procedure provided for in the state statute interferes with their right to practice medicine as they see fit? Is there any problem?

MRS. BEASLEY: There would be other doctors who would say this is what we do in cases of surgery or others exactly like that, you would have situations where it would become a fact question. So if they are saying that—there is the requirement which we hold is a health requirement to have this procedure of protection to the woman just as well as it is for the child, as far as the health part of it is concerned—if that in and of itself is unconstitutional, no evidence is necessary. However, if they are trying to show that the way it is applied it is burdensome, then evidence would be required. We wouldn't admit that.

JUDGE SMITH: You wouldn't admit it burdensome; I [699] understand your position. Well, is your attack that it is all right like it is, that it is burdensome, or is your attack that it is not all right like it is?

MRS. HAMES: No, we are asserting that the language of the statute is vague and ambiguous and particularly the word "health." I think this requires interpretation of the word —

JUDGE MORGAN: I don't think we are required to show evidence on whether the word is vague. I think this court — I think that is a legal question, as I see it.

JUDGE SMITH: I may be missing something, but I would suggest that if the court finds it necessary to reconvene on the question of whether a particular hospital is not doing it right, which I don't think we have any jurisdiction over as a three judge court, then we can reconvene.

MRS. HAMES: Well, we are not trying — we are not saying that any particular hospital is not doing it right. We are merely pointing out defects in the statute. In addition to the term "health", I think that the doctor's interpretation of the word health is certainly relevant to determine whether or not it is a vague term. For example, is this mental health or physical health?

Also, the term "residence" is one that gives the doctors considerable trouble. There must be a certification by the doctor that the female is a resident of the state. These are areas in which the doctors are placed in position of having to make legal decisions, and their interpretation and the varying interpretations goes to the vagueness or ambiguity of the statute.

JUDGE SMITH: That is what I was driving at a moment ago. They say they are having to make legal decisions when the whole function is to make a medical decision out of it. Do they want somebody else to make the medical decisions for them, is that their position?

MRS. HAMES: No, sir.

JUDGE SMITH: They want to make themselves, this is the whole thing, alone.

MRS. HAMES: No, they do not want a law which delineates only three circumstances under which an abortion may be performed. They want to make the decision whether or not they can perform an abortion on a female based on factors they consider relevant.

BLEED THROUGH

JUDGE SMITH: All right. And that position, I don't think anybody will question, this is what they contend, so they are attacking the statute on its face. [701] I may be missing a part of the problem here, but to me that is it, they say this is an interference with their right to practice medicine, just as they might make an attack on a regulation of a hospital that says they have to have the concurrence of a doctor before they have a Cesarean operation is an interference of their right to practice medicine. You don't need a lot of proof about that, do you?

MRS. HAMES: I believe such a regulation would not have the same standing as the abortion statute in Georgia.

JUDGE SMITH: It may not, but it is the same position.

MR. BUCKLEY: You would have the same standing if it was in a state hospital.

JUDGE SMITH: That is right.

MRS. HAMES: The other question which requires proof is the equal protection argument. Mary Doe has made an argument on behalf of the people in her class that she is denied equal protection of the laws. We plan to introduce statistics to show that poor people are not the ones who get the therapeutic abortions. They are the ones who go to the illegal abortionist and have a resulting health problems from it. The law as applied results in a denial of equal protection of the [702] laws.

JUDGE MORGAN: In other words, you are complaining of procedure violations?

MRS. HAMES: The law as applied or as it exists results in hospitals denying abortions to charity patients.

JUDGE SMITH: Is this the fault of the law?

MRS. HAMES: I think it is, yes; if the law were not on the books I think we would —

JUDGE SMITH: But there is nothing in the law that makes it unequal, is there?

MRS. HAMES: The procedure itself whereby one has to get consultation by other doctors imposes a financial burden, so I guess this is as applied.

JUDGE SMITH: Well, wouldn't that suit be against the person who is not applying it right?

MRS. HAMES: I don't understand who would not be applying it right.

JUDGE SMITH: Well, the normal equal protection case is against some state official or some person acting under color of the state law who is not applying the law to the plaintiff as he or it or whatever the authority is, is applying it to everybody else. That is not in this case as it is framed, as I see it.

MRS. HAMES: Well, it is an issue we have raised. [703] Maybe we have not —

JUDGE SMITH: I know you have pleaded it, but there is nothing on that statute that says a different procedure applies to poor people from rich people; there is nothing in that statute that says that.

MRS. HAMES: But in the operation of the statute which we would show by evidence —

JUDGE SMITH: Sue whoever is not operating properly, this is the point there.

MRS. HAMES: I think to require Mary Doe and poor persons to file suit to get an abortion is placing on her and members of her class an undue burden, and to require every female who is indigent to do this is to deny them of equal protection in and of itself.

JUDGE SMITH: The point I am making is that procedurally I don't think you can raise that question in this kind of suit. I think you have to sue somebody that is not applying the law equally. If the law on its face applies equally, then you have to sue somebody that has not applied it equally, and you haven't done that here. We can wrestle with that, but I am getting worried about the evidence.

JUDGE MORGAN: I think the question comes down to a facial attack on the statute on the Georgia abortion law —

JUDGE MORGAN: As a three judge court, we are going to limit our inquiry initially to two questions. First, the jurisdiction which we have already covered; and second, to the merits of the case. If afterwards this court determines that more evidence is required, then we will reconvene. Otherwise, we feel that the attack can be made, possibly made without any evidence. Are you ready to proceed on the question of the merits of the statute?

MR. HIGHT: If Your Honors please, speaking for defendant Lewis R. Slaton, we haven't had an opportunity to reply to the merits. I believe we got off from counsel to Mr. Buckley's argument. We haven't had a chance to reply to the merits as we feel them to be in the case — I mean, not the merits, but the question as to jurisdiction.

JUDGE MORGAN: You can be permitted to file a [705] brief.

* * * * *

MRS. HAMES: Hames. Do I understand the Court that there will be no evidence on the equal protection question at all?

JUDGE MORGAN: At this time, yes, ma'am, and if it is later determined that it is necessary to have some evidence to pass on this statute, then we will reconvene this court.

MRS. HAMES: Of course, time is of considerable importance in the case, and we have witnesses here today and we would like to dispose of any evidentiary problem. If I could make one more comment about the equal protection matter, and that is that the application of the statute on its face does impose burden on poor people since it requires going to three physicians. This is like the law which permitted all people to appeal their cases to the Court of Appeals but they [706] had to pay for the transcript, and this was held by the Supreme Court in the Edwards v. California case to be a denial of equal protection of poor people. I wanted to make this one further point, that the statute on its face does deny equal protection.

JUDGE SMITH: If you want to go in business, it requires you to call on people to get a license and all that kind of thing, or if you want to avoid the zoning ordinance you have to call on different people.

MRS. HAMES: I don't know that that is a basic constitutional right such as we are asserting here.

JUDGE SMITH: The right to profit.

BLEED THROUGH

MRS. HAMES: One's right to control one's own person, the right to one's life and liberty, those are substantial issues in this case. That was the situation, liberty was a question in the Edwards case. I wanted to make this one point.

JUDGE MORGAN: Edwards was a criminal case in California, as I recall.

JUDGE SMITH: As they use "liberty," they are talking about being locked up. As you are using "liberty," you are saying it is your freedom to do what you want to.

MRS. HAMES: I am talking about life in this case, the right to life, because medical statistics show us [707] that it is safer to have a therapeutic abortion than it is to have natural childbirth. To force a woman to bear a child by natural childbirth increases her risk of death, where if she could have an abortion her risk would be less. That is the basic constitutional right to life that we bring under this case.

MRS. HAMES: I think that I have already stated the arguments on behalf of the doctors, and they contend the vagueness of the statute and the cumbersomeness of the procedure and the interference of their rights to practice medicine. I would like the right to summarize the argument.

* * * * *

MR. HIGHT: . . . The state, as to Mary Doe, is setting forth rules and regulations for Mary Doe, for the unborn child as such, and a means and method to protect doctors that do perform an abortion; and they are regulating the doctors until you come to a medical question. They are saying, this is the procedure that you use, but when we reach a medical question, then that is for the doctors to determine under the statute itself. We feel like this, of course, is proper under Griswold.

JUDGE MORGAN: What about Mary Doe's right to have or not have?

MR. HIGHT: Your Honor, the state at this time is in a position that we don't know why Mary Doe was rejected. Was it because she was not mentally capable of [718] agreeing to an abortion, was it because she was in such a physical condition that she could not medically have an abortion with safety? The state does not know at this time as to Mary Doe.

JUDGE MORGAN: Didn't she allege in the petition why —

MR. HIGHT: No, sir, she alleged she was denied by Grady Hospital abortion committee, and we have no means or knowledge, and we have a motion we filed this morning with the Court we would like for the Court to consider later that we be revealed the identify of Mary Doe if we get into a factual question, and the Court hear evidence so we can properly investigate our case for the defendant Lewis R. Slaton as well as the other defendants.

JUDGE MORGAN: I was under the impression that maybe it was alleged that she had two children, for economic reasons. I thought —

JUDGE SMITH: That is why she wants it, but he is saying he doesn't know why she was denied it.

MR. HIGHT: We don't even know who Mary Doe is and we ask the Court to inform us so we could properly investigate the case.

JUDGE HENDERSON: She also alleges on grounds of her health. Would you like to discuss that on the [719] question?

MR. HIGHT: Yes, we also have filed a motion for a mental and a physical examination of Mary Doe because the state does not know whether Mary Doe is physically or mentally capable of agreeing to an abortion; if she is not, we feel it is incumbent on the court to appoint —

JUDGE HENDERSON: A constitutional question.

MR. HIGHT: — a guardian ad litem.

JUDGE MORGAN: Going to the constitutional question, suppose she is mentally and physically able but she says from an economic standpoint, I can't have it? What would be your contention then? She says, I have a right to, without this statute.

MR. HIGHT: Well, I think —

JUDGE MORGAN: That is a basic attack on the statute as I understand it.

MR. HIGHT: As I think, as Griswold points out, her right to privacy is in the marital state, but she is not in the marital state at this time. She is coming out and asking the court to say, I have a constitutional right at any time to go to a hospital, to go to a doctor and say that I am entitled to an abortion. Now, this is not the private marital state that is referred to in Griswold.

Secondly, Your Honor, the right of the father is involved along here. In Griswold the court did consider the rights of the father. That was the use of contraceptives in the marital relation between husband and wife. The rights of the father was considered in that particular case, and under their theory it would be lost.

Now, secondly, Your Honor, is that if a woman is declared to have a constitutional right to have an abortion as they allege, without any restrictions, this is, in fact, dictating to a doctor as to how he has to practice medicine, because it does not impose a restriction that this may not be medically feasible in your mind, it may be something you feel that as a doctor you cannot give an abortion for, and he may be subject to a suit for infringing on her constitutional rights to an abortion.

JUDGE HENDERSON: You mean if he is asked for it, he has to do it?

MR. HIGHT: Your Honor, I think under what they are alleging is that the hospital as such has to give her an abortion regardless of whether she is able to pay for it, the state and the people are required to pay for an abortion, and this is not like —

JUDGE MORGAN: I didn't interpret it that way.

JUDGE HENDERSON: I don't think they are making that contention.

MR. HIGHT: That's what they say, Your Honor; she is poor; she is unable to pay for an abortion; and she is subject to this type of infirmity; they bring the idea that she is poor; she is unable to pay for an abortion; unable to pay for the doctors. I think the matter was raised in U.S. v. Vuitch, wherein it is stated that the poor person should have the constitutional right to have an abortion as any other person in the state hospital, or in such a situation that we recommend they start to become more liberal in that regard. But, what I am saying is that it is a very serious question involved here as to whether she can go so far as to have the right to an abortion. The father is not considered, the other parties are not considered in society. Society is told it is not a private matter anymore; it is not in the confines of the marital state, but it is coming out to medical authorities, doctors, hospitals, and saying, I'm entitled to an abortion under the Constitution.

We feel that in this particular case that there are other rights other than Mary Doe, the rights of the unborn child —

JUDGE MORGAN: What is the difference of the rights of an unborn child here and where there is a forcible rape?

MR. HIGHT: In that particular situation —

JUDGE MORGAN: You have an exception in the statute. What is the difference if you can look at it from the child's standpoint?

MR. HIGHT: The statute in this case, Your Honor, as I interpret it — and I believe the hospitals interpret it — make the necessity of an abortion a question for the medical authorities as to whether this woman needs an abortion.

JUDGE MORGAN: In a forcible rape case?

MR. HIGHT: No, sir. I'm talking about in a [723] normal situation, therapeutic abortion. In the case of rape it also requires in the statute —

JUDGE MORGAN: I'm looking at it from the unborn child's standpoint. What is the difference?

MR. HIGHT: There is none, Your Honor, as far as the statute because in each case under the statute the same procedure is followed, and with the rape victim an additional procedure is used. In each case the doctor certifies the need under the statute that an abortion is necessary because of one of these three.

JUDGE MORGAN: I was questioning from the standpoint you were looking at it —from the unborn child. I don't see any difference with the unborn child's rights in the case of rape.

MR. HIGHT: This evolves into a medical question for the doctor to determine as to whether or not in this situation, as in any therapeutic abortion, it is such a medical question that an abortion should be performed. This is the way the statute leaves it, that if this rape victim, statutory rape, young girl, is at such a degree of hypertension, physical or mental, that the doctor and the statute would consent to an abortion.

JUDGE SMITH: As I read it, she doesn't have to be under hypertension; if she is a rapee, that's it.

MR. HIGHT: But the doctor is still under the statute.

JUDGE MORGAN: I was looking at it from the unborn child. You put it on the basis and I don't see the difference. That is what I'm saying.

MR. HIGHT: I think in that situation what you have, of course, is an overriding, perhaps policy or state policy to protect victims of a forcible rape that you do not have in a normal —

JUDGE MORGAN: But looking at it from the unborn baby's standpoint, I don't see any difference.

MR. HIGHT: No, sir, you don't, as far as the child is concerned, but you have such an overwhelming right in favor of the prospective mother that you don't have in a situation where the mother has all types and means to prevent conception. Then, after conception you have a father's right involved and a number of other rights you don't have in a rape victim. If the Court is determined to hear facts in the case, we would respectfully request that you consider our motion to disclose the identify of Mary Doe.

JUDGE MORGAN: All right. Mrs. Beasley, were you going to argue for the defendant?

MRS. BEASLEY: Your Honor, with respect to this rape question, I think it perhaps grew up a long time [725] ago because it actually did have to do with the health of the mother.

JUDGE MORGAN: Maybe the abortion statute grew up a long time ago, too.

MRS. BEASLEY: Indeed it did. It certainly was part of the common law which we have mentioned, of course, in our briefs; and Blackstone mentioned it. I think that was one of the very reasons why the child's life is protected under our Constitution too, as well as the mother's rights of privacy, if, indeed, there are such in this case. I don't think that when our Constitution was written, it did not take into account the protection of life and pursuit of life that an unborn child had because the common law in our states, the first abortion statute was in 1831; however, the Fourteenth Amendment came after that even, so that under the Constitution there was imbued upon it the fact that the unborn child was recognized by the community as having some rights of protection. That is exactly what we have now, plus the fact that perhaps it even has more right of protection now because modern medicine being what it is, it becomes viable at a much earlier stage of its development, so that a child that is being carried by a woman is much closer to life now even than it was during common law.

Plaintiffs keep referring to the woman's right to choose whether or not she should bear children. I don't think that the statute really has anything to do with that. Certainly it does not infringe upon her right to not bear children. She has many methods by which she may exert that right. Georgia has a new sterilization law passed during this General Assembly whereby all it takes is the consent of the husband and wife for sterilization to occur. That assists her in having this right not to bear children, and the various types of contraceptives certainly give her an opportunity not to bear children. Thirdly, and most traditionally, abstention. She has voluntarily put herself in the position to have this child and once that life is kindled in her, the state takes the position that it has the right to be born because it is regarded as a life.

The plaintiffs take a position whereby they completely ignore the balancing. They say it is not a balancing. They look at it with one eye closed; they look only at the woman's rights, but what about the child's rights? It is myopic, I think, to look at it as though only the mother had any rights. The law is replete with examples of where an unborn child has certain legal rights and those, of course, have been [727] well laid out, I think, in some of the briefs.

JUDGE MORGAN: How do you answer the question I propounded to Mr. Hight in regard to the forced rape? That child has a right, too, doesn't it?

MRS. BEASLEY: Yes, it does, but there you come to a balancing of who has the right to life. I think in that respect —

JUDGE MORGAN: Who has the right to life?

MRS. BEASLEY: Who has the right to life and pursuit of happiness, and there the state has taken the position that examples and experience has been that people who have been raped, women who have been raped, it is going to so effect their lives that perhaps it becomes almost a health or mental question, and it is going to leave open this exception. It doesn't mandate that you have to have an abortion if you are raped, but it leaves this open to you. The state takes the position that what repayment can be done to a person who has been the victim of such a crime, and this is the only way in which her life and the continuation of it in a normal fashion in the way she chooses can go on if she is given the opportunity to stop the life which is growing in her without any voluntariness on her part. But in these cases, the plaintiffs put themselves in the position where they believe that [728] for whatever reason—and we talked about economic rights—very often, I think, if we went into the evidence, we would see that mental health can include an economic situation where the woman will become so mentally disturbed if she had to bear another child she couldn't afford, that it would have an effect and perhaps that situation could very well come under this statute, and if we went into evidence, we would be happy to show —

JUDGE SMITH: Do you think it is possible for different states to have different public policies on this matter, legally?

MRS. BEASLEY: Yes, I do. I think that if the state takes the position where it wants to protect its unborn children as prospective citizens of its state, it should have the right to do so.

JUDGE SMITH: I would assume legally if there is a basic constitutional prohibition against it that the state could not.

MRS. BEASLEY: If that were determined. We don't have a case saying that the Federal Government, or under the Federal Constitution you take that view. The view has been espoused that the state has the right to control this area of abortion.

JUDGE SMITH: Well, I'm making the comparison like [729] gambling. Some people may consider the pursuit of happiness to be able to gamble, and this law varies from state to state. Each state has the right to make its own public policy in some area. Now, I would assume, though, that legally a state would be free to do that unless there is some basic Federal constitutional guide that says everybody has to be alike in this area and namely that is have nothing, have no restrictions against abortion.

MRS. BEASLEY: I think a good argument could be made for it to be a Federal constitutional right for the unborn child to have a right to live. The basis of it is, as I pointed out in the beginning —

JUDGE SMITH: Well, the point I am making is that in the tort area the laws do vary from state to state for unborn children.

MRS. BEASLEY: That is right.

JUDGE SMITH: Do you think this is right in this field also?

MRS. BEASLEY: No, sir, not necessarily. I think that as far as Georgia is concerned we have always looked at the unborn child as having rights and having protection of his life to be born; but I think also that under the Federal Constitution, which guarantees protection of life, it can be said and it can be argued [730] that this includes the right of life of the unborn child. He would have a right under the Federal Constitution which means that it would have to apply to all the states, as far as his life is concerned — not tort law or laws of inheritance, which are specifically delegated to the states — but if you have a basic right to life which we believe this unborn child has, if the woman is going to be allowed to terminate this life because of her desire, what is to prevent the law from stopping her from killing this child after it is born? What is the difference? If she says she has a right not to bear that child and not to raise that child for twenty years as plaintiffs argue, then why does she have to after it has been born?

JUDGE MORGAN: Are you making a distinction between before and after the child becomes a person?

MRS. BEASLEY: I am not, I think the plaintiffs are, and I don't think that they can do so logically. I think the child has a right to life from the moment of its conception, but the plaintiffs would like to have what they call abortion on demand.

Now, in cases of marriage and right to privacy and sexual relations and so on, there are two parties and that is why the state may not invade, but the situation is far different when a third party gets [731] involved, and that is the unborn who is the weakest one of the three, who is absolutely helpless. That is where we say the state has a right to protect.

JUDGE HENDERSON: In the argument saying that the state has the right to except victims of forcible rape, is the state saying that they are presuming there is a health problem that will occur by reason of forcible rape? In other words, the woman and her mental health. Isn't that what they are saying there?

MR. WITT: May it please the Court, representing Chief Jenkins, I wanted to in cameo support Mr. Buckley's argument on intervention by showing to the Court the position of Chief Jenkins in this matter. Chief Jenkins has no policy making functions in state laws. He is a police officer and he has the administration of the City of Atlanta police. He has an interest in this case, and that is that he be able to discern what laws he is going to be required to enforce. That is the reason that on behalf of the Chief a brief with respect only to the abstention doctrine was filed. With all [733] due respect, it is very difficult as a lawyer not to engage in these other matters that are very crucial and very critical in our society today, but because the Chief has no policy making function it would not be within his domain to inject his notions into this case personally.

JUDGE MORGAN: Actually, Mr. Slaton would be the one to enforce this law, the Attorney General.

MR. WITT: Basically that is correct, Your Honor. I was prepared to submit an affidavit as part of the evidence in this case which the Court could well consider to the effect that no arrests for abortions committed by a doctor in a hospital have been made by the Atlanta Police Department. These, aside from the question of abortions committed by unlicensed practitioners of some sort, this leaves aside the question of abortion which may or may not be outside of a hospital. This is strictly the kind of procedure that is involved in this statute.

In that respect, I believe Mr. Buckley's urging on the Court the need for child representation is kind of highlighted in cameo by the Chief's position where he can't urge these things properly. He has no interest in it, and, of course, our legal system believes that a problem is best presented to a court by [734] adverse interest arguing very earnestly for their position, which is not the position I find myself in this morning, with the one exception of the abstention doctrine. I think that is very critical in this case,

MR. HIGHT: Under the Georgia Code section in question the state has the right to protect any interest of the unborn child by appropriate action in this court; we do not. And if the Court does reach the merits of the case, in order to protect the rights of the unborn child, we would respectfully ask that Mr. Buckley be permitted to intervene as guardian ad litem.

MR. BUCKLEY: . . . [737] In any event, the law specifically says that an action for declaratory judgment may be brought in the Superior Court of the county in question wherein the court may determine whether or not the constitutional or other legal rights of the unborn child are being violated, and if so, may grant an injunction, so that says that even in the event of a rape, even in the event of an alleged probable deformity, in the event of a critical illness, there is a forum provided, as there should be, under our system of constitutional law, for the testing of the rights of the unborn child.

Now, I would submit that arguing solely from the point of view of the unborn child — and that is the only point of view that I represent — that even in the event of rape that is a very extreme consequence for the unborn child. That brings me to the focus, I think, of the entire argument in this case, and that is this. I think a lot of people are inclined to view the constitutional law as some sophisticated area of the law where only people who call themselves constitutional lawyers are permitted to practice. Constitutional law is not unlike any other area of the law. [738] This is an equity case, and in equity we have been dealing for centuries with the balancing of convenience, the balancing of interest. Common law is really the same thing. We have — and Griswold did not enounce any brand new concept of law. The Supreme Court has recognized for years and years and years the basic right of family privacy, the right of the family to control the conduct of children, for example. However, all of those cases over the years, you keep seeing recurring the qualifications that those rights must be balanced against others' interests.

But here you don't have any right known to man that exists in a vacuum. We are all members of society and you don't have a right over your body that permits you, for example, to go through the traffic light when it is red, because my body may be coming the other way and we might collide. That is the trouble with rights — they collide. And that is what the courts are for, to determine, and that is what the Legislatures are for, is to determine when laws should be and rules should be laid down to try to avoid collisions or try to determine systems and procedures for balancing these conveniences and these interests and these rights, to try to weigh these rights and then determine in this instance, using again the illustration of rape, for example.

Well, common law has found since then, not just by looking at a crystal ball, but by looking at medical practice and the progress of medical practice, the common law has found that the fetus is in no sense of the word a part of the mother. He has all of the characteristics of a human being, and as one person I was speaking with the other day said, it must be a human being because he isn't any other kind of being. He is in being. In any dictionary sense of the word, it is a human being. He has his own circulatory system, his own digestive system, he reacts to light, pain, to various forms of stimuli; and to say that, as asked by counsel for plaintiff, that we are going to say that there is some magic at the threshold of the moment of delivery and that we are going to say that no one can regulate this child except the mother up until the moment of delivery, that would be absurd I think.

* * * * *

[746] And here this law was not adopted just on the spur of the moment. There was legislative hearings that went into this consideration and there were many arguments—economic, medical, statistical, and philosophical. These arguments were thrashed out at considerable length and not one but two different legislative [747] sessions. Then, again, in the course of an amendment being offered at the 1970 session, there were further hearings on this matter, and as Mr. Witt pointed out, there is a rather peculiar situation in that we are not exactly sure which of these two statutes the Georgia Supreme Court may say is the one that is enforced in Georgia. The Court will recall that they were both adopted. One is a part of the overall criminal code that was revised in 1968 session of the General Assembly, and the other was a carry-over special act dealing only with abortion that carried over from '67 and was finally enacted in '68. So we have two similar but slightly different laws.

* * * * *

Medical science says he is a separate and distinct entity.

* * * * *

I submit that this is the whole thread of my argument, from the time of conception a life comes into being and there is no medical differentiation based on a difference in the life of that child at eleven weeks as compared with thirteen weeks or eleven weeks as compared with twenty weeks. The only difference is the ease of performing an abortion, and I submit that that is not a criteria to apply in deciding the rights of the unborn. This is a legal person who has a legally protected right and I respectfully say that the Court must consider that right and should uphold the statute.

We have been asked today for the first time to identify Mary Doe. Mary Doe is present in court, and I think our proffer of testimony was an offer to have her testify as to her particular situation. To request that she be given a medical or physical examination at this late date is too late, in my opinion, because this could have been done several weeks ago. There is no need for us to allege the negative of all these particulars that have been asserted, that she is mentally competent to file a petition.

Now, in our evidence which we had planned to present today, we were going to get into the question of statistics to show that the major group of women who receive abortions are white and of the upper economic classification. I think there is sufficient medical and sociological studies in the area that the Court can take judicial notice of these studies.

JUDGE SMITH: Is that true under this law? Do those statistics relate only to abortions in Georgia under this law?

MRS. HAMES: Yes.

JUDGE SMITH: Does this count the rich gal that [757] flies off to Sweden?

MRS. HAMES: No. When we talk about the statistics in Georgia, we are talking about abortions performed in Georgia, so that the rich gal that flies to Sweden or to New York or to Johns-Hopkins is not counted as an abortion.

JUDGE SMITH: In other words, the statistics you attach in your appendix relate only to legal abortions occurring in Georgia under this law?

MRS. HAMES: That is correct.

JUDGE SMITH: And how do those relate to the population percentage?

MRS. HAMES: To the population percentage?

JUDGE SMITH: Yes. Of rich to poor. Who decides who is poor and who is rich?

MRS. HAMES: That was in a statistical study that we had planned to introduce by Dr. John Asher who has made such a statement. It is not attached to our brief. There he made an analysis of the people at Grady Memorial Hospital who had received the abortion, and in this connection, I believe, it was eighty percent of them that were white that received the abortion and sixty percent in the upper socioeconomic classification. I'd have to ask him questions about how he arrived —

JUDGE SMITH: How does that relate to who asked to have one?

MRS. HAMES: That was other evidence to show that people who asked for abortions can be turned down at various levels and never get them. Those are the women who are uninitiated in the medical care, in seeking medical care. They merely make the request and are turned away by a clerk. We don't know how many of those there are.

I did want to point out in the report of the U. S. Public Health Service that is attached to the brief, you compare abortions, therapeutic abortions to live births in the hospital, Grady Memorial Hospital in 1969 had five per one thousand live births and that is compared to five hundred sixteen at Johns-Hopkins. This, we submit, is evidence that the law in Georgia is not meeting the needs. Obviously there is no greater need for abortions in Johns-Hopkins and in Maryland than there is in any other state.

In another report, which we attach to the brief, there is information that seventy-seven women died in Georgia from 1960 to 1968 as a result of illegal abortions. Now, the authorities tell us that for every one that dies there is ten thousand illegal abortions, so that leads you to see the extent of the [759] health problem that we have in Georgia alone. In the last two years there were fourteen blacks that died in Georgia from illegal abortions. This we contend is a health problem which is caused as a result of the abortion statute. Since the procedures are burdensome and costly it drives the women, in particular the poor women, to an inexpensive, illegal abortionist.

JUDGE MORGAN: What about the contention that there are probably two statutes in Georgia, one under the adopted criminal code and one under the —

MRS. HAMES: It is my understanding that the statute 26-9925, the one that is printed at the end of the new Georgia criminal code was adopted April 11th, or it became effective April 11 or 12th when the governor did not sign the bill — this was April 11, 1968 — that was the original abortion law in Georgia.

Now, at the same time they adopted the new criminal code for Georgia which embodied the same provisions. They are the same.

JUDGE MORGAN: The same statute?

MRS HAMES: Yes, they are the same provisions, but they were not to become effective until July 1st, 1969. So the 26-99 provisions were to give Georgia citizens the benefit of the abortion statute prior to the new criminal law coming into effect.

JUDGE HENDERSON: You want to have all abortions, you don't have any distinction, do you? You want to declare all the laws about abortions unconstitutional [762] and let the doctor perform them whether it is for the health of the mother or not.

MRS. HAMES: That is correct.

JUDGE SMITH: What if it happened that all doctors in Georgia were real conservative and they had decided in their medical meeting that it was bad to have abortions. Where would you be then?

MRS. HAMES: I think there would be a duty on behalf of the public hospitals to hire doctors who would provide this service for indigent persons. Now, as far as private patients are concerned, I don't think there would be any way to compel.

* * * * *

MRS. HAMES: I think there is a duty when the County of Fulton and DeKalb undertakes to provide medical services to the indigent that they must provide all medical services.

* * * * *

JUDGE SMITH: Anybody.

MRS. HAMES: I don't think there is any remedy to compel the performance of an abortion now.

JUDGE SMITH: If they could get them at Hopkins and couldn't get them in Georgia, where would we be legally? This would mean you would have to move into a jurisdiction where the public policy and attitude were different, wouldn't you?

MRS. HAMES: That is correct, and I think that runs to the equal protection argument which we have made. I think that is the situation we find ourselves in now, that people who have money can go to Hopkins. They can go to California, they soon are going to be able to go to New York.

MR. BUCKLEY: On factual question, Your Honor, and not involving evidence, but since the allegations of the complainant, as I recall, projected the fetus as being approximately nine weeks or so, and since I believe Mrs. Hames told me in private conversation that the fetus in this situation is actually four or five weeks older than that; it never has been changed in the pleading and never has been referred to in plaintiff's briefs; and I think it would be appropriate to inquire as to whether that allegation is correct or should be amended.

JUDGE SMITH: I don't know the relevancy, but will you stipulate at the time of filing suit that the fetus was four or five weeks older than alleged? That is all he is asking.

MRS. HAMES: I think we could stipulate that Mary Doe is about twenty weeks pregnant at the present time, and that is because women sometimes miscalculate and with three of us doing it, all three of us miscalculated.

JUDGE MORGAN: Thank you.

The Court will permit you to file along with your brief on the jurisdiction — if you desire additional briefs on the merits, and any cases which you feel like have been omitted or haven't been cited. That is left up to you.

I will say this again; that if the Court determines to decide this case, if evidence should be considered, we will reconvene it; otherwise, we will pass on the argument.

(Filed in Clerk's Office Oct. 14, 1970, Claude L. Goza, Clerk; By: PWM, Deputy Clerk)

UNITED STATES DISTRICT COURT
NORTHERN DISTRICT OF GEORGIA
ATLANTA DIVISION

MARY DOE, et al vs. ARTHUR K. BOLTON, as Attorney General of the State of Georgia; et al	CIVIL ACTION NUMBER 13676

Since the Court's opinion of July 31, 1970, several motions have been filed necessitating this opinion and order.

MOTION OF AMICUS CURIAE

Ferdinand Buckley filed a motion on September 3, 1970, to alter or amend the Court's judgment of August 25, 1970, to rule on several of his earlier motions and prayers. Accordingly, that judgment is hereby amended in the following (See FN) respect:

Mr. Buckley's motion for reconsideration of the order revoking his appointment as guardian ad litem for the embryo (or fetus), and his motion to intervene in any representative capacity on behalf of the embryo or fetus is denied. This ruling makes it unnecessary, and the Court declines, to rule on the prayers in the answer and counterclaim Mr. Buckley filed before revocation of his appointment as guardian ad litem.

MOTIONS OF JANE ROE

Jane Roe petitions for leave to intervene as a plaintiff, moves for a temporary restraining order, and asks that the Court clarify and enforce its opinion of July 31, 1970. Said petition, and accordingly also the motion and the request are denied for two reasons.

First, the Court is informed by counsel for all concerned that Georgia Baptist Hospital has reconsidered its earlier decision and subsequently granted Jane Roe's application for an abortion. Said action renders the petition of Jane Roe moot, there now being no sufficient collision of interests between Jane Roe and the defendants.

Second, Jane Roe's petition to intervene makes it clear that her controversy was with Georgia Baptist Hospital, and only tangentially with the defendants in this case. Under such circumstances there is no showing that Mary Doe—representing the class of pregnant women denied abortions because of the Georgia statute attacked—could not adequately represent the tangential interest of Jane Roe in this action. See Allen Calculators, Inc. v. National Cash Register Co., 322 U.S. 137, 141 (1944); Durkin v. Pet Milk Co., 14 F.R.D. 374 (W.D. Ark. 1953).

In spite of the above, the motion presents an aspect of the case which justifies some amplification of the previous declaratory judgment. The court concludes that this should be done by way of amendment sua sponte. Rule 60(b)(6); Klapcott v. United States, 335 U. S. 601 (1948); Bros. Incorporated v. W. E. Grace Mfg. Co., 320 F.2d 594 (5th Cir. 1963).

The problem relates to the role and function of the "abortion committees" in the several hospitals. Ga. Code §26-1202(5). The thrust of the original opinion was to carry out the apparent intent of the Georgia legislature by making the ultimate decision on individual abortions a medical one. However, in line with constitutional principles, the ultimate decision cannot be [776] restricted to the three reasons stated in the statute. This left the abortion committee free to decide whether an abortion was "necessary" on the broader medical basis, namely, the totality of circumstances surrounding each patient.

From the motion it is apparent that those committees who have voluntarily adopted the standards promulgated by the American College of Obstetricians and Gynecologists as controlling have placed themselves in the position of being restricted by the same reasons stated in the statute.[1] What is denied directly cannot be accomplished indirectly. It follows that the abortion committees cannot be limited to the stated reasons as the sole

[1]The Georgia statute requires the hospital to apply standards promulgated by the Joint Commission on the Accreditation of Hospitals. No such restrictive reasons for approval of an abortion are contained therein. However, the voluntary standards promulgated by the American College of Obstetricians and Gynecologists in part limit he grounds for abortion to the three stated statutory reasons: injury to health of the mother; danger of grave physical or mental defect to the child; and pregnancy due to rape. Any such limiting restrictions, as seen, must fail. Likewise, lack of consent by the husband, while it may freely be considered by the committee, may not be automatically established as an absolute bar.

By way of additional comment, good faith administration of the statute as now constituted would prohibit a committee from secretly restricting abortions to those statutory reasons, which the court has already deleted. To the contrary, all relevant factors should be considered and an informed medical judgment made.

basis for approval of an individual abortion, nor can they so limit themselves by the adoption of such standards. Any such action by a hospital committee is declared to be an unconstitutional exercise of delegated power.

In sum, the statutory processes of approval are left standing. The patient is required to obtain the approval of (1) the certifying physician, (2) the two consulting physicians, and (3) the abortion committee of the admitting hospital. Failure to obtain approval at any level necessarily precludes abortion on that application. A majority of the abortion committee shall control its action, whether for approval or for disapproval.

To the extent stated herein, the original opinion is modified.

IT IS SO ORDERED.

This the 13 day of October, 1970.

ON APPEAL FROM THE UNITED STATES DISTRICT COURT
FOR THE NORTHERN DISTRICT OF TEXAS

JURISDICTIONAL STATEMENT

Appellants bring this direct appeal from a judgment entered June 17, 1970, by a statutory three-judge United States District Court for the Northern District of Texas. The judgment appealed from granted these Appellants (Plaintiffs below) a declaration that the Texas anti-abortion statutes were unconstitutional on their face, by reason of overbreadth affecting fundamental individual rights, and that provisions in the statute suffered from unconstitutional uncertainty. However, the judgment denied a permanent injunction which had been sought as necessary in aid of the District Court's jurisdiction to enjoin future enforcement of the statute declared invalid. Appellants submit this Statement to show that this is a direct appeal over which this Court has jurisdiction, and that the appeal presents important and substantial federal questions which merit plenary review.

Citation to Opinions Below

The June 17, 1970, opinion of the statutory three-judge United States District Court for the Northern District of Texas is not yet reported. The text of the decision is set out in the Appendix, infra, at 7a.

Jurisdiction

(i) On March 3, 1970, Appellant Jane Roe filed her original complaint,[1] basing jurisdiction on 28 U.S.C. §1343(3) (1964 ed.), and complementary remedial statutes, 28 U.S.C. §2201 (1964 ed.); 42 U.S.C. §1983 (1964 ed.). On the same day Appellants John and Mary Doe filed a complaint predicating federal jurisdiction on the same statutes. On March 23, 1970, the District Court granted leave for Appellant James H. Hallford, M.D., to intervene as a party-plaintiff, on the basis of a complaint alleging a class action and the same jurisdictional grounds set out above. Subsequently, on April 22, 1970, Appellant Jane Roe amended her complaint to sue "on behalf of herself and all others similarly situated" (App. at 8a n. 1). Appellants John and Mary Doe also amended their complaints to assert a class action (Id.). All Appellants, from their respective positions as married couples, pregnant single women, and practicing physicians asked that the Texas anti-abortion statutes[1] be declared unconstitutional on their face, and for an injunction against future enforcement of the statutes. A statutory three-judge United States District Court was requested and convened pursuant to 28 U.S.C. §§2281, 2284 (1964 ed.).

(ii) The final judgment of the statutory three-judge District Court, granting Appellants' request for a declaratory judgment, but denying any injunctive relief, was entered on June 17, 1970 (App. at 4a). On Monday, August 17, 1970, all Appellants filed with the United States District Court for the Northern District of Texas notices of appeal to this Court (App. at 1a), pursuant to 28 U.S.C. §2101(b) (1964 ed.), and SUP. CT. RULES 11, 34 (July 1, 1970 ed.), 398 U.S. 1015, 1021, 1045 (1970). A protective appeal to the United States Court of Appeals for the Fifth Circuit was noticed on July 23, 1970, by Appellant Hallford (App. at 23a), and on July 24, 1970, by Appellant Jane Roe (App. at 21a).

(iii) Jurisdiction of this Court to review by direct appeal the three-judge District Court's final judgment denying a permanent injunction is conferred by 28 U.S.C. §1253 (1964 ed.).

(iv) Cases which sustain the jurisdiction of this Court are: Evans v. Cornman, 398 U.S. 419, 420 (1970); Goldberg v. Kelly, 397 U.S. 254, 261 (1970); Carter v. Jury Comm'n of Greene County, 396 U.S. 320, 328 (1970); Moore v. Ogilvie, 394 U.S. 814, 815-16 (1969); Williams v. Rhodes, 393 U.S. 23, 26-28 (1968); Dinis v. Volpe, 389 U.S. 570 (1968) (per curiam); Hale v. Bimco Trading Co., 306 U.S. 375, 376-78 (1939).

Statutes Involved

2A Texas Penal Code art. 1196, at 436 (1961):

"Nothing in this chapter applies to an abortion procured or attempted by medical advice for the purpose of saving the life of the mother."

2A Texas Penal Code art. 1191, at 429 (1961):

"If any person shall designedly administer to a pregnant woman or knowingly procure to be administered with her consent any drug or medicine, or shall use towards her any violence or means whatever externally or internally applied, and thereby procure an abortion, he shall be confined in the penitentiary not less than two nor more than five years; if it be done without her consent, the punishment shall be doubled. By 'abortion' is meant that the life of the fetus or embryo shall be destroyed in the woman's womb or that a premature birth thereof be caused."

2A Texas Penal Code art. 1192, at 433 (1961):

"Whoever furnishes the means for procuring an abortion knowing the purpose intended is an accomplice."

2A Texas Penal Code art. 1193, at 434 (1961):

"If the means used shall fail to produce an abortion, the offender is nevertheless guilty of an attempt to produce abortion, provided it be shown that such means were calculated to produce that result, and shall be fined not less than one hundred nor more than one thousand dollars."

2A TEXAS PENAL CODE art. 1194, at 435 (1961):

"If the death of the mother is occasioned by an abortion so produced or by an attempt to effect the same it is murder."

Questions Presented

I. Whether the Three-Judge Court Should Have Enjoined Future Enforcement of the Texas Anti-Abortion Laws, Which the Court Had Declared Unconstitutional, Where an Injunction was Necessary in Aid of the Court's Jurisdiction, Proper to Effectuate the Declaratory Judgment, and Needed to Prevent Irreparable Injury to Important Federal Rights of the Class of Pregnant Women Who Are or Will be Seeking Abortions, and the Class of Physicians Who are Forced to Reject such Women as Patients Because of a Reasonable Fear of Prosecution.

II. Whether a Married Couple, and Others Similarly Situated, Have Standing to Challenge the Texas Anti-Abortion Laws, Where Said Laws Have a Present and Destructive Effect on their Marital Relations, They are Unable to Utilize Fully Effective Contraceptive Methods, Pregnancy Would Seriously Harm the Woman's Health, and Such a Couple Could Not Obtain Judicial Relief in Sufficient Time After Pregnancy to Prevent Irreparable Injury.

Statement of the Case

Appellants brought three actions on behalf of three variously situated classes of Plaintiffs.

John and Mary Doe, a childless married couple, sued on behalf of themselves and all others similarly situated. Mary Doe has a neural-chemical disorder which renders pregnancy a threat to her physical and mental health, although not to her survival. Her physician has so advised her, and has also advised against using oral contraceptives. The alternate means of contraception used by John and Mary Doe is subject to a significant risk of failure. In such event, Mary Doe would like to, but legally could not, obtain a therapeutic abortion in a suitable medical facility in Texas. The probability of contraceptive falure in the class represented by Mary Doe is unquestionably high, when the size of the class is considered. Also, the limitations of judicial relief for a pregnant woman seeking an abortion are well known.[3] For Mary Doe and others in her position, a pre-[3] The period between pregnancy detection, which normally occurs after the fourth week, and the safest time for a therapeutic abortion, before the twelfth week, leaves little time for judicial deliberation. With the notable exception of the Seventh Circuit, courts have declined to render a decision on behalf of a pregnant woman in the limited time available. In the present case, the first complaint was filed March 3, 1970, and followed after fifteen full weeks by a decision on the merits, June 17, 1970. Compare Doe v. Randall, 314 F. Supp. 32 (D. Minn. 1970) (nearly five weeks between decision and complaint); Doe v. Lefkowitz, 69 Civ. 4423 (S.D.N.Y. Dec. 12, 1969) (per curiam) (preliminary injunction denied until all factual materials developed by deposition); and California v. Belous, 71 Cal. 2d ——, 458 P.2d 194, 80 Cal. Rptr. 354 (1969) (argument March 3, 1969; decision September 5, 1969); with Doe v. Scott, No. 18382 (7th Cir. Mar. 30, 1970) (per curiam), rev'g 310 F. Supp. 688 (N.D. Ill. Mar. 27, 1970) (order entered in three days where pregnancy caused by rape).

pregnancy ruling on the validity of the Texas anti-abortion laws was the only ruling that could grant her the relief she would be seeking. Any other decision would simply be too late to prevent irreparable injury. Accordingly, John and Mary Doe brought an action for declaratory and injunctive relief against the present effect of the Texas statutes on their marital relations, and the inevitable future effect the statutes would have, in the certain event that a member of the class would become pregnant and not qualify for a legal abortion in Texas.

Jane Roe, an unmarried pregnant woman, also brought an action of the same nature, on her own behalf and for all others similiarly situated. Jane Roe had been unable to obtain a legal abortion in a medical facility in Texas, because her survival was not threatened by continued pregnancy, and no hospital would perform the abortion, in light of the Texas anti-abortion statutes.[4] Jane Roe was financially unable to journey to another jurisdiction with less restrictive laws on abortion, and accordingly had no recourse other than continuing an unwanted pregnancy, or risking her life and health at the hands of a non-medical criminal abortionist.

James H. Hallford, M.D., intervened as a Plaintiff, representing himself and other licensed Texas physicians similarly situated. Dr. Hallford's interest was twofold. As a physician, he is requested by patients, on a regular and recurring basis, to arrange for medically induced abortions in hospitals or other appropriate clinical facilities. This he cannot do, for several reasons. The Texas anti-abortion statutes are unclear in their potential application to the situations in which patients request abortions. Consequently, both physician and hospital must exercise special caution to avoid prosecution. Also, the potential sweep of the statutes is so drastic that the only clear case of legal abortion is one in which the patient is near to certain death. These cases are rare; hence the typical patient's case will be legally uncertain, or of certain illegality. To avoid the realistic possibility of severe penal and administrative sanctions, the physician must turn away the typical patient. Since the conscientious physician knows full well that such a patient may seek out an incompetent non-medical abortionist, thereby endangering her life or health, he will continually be forced by the statute to breach his professional duty of care to the patient.[8] To rectify this invasion of the physician-patient relationship, Dr. Hallford brought this action to enjoin future enforcement of the Texas anti-abortion statutes, against himself, or against any other physician similarly situated.

Dr. Hallford's second interest in bringing the action was to seek relief against two indictments outstanding against [8] If prior cases on abortion prosecutions in Texas are a reliable index, patients who are turned away by physicians have recourse only to an assortment of quacks. See, e.g., Fletcher v. State, 362 S.W.2d 845 (Tex. Ct. Crim. App. 1962) (non-physician using crude techniques in "cottage on the river"; hysterectomy necessary to prevent girl's death); Catching v. State, 364 S.W.2d 691 (Tex. Ct. Crim. him on abortion charges.[6] Under Texas law, a physician charged with abortion is presumed guilty, if the State is able to establish the fact of the abortion. The physician, in such a case, must admit complicity in the act, waive his privilege against self-incrimination, and defend on the basis that the abortion was "procured or attempted by medical advice for the purpose of saving the life of the [woman]." 2A TEXAS PENAL CODE art. 1196, at 436 (1961). Decisions such as Veevers v. State, 354 S.W.2d 161 (Tex. Ct. Crim. App. 1962), hold that the Article 1196 exception is an affirmative defense, which the physician must raise and prove. In numerous respects, this settled state-law practice deprives a physician of essential constitutional rights. Moreover, state practice invades the privacy of physician and patient by exposing intimate and confidential associations to the public glare of a criminal trial. In addition, the possibility of conviction carries with it the revocation of the physician's license before appeal. These elements of state practice render defense to criminal abortion charges a wholly inadequate means of vindicating the physician's constitutional rights. Accordingly, Dr. Hallford brought the present action as a Plaintiff-Intervenor in the main actions filed by Jane Roe, John Doe, and Mary Doe. The cases were consolidated, and argued together.

Essentially, the federal questions raised by each individual Plaintiff were raised by all. The complaints charged that the Texas anti-abortion statutes deprived physicians and patients of rights protected by the First, Fourth, Fifth, Eighth, Ninth, and Fourteenth Amendments, as construed by this Court in decisions such as Griswold v. Connecticut, 381 U.S. 479 (1965).[7] Defendants interposed objections to the standing of each Plaintiff, the propriety of adjudication versus abstention, the ripeness of the dispute for present decision, and the propriety of injunctive relief.

A statutory three-judge court, convened in response to Plaintiffs' request for injunctive relief from the Texas anti-abortion statutes, granted a declaratory judgment that the statutes were unconstitutionally vague and overbroad.

After dealing with the jurisdictional questions of standing,[8] ripeness,[9] and abstention,[10] raised by the Defendants, the three-judge court stated:

> "[T]he Texas Abortion Laws must be declared unconstitutional because they deprive single women and married couples of their right, secured by the Ninth Amendment, to choose whether to have children" (App. at 12a).

[7] In the brief on the merits, Appellants will more fully elaborate this complex substantive constitutional point. For purposes of this Statement, however, it is sufficient to note that Griswold has been applied in the abortion context by numerous state and federal courts. See cases cited in notes 31-37, infra, and accompanying text.

[8] Jane Roe, the pregnant Plaintiff, and Dr. Hallford, had standing because they "occupy positions vis-à-vis the Texas Abortion Laws sufficient to differentiate them from the general public." App. at 9a. Also, on the authority of Griswold, Dr. Hallford had standing to raise the "rights of his patients, single women and married couples, as well as rights of his own." App. at 9a n. 3. John and Mary Doe, however, were held to lack standing. App. at 5a.

[9] The district court was "satisfied that there presently exists a degree of contentiousness between Roe and Hallford and the defendant to establish a 'case of actual controversy' . . . ." App. at 10a.

Reliance was placed on decisions by this Court establishing "[r]elative sanctuaries for such 'fundamental' interests [as] the family,[11] the marital couple,[12] and the individual." [13] Further precedent was found in similar decisions by other federal and state courts,[14] as well as a major treatment of Griswold in the abortion setting by Retired Justice Tom C. Clark, see Clark, Religion, Morality, and Abortion: A Constitutional Appraisal, 2 LOYOLA UNIV. (L.A.) L. REV. 1 (1969).

Not only were the statutes overbroad, and not justified by a narrowly drawn compelling State interest, but the language of the statutes was unconstitutionally vague. Although a physician might lawfully perform an abortion "for the purpose of saving the life of the [pregnant woman]," [15] the circumstances giving rise to such necessity were far from clear. The district court detailed a few of the more apparent ambiguities:

> "How likely must death be? Must death be certain if the abortion is not performed? Is it enough that the woman could not undergo birth without an ascertain-> ably higher possibility of death than would normally be the case? What if the woman threatened suicide if the abortion was not performed? How imminent must death be if the abortion is not performed? Is it sufficient if having the child will shorten the life of the woman by a number of years? These questions simply cannot be answered." App. at 17a.

After finding the Texas anti-abortion statutes unconstitutional on two grounds, the district court considered the propriety of injunctive relief. Acting on the assumption that Dombrowski v. Pfister, 380 U.S. 479 (1965) controlled, the court refused to enjoin any present or future enforcement of the statutes. Appellants have brought this appeal to review the denial of injunctive relief.

The Questions Are Substantial

The present appeal presents important and unresolved federal questions which have not been but should be determined by this Court. A district court's refusal to enjoin present and future enforcement of a statute declared facially unconstitutional raises important issues for the vindication by federal courts of rights guaranteed by the Constitution. Decisions by this Court have not in recent years clarified the propriety of federal injunctive relief against state criminal statutes outside the pristine speech area of the First Amendment. A decision by this Court is needed, particularly where, as here, the injunction was sought by some Appellants who were total strangers to any pending prosecutions, and by one Appellant for whom defense of state court prosecution would be a wholly inadequate means of vindicating his federally protected rights.

In addition, the substantive issues in the case, which will surely be raised for further review by Appellee, are novel issues of profound national import, affecting the lives of many thousands of American citizens each year. Further, the same issues are presented in four appeals already docketed,[16] a variety of conflicting decisions in the lower courts,[17] and a host of pending actions in federal and state lower courts.[18]

[16] (1) United States v. Vuitch, No. 84, arises under a differently worded felony abortion statute, however, and poses numerous alternate grounds for affirmance other than the central questions presented here, of overbreadth and vagueness.

(2) McCann v. Babbitz, No. 297, was decided at the federal district court level on grounds virtually the same as those below in the present case. It appears in McCann, however, that the appeal was taken by the State solely from the granting of a declaratory judgment for Dr. Babbitz. No appeal was taken from the denial of an injunction, as 28 U.S.C. §1253 (1964 ed.), would seem to require, and as this Court twice held last Term, Mitchell v. Donovan, 398 U.S. 427 (1970) (per curiam), vacating 300 F. Supp. 1145 (D. Minn. 1969), with directions to enter a fresh judgment of dismissal, to enable appellants to appeal to the Eighth Circuit; Rockefeller v. Catholic Medical Center, 397 U.S. 820 (1970) (per curiam).

(3) Hodgson v. Randall, No. 728, is an appeal from a three-judge federal court decision refusing to enjoin state court prosecution of a physician who sought federal relief before performing a hospital therapeutic abortion for German measles indications, and long before the state indictment.

(4) Hodgson v. Minnesota, No. 729, involves the same subject matter as No. 728, and is an appeal from the Supreme Court of Minnesota's denial of a writ of prohibition to a state trial court which had upheld the constitutionality of an abortion statute, where unconstitutionality was the only defense to the charges.

Introduction

In the remainder of this Jurisdictional Statement, Appellants will show that the questions presented are substantial, and merit plenary review by the full Court. Because of the novelty and complexity of the issues, and the limited function of a Jurisdictional Statement, this showing will not undertake to develop all arguments in depth.

I.

The Three-Judge Court Should Have Enjoined Future Enforcement of the Texas Anti-Abortion Laws, Which the Court Had Declared Unconstitutional, Because an Injunction Was Necessary in Aid of the Court's Jurisdiction, Proper to Effectuate the Declaratory Judgment, and Needed to Prevent Irreparable Injury to Important Federal Rights of the Class of Pregnant Women Who Are or Will Be Seeking Abortions, and the Class of Physicians Who Are Forced to Reject Such Women as Patients Out of a Reasonable Fear of Prosecution.

A. The Subject Matter of the Merits Involves Important and Substantial Federal Constitutional Questions:

On the merits, Appellants argued successfully that decisions by this Court, construing the First, Fourth, Ninth, and Fourteenth Amendments supported a claim that the Texas anti-abortion statutes swept too broadly and thereby invaded rights protected by the Constitution (App. at 5a, 6a, 12a-16a).[19] Moreover, the statutes in question were held to be so vague and indefinite as to violate the Fourteenth Amendment due process guarantee of reasonably specific legislation (App. at 5a, 6a, 16a-18a). That guarantee is particularly significant where, as here, important personal rights are at stake, and an impermissibly vague statute operates to inhibit a wide range of constitutionally protected conduct.[20]

[19] In particular, Appellants relied upon the reasoning of Griswold v. Connecticut, 381 U.S. 479 (1965), where this Court invalidated a state law prohibiting use of contraceptive devices, because

Ultimately, the substantive question presented is whether a State may enact a felony statute to punish a physician, a woman, and her husband, with five years in state prison, where the couple requests, and the physician performs, a therapeutic surgical procedure to abort a pregnancy which the couple did not want, but were unable to prevent.[21] Under Griswold v. Connecticut, 381 U.S. 479 (1965), it is clear that a husband and wife[22] are constitutionally priv-the law swept too broadly and invaded "a relationship lying within the zone of privacy created by several fundamental constitutional guarantees." 381 U.S. at 485.

[20] The most reliable estimates hold that fewer than 10,000 hospital therapeutic abortions are performed yearly, in states where there has been no abortion law reform. See Tietze, Therapeutic Abortions in the United States, 101 AM. J. OBST. & GYNEC. 784, 787 (1968). These constitute a minute proportion of all unwanted pregnancies which face American couples each year. Those excluded from hospitals have two alternatives: continuation of unwanted pregnancy, or extra-hospital, probably illegal, induced abortion.

[21] The woman is not an accomplice under Texas law, but other participants, including her husband, are fully liable. See Willingham v. State, 33 Tex. Crim. 98, 25 S.W. 424 (1894) (woman neither principal nor accomplice).

[22] Griswold was silent on the more significant problem of access by unmarried persons to contraceptives. A result of non-access, and failure, is the birth of over 100,000 illegitimate children yearly to girls age nineteen or younger. See U.S. BUREAU OF THE CENSUS: Statistical Abstract of the United States: 1969, Table 59, at 50 (90th ed. 1969).

Outside of the state judiciary in Massachusetts, authorities have uniformly held the Griswold rationale applicable to litigants who ileged to control the size and spacing of their family by contraception. The failure of contraception, however, is commonplace.[23] Authoritative estimates are that between 750,000 and 1,000,000 births each year are unwanted.[24] These are in addition to the 200,000 to 1,000,000 unwanted pregnancies which are estimated to end in abortions induced outside of the clinical setting.[25] Taken together, some had not entered into the marriage contract. Compare Baird v. Eisenstadt, —— F.2d ——, No. 7578 (1st Cir. July 6, 1970) (invalidating Massachusetts statute which outlawed distribution of contraceptives to the unmarried), Mindel v. United States Civil Service Comm'n, 312 F. Supp. 485 (N.D. Calif. 1970) (reinstating postal clerk who had been dismissed for cohabitation without benefit of marriage), and the present case, Roe v. Wade, —— F. Supp. ——, Civ. No. 3-3690-B (N.D. Tex. June 17, 1970) (per curiam) (Texas anti-abortion statutes "deprive single women and married couples of their right, secured by the Ninth Amendment, to choose whether to have children."), with Sturgis v. Attorney General, 260 N.E.2d 687, 690 (Mass. 1970) (directly contrary to federal decision in Baird).

[23] If a married couple is to have private control over numbers and spacing of children, induced abortion is absolutely necessary as a backstop to contraceptive failure. For compilation of contraceptive failure rates according to method used, see P. EHRLICH & A. EHRLICH, POPULATION RESOURCES ENVIRONMENT 218-19 & Table 9-1 (1970); N. EASTMAN & L. HELLMAN, WILLIAMS OBSTETRICS 1068-75 (13th ed. 1966); Hardin, History and Future of Birth Control, 10 PERSPECTIVES IN BIOLOGY & MED. 1, 7-13 (1966); Tietze, Clinical Effectiveness of Contraceptive Methods, 78 AM. J. OBST. & GYNEC. 650 (1959).

[24] The most recent scholarly examination of unwanted birth magnitudes will appear in a forthcoming issue of SCIENCE. A summary of these findings by Dr. Charles F. Westoff of Princeton University's Office of Population Research, analyzing the 1965 National Fertility Study, appeared in the N.Y. Times, Oct. 29, 1969, at 25, col. 3.

[25] Secret induced abortions are inherently incapable of quantification. Nonetheless, one can be certain that the number is very high. For estimates, see Fisher, Criminal Abortion, in ABORTION IN AMERICA 3-6 (H. Rosen ed. 1967); M. CALDERONE (ed.), ABORTION IN THE UNITED STATES 180 (1958); P. GEBHARD et al., PREGNANCY, BIRTH AND ABORTION 136-37 (1958); F. TAUSSIG, ABORTION:

950,000 to 2,000,000 unwanted births plus non-clinical abortions occur yearly. Accordingly, one must conclude that restrictive anti-abortion statutes, such as the Texas law in question here, drastically affect the conduct of literally millions of American citizens.

The national significance of the issues in this case can also be inferred from increased activity within the medical profession, and in the legislatures. On June 25, 1970, the House of Delegates of the American Medical Association voted to permit licensed physicians to perform abortions in hospitals, with the sole additional qualification that two other physicians be consulted.[26] Physicians were cautioned, however, not to violate existing state statutes, forty-seven of which are far more restrictive.[27] Three states in 1970—New York, Alaska, and Hawaii—removed, for the most part, any criminal penalties which might previously have been imposed upon physicians for performing abortions in appropriate medical facilities.[28] From 1967 to 1970, twelve states had adopted therapeutic abortion statutes similar to that of the MODEL PENAL CODE's 1962 Proposed Official Draft.[29] More recently, on August 4, the Commissioners on Uniform State Laws issued a Second Tentative Draft of a UNIFORM ABORTION ACT. The Act sanctioned abortions by licensed physicians "within 24 weeks after the commencement of the pregnancy; or if after 24 weeks . . . " under the circumstances set out in the MODEL PENAL CODE proposal.

These developments bear witness to the importance of the issues presented here.

While policy-making and legislative bodies have debated the issue of abortion, courts, confined to the constitutional framework, have been asked to resolve the questions of individual privacy and legislative power which are presented here. Although the questions framed in this case have not been decided[30] by this Court, numerous federal [29] See MODEL PENAL CODE §230.3(2) (Proposed Official Draft, 1962). The states are Arkansas, California, Colorado, Delaware, Georgia, Kansas, New Mexico, North Carolina, Oregon, South Carolina, and Virginia.

[30] On at least eight occasions this Court has declined to review state court decisions which involved restrictive anti-abortion laws. The eight denials are: Mucie v. Missouri, 398 U.S. 938 (June 1, 1970), denying cert. to 448 S.W.2d 879 (Mo. 1970) (manslaughter abortion conviction where patient died); California v. Belous, 397 U.S. 915 (Feb. 24, 1970), denying cert. to 71 Cal. 2d —, 458 P.2d 194, 80 Cal. Rptr. 354 (1969) (statute repealed after prosecution commenced); Molinaro v. New Jersey, 396 U.S. 365 (Jan. 19, 1970) (per curiam), dismissing appeal from 54 N.J. 245, 254 A.2d 792 (1969) (defendant jumped bail after appeal filed); Knight v. Louisiana Bd. of Medical Examiners, 395 U.S. 933 (June 2, 1969), denying cert. to 252 La. 889, 214 So.2d 716 (1968) (per curiam) (federal questions not properly raised and preserved); Morin v. Garra, 395 U.S. 935 (June 2, 1969), denying cert. to 53 N.J. 82 (1968) (per curiam) (same); Moretti v. New Jersey, 393 U.S. 952 (Nov. 18, 1968), denying cert. to 52 N.J. 182, 244 A.2d 499 (1968) (conspiracy conviction; abortion to have been performed by barber); Fulton v. Illinois, 390 U.S. 953 (Mar. 4, 1968), denying and state decisions attest to the substantiality of the federal questions. Moreover, the sometimes sharp divisions in the courts below illustrate further the need for a decision at this level. In showing that the Court has jurisdiction, and that the questions are substantial, Appellants will outline the divisions among lower courts.

In September, 1969, the Supreme Court of California became the first appellate court to recognize the constitutional stature of a "fundamental right of the woman to choose whether to bear children . . . ."[31] The Belous court found this right implicit in this Court's "repeated acknowledgment of a 'right of privacy' or 'liberty' in matters related to marriage, family, and sex."[32] cert. to 84 Ill. App.2d 280, 228 N.E.2d 203 (1967); Carter v. Florida, 376 U.S. 648 (Mar. 30, 1964), dismissing appeal from 150 So.2d 787 (Fla. 1963).

[31] California v. Belous, 71 Cal. 2d ——, ——, 458 P.2d 194, 199, 80 Cal. Rptr. 354, 359 (1969), cert. denied, 397 U.S. 915 (1970). Belous, a state court appeal of a conspiracy conviction of a physician, involved a statute worded almost identically to that in the present case.

One year earlier, a California trial court had ruled that the Eighth and Fourteenth Amendments prohibited license revocation proceedings against physicians who had performed hospital approved abortions on patients exposed in early pregnancy to German measles. The opinion of the trial court, however, simply enumerated those Amendments among various conclusions of law, without supporting the conclusions with any attempt at reasoned analysis. Nonetheless, the result, and the factual similarities between that and the present case, are of interest. See Shively v. Board of Medical Examiners, No. 590333 (Calif. Super. Ct., San Fran. County Sept. 24, 1968) (not reported), on remand from 65 Cal. 2d 475, 421 P.2d 65, 55 Cal. Rptr. 217 (1968) (granting physicians' motions for discovery, without reference to merits).

More recently, three different decisions by statutory three-judge federal courts have invalidated restrictions on access to medical abortion in Wisconsin and Georgia, as well as in the present case from Texas. The first, McCann v. Babbitz,[33] recognized in that jurisdiction a woman's > "basic right reserved to her under the ninth amendment to decide whether she should carry or reject an embryo which has not yet quickened." 310 F. Supp. at 302.

McCann grew out of the prosecution of a physician, but the three-judge court had no difficulty holding that a physician has standing to assert the rights of pregnant patients.[34]

The second recent federal decision is the present case, Roe v. Wade,[35] declaring the Texas anti-abortion statutes unconstitutional on the similar ground that

> "they deprive single women and married couples of their right, secured by the Ninth Amendment, to choose whether to have children."

[34] The standing of a physician to assert a patient's rights along with his own follows from Griswold v. Connecticut, 381 U.S. 479, 481 (1965), and Barrows v. Jackson, 346 U.S. 249, 257 (1953). On this standing point, lower court decisions involving abortion laws all agree. See also Planned Parenthood Ass'n of Phoenix v. Nelson, Civ. No. 70-334 PHX (D. Ariz. Aug. 24, 1970) (per curiam); Doe v. Bolton, —— F. Supp. ——, Civ. No. 13676 (N.D. Ga. July 31, 1970) (per curiam); Roe v. Wade, —— F. Supp. ——, Civ. No. 3-3690-B (N.D. Tex. [35] —— F. Supp. ——, Civ. No. 3-3690-B (N.D. Tex. June 17, 1970) (per curiam).

A third federal decision, Doe v. Bolton,[36] followed Belous, McCann, and Roe, holding:

> "[T]he concept of personal liberty embodies a right to privacy which apparently is also broad enough to include the decision to abort a pregnancy.
> ". . . [T]he reasons for an abortion may not be proscribed. . . ."

Numerous lower courts have followed this lead, in both federal and state disputes.[37] In addition, three-judge courts have been requested and/or convened in a number of states to consider questions quite similar to those raised here.[38] The convening of a statutory court, of course, requires that the questions presented be "substantial."[39]

Scholarly commentary also recognizes that these issues are of tremendous national importance, and "substantial" in the sense of warranting determination by this Court. Retired Justice Clark addressed himself to the applicability of Griswold in the abortion context more than a year ago.[40] According to Justice Clark's analysis,

> "Griswold's act[41] was to prevent formation of the fetus. This, the Court found, was constitutionally protected. If an individual may prevent conception, why can he not nullify that conception when prevention fails?"[42]

[42] Clark, supra note 40, at 9.

To examine Justice Clark's hypothetical question in the full constitutional context, and to decide the propriety of injunctive relief in this case, the Court should note probable jurisdiction, and set the matter down for full briefing and argument.

B. Having Determined the Merits in Appellants' Favor, the Three-Judge Court Should Have Enjoined Future Enforcement of the Invalid Statutes:

Not only do the substantive issues in this case involve important federal questions, but the remedy following judgment also presents a novel point on which this Court has not clearly ruled.

Although no state proceedings were pending or imminently threatened against Appellants Jane Roe, John Doe, and Mary Doe, or members of their respective classes, the District Court declined to grant any injunctive relief whatever. This denial of necessary relief is contrary to decisions by this Court, and has the probable effect of inviting federal-state friction, rather than lessening such untoward interaction. Moreover, the denial of injunctive relief to Dr. Hallford was equally improper, as he had requested an injunction against the commencement of any future prosecutions. As to charges then pending against Dr. Hallford, an injunction would have been proper in addition, for reasons which shall appear more fully hereinafter.

Relying entirely on Dombrowski v. Pfister, 380 U.S. 479 (1965), the three-judge court recognized a "federal policy of non-interference with state criminal prosecutions [which] must be followed except in cases where 'statutes are justifiably attacked on their face as abridging free expression,' or where statutes are justifiably attacked 'as applied for the purpose of discouraging protected activities.'" 380 U.S. at 489-90. The quote from Dombrowski, however, was not pertinent, for Appellants' principal thrust was not against pending prosecutions, but against any future enforcement and effects of the challenged statutes. The pregnant Plaintiff, Jane Roe, for example, could never be prosecuted under Texas law regardless of the number of abortions she underwent, but the statute, unless enjoined, would have the effect of keeping her from obtaining an abortion.

For the most part, Appellants were strangers to any existing or contemplated prosecutions. Their chief controversy was over the drastic impact of the statutes on their lives, not any possibility of imminent enforcement. In Dombrowski, the appellants were actively threatened with prosecution, and an injunction would necessarily have abated that threat by operating directly on law officers who stood ready to go forward with existing indictments. Accordingly, "special circumstances" were necessary to justify the conclusion ultimately reached.

If, however, Dombrowski had been purely a challenge to quantifiable and recurring effects of a state criminal statute, without the pendency of criminal charges, the case would have been different. This is shown by the ease with which this Court has reversed lower courts that refused declaratory and injunctive relief against loyalty oath statutes backed by criminal sanctions. See Keyishian v. Board of Regents, 385 U.S. 589 (1967); Baggett v. Bullitt, 377 U.S. 360, 365-66 (1964). Injunctive relief against the statute in Dombrowski would have presented no special problem, if the statute had been a loyalty oath backed by the very same criminal penalties, and no indictments had been waiting in the wings.

Dombrowski falls in the middle ground between (1) injunctive actions which are filed and completed prior to the commencement of any state criminal proceedings, and (2) actions which are filed after "proceedings in a State court," [43] are underway. The Dombrowski case itself was filed but not completed before State proceedings began.[44] Hence, while Dombrowski acknowledged that "[28 U.S.C. §2283 (1964 ed.)], and its predecessors do not preclude injunctions against the institution of state court proceedings, but only bar stays of suits already instituted," [45] this Court nonetheless required "special circumstances" to justify interference with a criminal proceeding begun shortly after the federal complaint was filed.

The present case lies chronologically in the earliest of the categories, (1), because, as to the bulk of relief sought against future enforcement of the anti-abortion statute, state proceedings have never been contemplated. Appellants were thus in the same position as petitioners contesting a loyalty oath that was backed by criminal sanctions. Their entitlement to an injunction against future enforcement should have followed as a matter of course. Put another way, Appellants were "strangers to [any pending] state court proceedings." Hale v. Bimco Trading Co.,

[43] 28 U.S.C. §2283 (1964 ed.).

[44] While Dombrowski did not clarify the thorny definitional problems surrounding the concept of a "proceeding" in a state court, the Court did hold that at least an indictment must be returned. The federal complaint came before the indictments in Dombrowski, and was held to relate back where a district court erroneously dismissed the complaint. An almost identical situation in the abortion context is before this Court in Hodgson v. Randall, No. 728, docketed Sept. 21, 1970, where law enforcement authorities secured the dismissal of a federal action for want of a case or controversy, and proceeded within two days to obtain an indictment against a physician who had been a federal plaintiff.

306 U.S. 375, 378 (1939) (Frankfurter, J.).[46] The fact of pending prosecutions against other physicians, or against Dr. Hallford based upon alleged past conduct, had no bearing on Appellants' request for prospective injunctive relief.

Accordingly, the three-judge court should have undertaken an inquiry as to the propriety of injunctive relief without reference to Dombrowski v. Pfister, and without any greater concern for hypothetical federal-state friction than exists in the ordinary case where state judicial machinery has not entered the controversy. Indeed, denial of injunctive relief was an open invitation for Texas authorities to maintain existing enforcement policies. Should this have occurred against Dr. Hallford, or any other physician member of the class he represented, a federal injunction would have been sought from the district court as "necessary in aid of its jurisdiction, or to protect or effectuate its"[47] declaratory judgment invalidating the statute. A confrontation between federal and state judiciary might then have ensued. To avoid such a possibility, the three-judge court should have enjoined future enforcement of the statute on June 17, 1970, when it ruled the statute invalid. In other words, an injunction ab initio would have prevented federal-state conflict, and enhanced the very policy the three-judge court thought it was following by denying the injunction.

[46] Hale teaches that strangers to state proceedings may secure federal injunctive relief against a state statute, even though the effect of the federal decision may be to confuse cases pending at the same time before the highest court of the state. Hale affirmed a three-judge court decision enjoining enforcement of a Florida statute although "the injunction in effect stayed proceedings in the Supreme Court of Florida." 306 U.S. at 376.

[47] 28 U.S.C. §2283 (1964 ed.).

A further reason for having granted the injunction was to avoid irreparable injury to individuals in the class of Jane Roe, and to physicians deterred by the ongoing possibility that the State might continue to enforce the statute until the controversy was determined by this Court. Without a coercive order on record, Texas law enforcement authorities are free to ignore the declaratory judgment rendered below, because the judgment is subject to possible reversal here. It requires no argument to show that a declaratory judgment by this Court ends the controversy,[48] but such judgments at the district court level carry much less practical import.

[48] A decision by this Court on the propriety of injunctive relief, however, is necessary for guidance of lower courts in similar future controversies. Otherwise, the law of the district courts would be final law in all cases where the merits were correctly resolved, but an injunction improperly denied. In addition, as commentators have frequently observed, this Court has not resolved a sufficient variety of cases concerning the parameters of 28 U.S.C. §2283 (1964 ed.), to provide answers to questions such as those presented here. The criteria for commencement of "proceedings in a State court," for example, are uncertain, as is the relevance of a State proceeding brought after a federal complaint. Also, the extent to which the anti-injunction statute affects declaratory judgments is in dispute, as well as the availability of injunctions against future prosecutions where one or more indictments is outstanding, or prosecutions threatened. Similarly, the availability of injunctive relief against prosecutions which threaten to inhibit wide areas of constitutionally protected conduct outside the First Amendment context is uncertain. For a more comprehensive review of the need for further guidelines from this Court in these areas, see Stickgold, Variations on the Theme of Dombrowski v. Pfister: Federal Intervention in State Criminal Proceedings Affecting First Amendment Rights, 1968 WIS. L. REV. 369; Brewer, Dombrowski v. Pfister: Federal Injunctions Against State Prosecutions in Civil Rights Cases—A New Trend in Federal-State Judicial Relations, 34 FORDHAM L. REV. 71 (1965); Note, The Federal Anti-Injunction Statute and Declaratory Judgments in Constitutional Litigation, 83 HARV. L. REV. 1870 (1970); Comment, Federal Injunctions Against State Actions, 35 GEO. WASH. L. REV. 744 (1967).

Appellant Dr. Hallford sought not only an injunction against future enforcement of the Texas anti-abortion statutes, but also an injunction to bar the commencement of State proceedings against him based upon two outstanding indictments. This request for injunctive relief presents several substantial questions which merit review by this Court.

Assuming that the district court improperly denied an injunction directed generally against future enforcement of the anti-abortion laws, one question is whether that injunction, if entered, should cover the commencement of prosecution under the aforesaid indictments. Whether a bare indictment, returned from the secrecy of a grand jury, alone constitutes a "proceeding in a State court" is an open question.[49] If there is no "proceeding," as this Court found in Dombrowski, the degree of irreparable injury needed to justify an injunction must apparently be considered nonetheless. Here, unlike Dombrowski, law enforcement authorities have not to date gone forward with prosecutions; hence the degree of friction between state and federal judicial systems is considerably lessened.

Also here, as in Griswold v. Connecticut,[50] and unlike Dombrowski, the permissible range of leeway for State regulation of marital and personal privacy is small. While government may regulate many facets of speech coupled with conduct, there is much doubt whether government can so intrude into the domain of privacy. Thus, to allow any prosecution at all of Dr. Hallford is to permit the State to invade the privacy of physician and patient in an area where the district court concluded that the State had little business at all.

[49] Taken together, Dombrowski, 380 U.S. at 484 n. 2, and Hill v. Martin, 296 U.S. 393, 403 (1935), suggest that a "proceeding" begins at some time after indictment. Respectable authorities argue that the indictment or information is an administrative act, done ex parte and in secrecy; hence, no "proceeding" exists until trial or arraignment, when both parties are first before a "State court." See Brewer, supra note 48, at 92; Comment, 35 GEO. WASH. L. REV. at 766-67.

If one assumes that 28 U.S.C. §2283 (1964 ed.), is prima facie a bar to an injunction on Dr. Hallford's behalf, the further question remains whether, notwithstanding §2283, an injunction would be "necessary in aid of [the three-judge court's] jurisdiction," or "to protect or effectuate" the outstanding declaratory judgment. On this theory, since the court had jurisdiction to grant an injunction on behalf of all parties, it would be incongruous to exclude Dr. Hallford. Indeed, the alleged patients who were aborted, according to the two indictments, might be able to enjoin the compulsion of process against them in order to protect their privacy.

In light of the above, the questions presented in this case, both on the merits, and with respect to relief, are substantial, novel, and hitherto unresolved by this Court. Accordingly, the Court should note probable jurisdiction, and set the case down for plenary review.

II.

A Married Couple, and Others Similarly Situated, Have Standing to Challenge the Texas Anti-Abortion Laws, Because Said Laws Have a Present and Destructive Effect on Their Marital Relations, They Are Unable to Utilize Fully Effective Contraceptive Methods, Pregnancy Would Seriously Harm the Woman's Health, and Such a Couple Could Not Obtain Judicial Relief in Sufficient Time After Pregnancy to Prevent Irreparable Injury.

A further aspect of the judgment below is presented on this appeal. In one part of the lower court's opinion is the holding that "Dr. Hallford has standing to raise the rights of his patients, single women and married couples, as well as rights of his own" (App. at 9a n. 3). Yet, the judgment states that "[p]laintiffs John and Mary Doe failed to allege facts sufficient to create a present controversy and therefore do not have standing" (App. at 5a). Accordingly, both declaratory and injunctive relief were denied as to John and Mary Doe.

John and Mary Doe alleged a present impact of the Texas anti-abortion laws on their marital relations which, when considered in light of their assertion of the interests of a class, created a present controversy over a future right to relief in the event Mary Doe or another class member became pregnant.

This Statement has already pointed out, supra at 6-7, that the judicial machinery is not equipped to grant relief to a party such as Mary Doe after she becomes pregnant. The only meaningful relief must be forthcoming prior to the twelfth week of pregnancy. While twelve weeks is a lengthy period of time, pregnancy is rarely detected before the fourth week, and often not until considerably later, depending upon the degree of medical sophistication of the patient.

Based upon an assumed size of the class represented by Mary Doe, and the known failure rate of the contraceptive she used, it would not be speculative to assume that one or more members of the class would be or become pregnant during the litigation. To assume to the contrary, as the district court did, was not only medically unsound, but served to elevate "ripeness" requirements to an unnecessarily high point, namely a point which deprived the entire class of the relief sought simply because no class member stepped forward as pregnant. Indeed, Jane Roe, the pregnant plaintiff, won a judgment which proved meaningless to her, because it was too late.

Ample precedent, moreover, could have been found to conclude that a present controversy existed between the Does and Appellees. Not only should the lower court have considered "'the hardship of denying judicial relief,'"[51] but the dilemma faced by the class of Mary Does when they become pregnant is "'capable of repetition, yet evading review' . . ." Moore v. Ogilvie, 394 U.S. 814, 816 (1969). The situation, admittedly difficult if one ignores its uniqueness, is nonetheless one in which the "mere possibility of [recurrence] . . . serves to keep the case alive." United States v. W. T. Grant Co., 345 U.S. 629, 633 (1953). To the extent that the lower court, almost without discussion, rejected the standing of John and Mary Doe for want of an Article III case or controversy, the court erred. To the Does the case was and is a very real one. There was never an absence of adversity. The relief requested had significant meaning for the Does throughout, and the denial of that relief could provide harmful precedent for similar situations. Accordingly, this Court should reverse the determination below, after noting jurisdiction to consider the claim by John and Mary Doe that they too were entitled to declaratory and injunctive relief.

CONCLUSION

For the reasons set out in this Jurisdictional Statement, the Court should note probable jurisdiction, and set the case down for plenary consideration with briefs on the merits and oral argument.

Before GOLDBERG, Circuit Judge, HUGHES and TAYLOR, District Judges.

Notice is hereby given that Jane Roe, Plaintiff, John Doe, Plaintiff, and Mary Doe, Plaintiff, as well as James Hubert Hallford, M.D., Intervenor, Appellants, hereby appeal to the Supreme Court of the United States from that part of the final judgment entered in the above causes on the 17th day of June, 1970, in favor of Defendant Henry Wade, and Responding Party Defendant, State of Texas, wherein the Court denied all injunctive relief prayed for by said Plaintiffs and Intervenor.

Notice is also given that John Doe and Mary Doe, Plaintiffs, Appellants, hereby appeal to the Supreme Court of the United States from that part of the final judgment entered in the above cause on the 17th day of June, 1970 in favor of Defendant, Henry Wade, and Responding Party Defendant, State of Texas, wherein the Court denied the standing of John Doe and Mary Doe to attack the constitutionality of the Texas Abortion Laws, Articles 1191, 1192, 1193, 1194 and 1196, Texas Penal Code.

This appeal is taken pursuant to Title 28, U.S.C., Section 1253.

I.

The Clerk will please prepare a transcript of the record in these causes, for transmission to the Clerk of the Supreme Court of the United States, and include in said transcript the following:

A. All pleadings of the parties in these causes including all briefs in support of the Plaintiffs' and Intervenor's pleadings.

B. The court reporter's transcription of the proceedings before the Court.

C. All evidentiary items on file in this cause including depositions, stipulations and request for admissions and replies thereto, if any.

D. All orders of the Court.

II.

The following questions are presented by this appeal:

A. Whether the Plaintiffs John Doe and Mary Doe had standing to challenge the constitutionality of Articles 1191, 1192, 1193, 1194, and 1196, Texas Penal Code?

B. Whether the Plaintiffs and Intervenor were entitled to a permanent injunction restraining Defendant Henry Wade from enforcing Articles 1191, 1192, 1193, 1194, and 1196, Texas Penal Code?

JUDGMENT

This action came on for hearing on motions for summary judgment before a three-judge court composed of Irving

L. Goldberg, Circuit Judge, Sarah T. Hughes and W. M. Taylor, Jr., District Judges. The defendant in both cases is Henry Wade, District Attorney of Dallas County, Texas. In one action plaintiffs are John and Mary Doe, husband and wife, and in the other Jane Roe and James Hubert [Hallford] M.D., intervenor.

The case having been heard on the merits, the Court, upon consideration of affidavits, briefs and arguments of counsel, finds as follows:

Findings of Fact

(1) Plaintiff Jane Roe, plaintiff-intervenor James Hubert Hallford, M.D. and the members of their respective classes have standing to bring this lawsuit.

(2) Plaintiffs John and Mary Doe failed to allege facts sufficient to create a present controversy and therefore do not have standing.

(3) Articles 1191, 1192, 1193, 1194 and 1196 of the Texas Penal Code, hereinafter referred to as the Texas Abortion Laws, are so written as to deprive single women and married persons of the opportunity to choose whether to have children.

(4) The Texas Abortion Laws are so vaguely worded as to produce grave and manifold uncertainties concerning the circumstances which would produce criminal liability.

Conclusions of Law

(1) This case is a proper one for a three-judge court.

(2) Abstention, concerning plaintiffs' request for a declaratory judgment, is unwarranted.

(3) The fundamental right of single women and married persons to choose whether to have children is protected by the Ninth Amendment, through the Fourteenth Amendment.

(4) The Texas Abortion Laws infringe upon this right.

(5) The defendant has not demonstrated that the infringement of plaintiffs' Ninth Amendment rights by the Texas Abortion Laws is necessary to support a compelling state interest.

(6) The Texas Abortion Laws are consequently void on their face because they are unconstitutionally overbroad.

(7) The Texas Abortion Laws are void on their face because they are vague in violation of the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment.

(8) Abstention, concerning plaintiffs' request for an injunction against the enforcement of the Texas Abortion Laws is warranted.

It is therefore ORDERED, ADJUDGED and DECREED that: (1) the complaint of John and Mary Doe be dismissed; (2) the Texas Abortion Laws are declared void on their face for unconstitutional overbreadth and for vagueness; (3) plaintiffs' application for injunction be dismissed.

Dated this the 17 day of June, 1970.

PER CURIAM:

Two similar cases are presently before the Court on motions for summary judgment pursuant to Rule 56 of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure. The defendant in both cases is Henry Wade, District Attorney of Dallas County, Texas. In one action plaintiffs are John and Mary Doe, and in the other Jane Roe and James Hubert Hallford, M.D., intervenor.[1]

From their respective positions of married couple, single woman, and practicing physician, plaintiffs attack Articles 1191, 1192, 1193, 1194, and 1196 of the Texas Penal Code,[2]

[1] On March 3, 1970, plaintiff Jane Roe filed her original complaint in CA-3-3690-B under the First, Fourth, Fifth, Eighth, Ninth, and Fourteenth Amendments to the United States Constitution. She alleged jurisdiction to be conferred upon the Court by Title 28, United States Code, Sections 131 [sic], 1343, 2201, 2202, 2281, and 2284 and by Title 42, United States Code Section 1983. On April 22, plaintiff Roe amended her complaint to sue "on behalf of herself and all others similarly situated."

On March 23, James Hubert Hallford, M.D., was given leave to intervene. Hallford's complaint recited the same constitutional and jurisdictional grounds as the complaint of plaintiff Roe. According to his petition for intervention, Hallford seeks to represent "himself and the class of people who are physicians, licensed to practice medicine under the laws of the State of Texas and who fear future prosecution."

On March 3, 1970, plaintiffs John and Mary Doe filed their original complaint in CA-3-3691-C. The complaint of plaintiffs Doe recited the same constitutional and jurisdictional grounds as had the complaint of plaintiff Roe in CA-3-3690[B] and, like Roe, plaintiffs Doe subsequently amended their complaint so as to assert a class action.

Plaintiffs Roe and Doe have adopted pseudonyms for purposes of anonymity.

If any person shall designedly administer to a pregnant woman or knowingly procure to be administered with her consent any drug or medicine, or shall use towards her any violence or means whatever externally or internally applied, and thereby procure an abortion, he shall be confined in the penitentiary not less than two nor hereinafter referred to as the Texas Abortion Laws. Plaintiffs allege that the Texas Abortion Laws deprive married couples and single women of the right to choose whether to have children, a right secured by the Ninth Amendment.

Defendant challenges the standing of each of the plaintiffs to bring this action. However, it appears to the Court that Plaintiff Roe and plaintiff-intervenor Hallford occupy positions vis-a-vis the Texas Abortion Laws sufficient to differentiate them from the general public. Compare Pierce v. Society of Sisters, 268 U.S. 510 (1925), and Griswold v. Connecticut, 381 U.S. 479 (1965),[3] with Frothingham v. Mellon, 262 U.S. 447 (1923). Plaintiff Roe filed her portion of the suit as a pregnant woman wishing to exercise the as-more than five years; if it be done without her consent, the punishment shall be doubled. By "abortion" is meant that the life of the fetus or embryo shall be destroyed in the woman's womb or that a premature birth thereof be caused.

Article 1192 Furnishing the Means

Whoever furnishes the means for procuring an abortion knowing the purpose intended is guilty as an accomplice.

Article 1193 Attempt at Abortion

If the means used shall fail to produce an abortion, the offender is nevertheless guilty of an attempt to produce abortion, provided it be shown that such means were calculated to produce that result, and shall be fined not less than one hundred nor more than one thousand dollars.

Article 1194 Murder in Producing Abortion

If the death of the mother is occasioned by an abortion so produced or by an attempt to effect the same it is murder.

Article 1196 By Medical Advice

Nothing in this chapter applies to an abortion procured or attempted by medical advice for the purpose of saving the life of the mother.

[3] By the authority of Griswold, Dr. Hallford has standing to raise the rights of his patients, single women and married couples, as well as rights of his own.

serted constitutional right to choose whether to bear the child she was carrying. Intervenor Hallford alleged in his portion of the suit that, in the course of daily exercise of his duty as a physician and in order to give his patients access to what he asserts to be their constitutional right to choose whether to have children, he must act so as to render criminal liability for himself under the Texas Abortion Laws a likelihood. Dr. Hallford further alleges that Article 1196 of the Texas Abortion Laws is so vague as to deprive him of warning of what produces criminal liability in that portion of his medical practice and consultations involving abortions.

On the basis of plaintiffs' substantive contentions,[4] it appears that there then exists a "nexus between the status asserted by the litigant[s] and the claim[s] [they present]." Flast v. Cohen, 392 U.S. 83, 102 (1968).

Further, we are satisfied that there presently exists a degree of contentiousness between Roe and Hallford and the defendant to establish a "case of actual controversy" as required by Title 28, United States Code, Section 2201. Golden v. Zwickler, 394 U.S. 103 (1969).

Each plaintiff seeks as relief, first, a judgment declaring the Texas Abortion Laws unconstitutional on their face and, second, an injunction against their enforcement. The nature of the relief requested suggests the order in which the issues presented should be passed upon.[5] Accordingly, we see the issues presented as follows:

[4] "[I]n ruling on standing, it is both appropriate and necessary to look to the substantive issues * * * to determine whether there is a logical nexus between the status asserted and the claim sought to be adjudicated." Flast v. Cohen, 392 U.S. 83, 102 (1968).

[5] Zwickler v. Koota, 389 U.S. 241, 254 (1967); Cameron v. Johnson, 390 U.S. 611, 615 (1968).

I. Are plaintiffs entitled to a declaratory judgment that the Texas Abortion Laws are unconstitutional on their face?

II. Are plaintiffs entitled to an injunction against the enforcement of these laws?

I.

Defendants have suggested that this Court should abstain from rendering a decision on plaintiffs' request for a declaratory judgment. However, we are guided to an opposite conclusion by the authority of Zwickler v. Koota, 389 U.S. 241, 248-249 (1967):

> "The judge-made doctrine of abstention • • • sanctions • • • escape only in narrowly limited 'special circumstances.' • • • One of the 'special circumstances' • • • is the susceptibility of a state statute of [sic] a construction by the state courts that would avoid or modify the constitutional question."

The Court in Zwickler v. Koota subsequently quoted from United States v. Livingston, 179 F. Supp. 9, 12-13 (E.D. S.C. 1959):

> "Regard for the interest and sovereignty of the state and reluctance needlessly to adjudicate constitutional issues may require a federal District Court to abstain from adjudication if the parties may avail themselves of an appropriate procedure to obtain state interpretation of state laws requiring construction. • • • The decision in [Harrison v. N.A.A.C.P., 369 U.S. 167], however, is not a broad encyclical commanding automatic remission to the state courts of all federal constitutional questions arising in the application of > state statutes. • • • Though never interpreted by a state court, if a state statute is not fairly subject to an interpretation which will avoid or modify the federal constitutional question, it is the duty of a federal court to decide the federal question when presented to it. Any other course would impose expense and long delay upon the litigants without hope of its bearing fruit."[6]

Inasmuch as there is no possibility that state question adjudication in the courts of Texas would eliminate the necessity for this Court to pass upon plaintiffs' Ninth Amendment claim or Dr. Hallford's attack on Article 1196 for vagueness, abstention as to their request for declaratory judgment is unwarranted. Compare Chicago v. Atchison T. & S.F.R. Co., 357 U.S. 77, 84 (1958), with Reetz v. Bozanich, 38 U.S.L.W. 4170, —— U.S. —— (1970).

On the merits, plaintiffs argue as their principal contention[7] that the Texas Abortion Laws must be declared unconstitutional because they deprive single women and married couples of their right, secured by the Ninth Amendment,[8] to choose whether to have children. We agree.

The essence of the interest sought to be protected here is the right of choice over events which, by their character and consequences, bear in a fundamental manner on the privacy of individuals. The manner by which such interests are secured by the Ninth Amendment is illustrated by the concurring opinion of Mr. Justice Goldberg in Griswold v. Connecticut, 381 U.S. 479, 492 (1965):

[7] Aside from their Ninth Amendment and vagueness arguments, plaintiffs have presented an array of constitutional arguments. However, as plaintiffs conceded in oral argument, these additional arguments are peripheral to the main issues. Consequently, they will not be passed upon.

> "[T]he Ninth Amendment shows a belief of the Constitution's authors that fundamental rights exist that are not expressly enumerated in the first eight amendments and intent that the list of rights included there not be deemed exhaustive." • • •
> "The Ninth Amendment simply shows the intent of the Constitution's authors that other fundamental personal rights should not be denied such protection or disparaged in any other way simply because they are not specifically listed in the first eight constitutional amendments." (Emphasis added.)[9]

Relative sanctuaries for such "fundamental" interests have been established for the family,[10] the marital couple,[11] and the individual.[12]

[9] At 492 the opinion states: "In determining which rights are fundamental, judges are not left at large to decide cases in light of their personal and private notions. Rather, they must look to the 'traditions and [collective] conscience of our people' to determine whether a principle is 'so rooted [there] . . . as to be ranked as fundamental.' Snyder v. Massachusetts, 291 U.S. 97, 105. The inquiry is whether a right involved 'is of such a character that it cannot be denied without violating those "fundamental principles of liberty and justice which lie at the base of all our civil and political institutions. . . ."' Powell v. Alabama, 287 U.S. 45, 67."

[10] Pierce v. Society of Sisters, 268 U.S. 510 (1925); Meyer v. Nebraska, 262 U.S. 390 (1923); and Prince v. Massachusetts, 321 U.S. 158 (1944).

Freedom to choose in the matter of abortions has been accorded the status of a "fundamental" right in every case coming to the attention of this Court where the question has been raised. Babbitz v. McCann, —— F. Supp. —— (E.D. Wis. 1970); People v. Belous, 80 Cal. Rptr. 354, 458 P.2d 194 (Cal. 1969); State v. Munson, —— (South Dakota Circuit Court, Pennington County, April 6, 1970). Accord, United States v. Vuitch, 305 F. Supp. 1032 (D. D.C. 1969). The California Supreme Court in Belous stated:

> "The fundamental right of the woman to choose whether to bear children follows from the Supreme Court's and this Court's repeated acknowledgment of a 'right of privacy' or 'liberty' in matters related to marriage, family, and sex." 458 P.2d at 199.

The District Court in Vuitch wrote:

> "There has been * * * an increasing indication in the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States that as a secular matter a woman's liberty and right of privacy extends to family, marriage and sex matters and may well include the right to remove an unwanted child at least in early stages of pregnancy." 305 F. Supp. at 1035.

Writing in [on] Griswold v. Connecticut, supra, and the decisions leading up to it, former Associate Justice Tom C. Clark observed:

> "The result of these decisions is the evolution of the concept that there is a certain zone of individual privacy which is protected by the Constitution. Unless the State has a compelling subordinating interest that outweighs the individual rights of human beings, it may not interfere with a person's marriage, home, children and day-to-day living habits. This is one of the most fundamental concepts that the Founding Fathers had in mind when they drafted the Constitution." [13]

Since the Texas Abortion Laws infringe upon plaintiffs' fundamental right to choose whether to have children, the burden is on the defendant to demonstrate to the satisfaction of the Court that such infringement is necessary to support a compelling state interest.[14] The defendant has failed to meet this burden.

To be sure, the defendant has presented the Court with several compelling justifications for state presence in the area of abortions. These include the legitimate interests of the state in seeing to it that abortions are performed by competent persons and in adequate surroundings. Concern over abortion of the "quickened" fetus may well rank as another such interest. The difficulty with the Texas Abortion Laws is that, even if they promote these interests,[15] they far outstrip these justifications in their impact by prohibiting all abortions except those performed "for the purpose of saving the life of the mother."[16]

[14] "In a long series of cases this Court has held that where fundamental personal liberties are involved, they may not be abridged by the States simply on a showing that a regulatory statute has some rational relationship to the effectuation of a proper state purpose. 'Where there is a significant encroachment upon personal liberty, the State may prevail only upon showing a subordinating interest which is compelling,' Bates v. Little Rock, 361 U.S. 516, 524." Griswold v. Connecticut, 381 U.S. 479, 497 (1965) (Concurring opinion of Mr. Justice Goldberg). See also Kramer v. Union Free School District, 395 U.S. 621 (1969).

It is axiomatic that the fact that a statutory scheme serves permissible or even compelling state interests will not save it from the consequences of unconstitutional overbreadth. E.g., Thornhill v. Alabama, 319 U.S. 88 (1940); Buchanan v. Batchelor, —— F. Supp. —— (N.D. Tex. 1970). While the Ninth Amendment right to choose to have an abortion is not unqualified or unfettered, a statute designed to regulate the circumstances of abortions must restrict its scope to compelling state interests. There is unconstitutional overbreadth in the Texas Abortion Laws because the Texas Legislature did not limit the scope of the statutes to such interests. On the contrary, the Texas statutes, in their monolithic interdiction, sweep far beyond any areas of compelling state interest.

Not only are the Texas Abortion Laws unconstitutionally overbroad, they are also unconstitutionally vague. The Supreme Court has declared that "a statute which either forbids or requires the doing of an act in terms so vague that men of common intelligence must necessarily guess at its meaning and differ as to its application violates the first essential of due process of law." Connally v. General Construction Co., 269 U.S. 385, 391 (1926). "No one may be required at peril of life, liberty, or property to speculate as to the meaning of penal statutes. All are entitled to be informed as to what the State commands or forbids." Lanzetta v. New Jersey, 306 U.S. 451, 453 (1929). See also Giaccio v. Pennsylvania, 382 U.S. 399, 402-403 (1966). Under this standard the Texas statutes fail the vagueness test.

[15] It is not clear whether the Texas laws presently serve the interests asserted by the defendant. For instance, the Court gathers from a reading of the challenged statutes that they presently would permit an abortion "for the purpose of saving the life of the mother" to be performed anywhere and quite possibly by one other than a physician.

The Texas Abortion Laws fail to provide Dr. Hallford and physicians of his class with proper notice of what acts in their daily practice and consultation will subject them to criminal liability. Article 1196 provides:

> "Nothing in this chapter applies to an abortion procured or attempted by medical advice for the purpose of saving the life of the mother."

It is apparent that there are grave and manifold uncertainties in the application of Article 1196. How likely must death be? Must death be certain if the abortion is not performed? Is it enough that the woman could not undergo birth without an ascertainably higher possibility of death than would normally be the case? What if the woman threatened suicide if the abortion was not performed? How imminent must death be if the abortion is not performed? Is it sufficient if having the child will shorten the life of the woman by a number of years? These questions simply cannot be answered.

The grave uncertainties in the application of Article 1196 and the consequent uncertainty concerning criminal liability under the related abortion statutes are more than sufficient to render the Texas Abortion Laws unconstitutionally vague in violation of the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment.

II.

We come finally to a consideration of the appropriateness of plaintiffs' request for injunctive relief. Plaintiffs have suggested in oral argument that, should the Court declare the Texas Abortion Laws unconstitutional, that decision would of itself warrant the issuance of an injunction against state enforcement of the statutes. However, the Court is of the opinion that it must abstain from granting the injunction.

Clearly, the question whether to abstain concerning an injunction against the enforcement of state criminal laws is divorced from concerns of abstention in rendering a declaratory judgment. Quoting from Zwickler v. Koota,

> "[A] request for a declaratory judgment that a state statute is overbroad on its face must be considered independently of any request for injunctive relief against enforcement of that statute. We hold that a federal district court has the duty to decide the appropriateness and merits of the declaratory request irrespective of its conclusion as to the propriety of the issuance of the injunction." 389 U.S. at 254.

The strong reluctance of federal courts to interfere with the process of state criminal procedure was reflected in Dombrowski v. Pfister, 380 U.S. 479, 484-485 (1965):

> "[T]he Court has recognized that federal interference with a State's good-faith administration of its criminal laws is peculiarly inconsistent with our federal frame> work. It is generally to be assumed that state courts and prosecutors will observe constitutional limitations as expounded by this Court, and that the mere possibility of erroneous initial application of constitutional standards will usually not amount to the irreparable injury necessary to justify a disruption of orderly state proceedings."

This federal policy of non-interference with state criminal prosecutions must be followed except in cases where "statutes are justifiably attacked on their face as abridging free expression," or where statutes are justifiably attacked "as applied for the purpose of discouraging protected activities." Dombrowski v. Pfister, 380 U.S. at 489-490.

Neither of the above prerequisites can be found here. While plaintiffs' first substantive argument rests on notions of privacy which are to a degree common to the First and Ninth Amendments, we do not believe that plaintiffs can seriously argue that the Texas Abortion Laws are vulnerable "on their face as abridging free expression." [17] Further, deliberate application of the statutes "for the purpose of discouraging protected activities" has not been alleged. We therefore conclude that we must abstain from issuing an injunction against enforcement of the Texas Abortion Laws.

[17] "[T]he door is not open to all who would test the validity of state statutes or conduct a federally supervised pre-trial of a state prosecution by the simple expedient of alleging that the prosecution somehow affects First Amendment rights." Porter v. Kimzey, 309 F. Supp. 993, 995 (N.D. Ga. 1970).

Conclusion

In the absence of any contested issues of fact, we hold that the motions for summary judgment of the plaintiff Roe and plaintiff-intervenor Hallford should be granted as to their request for declaratory judgment. In granting declaratory relief, we find the Texas Abortion Laws unconstitutional for vagueness and overbreadth, though for the reasons herein stated we decline to issue an injunction. We need not here delineate the factors which could qualify the right of a mother to have an abortion. It is sufficient to state that legislation concerning abortion must address itself to more than a bare negation of that right.

ON APPEAL FROM THE UNITED STATES DISTRICT COURT FOR THE NORTHERN DISTRICT OF GEORGIA

OPINION BELOW

The opinions of the United States District Court for the Northern District of Georgia are not yet reported. The opinion of the Court dated July 31, 1970, is set out in the Appendix, pp. 1a-15a. The judgment of the Court dated August 24, 1970, is set out in the Appendix, pp. 1b-3b. The amended judgment dated October 13, 1970, is set out in the Appendix, pp. 1c-4c.

JURISDICTION

This action was brought under the first, ninth, and fourteenth amendments of the Constitution of the United States and 42 U.S.C. § 1983. Jurisdiction was conferred by 28 U.S.C. §§ 1343, 2201, 2202, 2281 and 2284.

Appellants brought this class action on April 16, 1970, seeking a declaratory judgment that the Georgia abortion statute, Ga. Code §§ 26-1201-03 et seq., was unconstitutional and seeking injunctive relief against its enforcement. A Motion for Temporary Restraining Order was denied on May 4, 1970. A statutory three-judge district court was convened and heard oral argument on June 15, 1970. By opinion dated July 31, 1970, judgment dated August 24, 1970, and amended opinion dated October 13, 1970, portions of Ga. Code § 1202 were declared unconstitutional. The court, however, refused to enjoin future enforcement of said Code sections. In its original opinion, judgment, and amended opinion the court denied declaratory and injunctive relief as to the remainder of said statute, holding it to be a valid exercise of state authority, additionally, the district court granted a motion to dismiss all plaintiffs except Mary Doe, thereby denying any declaratory and injunctive relief to doctors, nurses, social workers, ministers, and counsellors. This appeal is from the denial of injunctive relief and denial of relief from the remainder of the statute and to the dismissed plaintiffs. Notice of Appeal was filed in the United States District Court for the Northern District of Georgia on September 18, 1970), (Appendix, pp. 1d-2d). An Amended Notice of Appeal was filed November 3, 1970, (Appendix, pp. 1e-2e).

The jurisdiction of the Supreme Court to review the district court's denial of an injunction by direct appeal is conferred by 28 U.S.C. § 1253. The following decisions sustain the jurisdiction of the Supreme Court to review the judgment on direct appeal in this case: Evans v. Cornman, 398 U.S. 419, 420 (1970); Goldberg v. Kelly, 397 U.S. 254, 261 (1970); Moore v. Fidelity & Deposit

Co. 272 U.S. 317, 321 (1926) and Sterling v. Constantin, 287 U.S. 378 (1932).[1]

STATUTE INVOLVED

The statute in question is Ga. Code §§ 26-1201-03 hereafter referred to as the Georgia abortion statute. Due to the length of the statute, it is set out in the Appendix, pp. 1f-4f. Those sections of the statute declared unconstitutional by the district court are italicized.

QUESTIONS PRESENTED

1. Whether the three-judge court should have enjoined future enforcement of those provisions of the Georgia abortion statute which it declared unconstitutional in order to effectuate its declaratory judgment and to prevent irreparable injury to the rights of the class of pregnant women who seek safe abortions and the class of

---

[1]The recent line of cases defining the Court's jurisdiction under 28 U.S.C. § 1253 does not affect this case. Mitchell v. Donovan, 398 U.S. 427 (1970), involved an action in which plaintiffs originally asked for injunctive relief to get names on a 1968 ballot. On final determination after the election, the court held that because plaintiffs requested injunctive relief only as to the 1968 election there was no case or controversy and declined to issue a declaratory judgment. On appeal this Court ruled that the order appealed from was no more than a denial of a declaratory judgment. Gunn v. University Committee to End the War, 399 U.S. 383 (1970) also involved only a declaratory judgment. There the district court indicated plaintiffs were entitled to an injunction but postponed action pending the next session of the legislature. Thus, there was no order or judgment granting or denying an injunction. The present case is also distinguishable from Babbitz v. McCann, 310 F. Supp. 293 (E.D. Wis. 1970), appeal dismissed, 39 U.S. L.W. 3144 (October 12, 1970). There the three-judge district court issued a declaratory judgment but declined to issue an injunction. The defendant, against whom no injunction was issued, was the appellant. Had the plaintiff below, whose request for injunctive relief was denied, appealed that decision, the Supreme Court would have had jurisdiction. Here plaintiffs' request for temporary restraining order and prayer for injunctive relief were expressly denied (Opinion dated July 31, 1970, p. 14-a, and Judgment dated August 24, 1970, p. 3-b). This is an "appeal . . . from an order . . . denying . . . an interlocutory or permanent injunction . . . ." 28 U.S.C. § 1253.

physicians who are forced to refuse such women this medical service because of a reasonable fear of prosecution.

2. Whether the remaining sections of the Georgia abortion statute, as to which the three-judge court denied declaratory and injunctive relief, and which by allowing abortions only when a doctor finds it "necessary" and only after cumbersome procedures without due process standards (1) infringe upon the right of appellant-physicians and members of their class to practice their profession without unreasonable state interference; (2) fail to provide sufficient warning as to the conduct proscribed; and (3) infringe upon the right of appellant Mary Doe and members of her class to decide when to bear children in violation of constitutional guarantees of due process and equal protection.

3. Whether appellant-physicians, nurses, social workers, ministers, and family planning and abortion counselling organizations have sufficient "collision of interest" to challenge the Georgia abortion statute.

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

Mary Doe[2] is a 22 year old woman who was approximately eleven weeks pregnant at the time the complaint was filed in this case. Mrs. Doe and her husband were unemployed, their marriage had been unstable, and during the pendency of this suit, her husband abandoned her. Mrs. Doe sought to terminate her pregnancy because she was emotionally and economically unable to care for and support another child. She is the mother of three other children; her third child was placed with adoptive parents at birth and the other two children were removed from her custody by state authorities because of her inability to care for them.

[2] The facts set forth herein are taken from the complaint, unless otherwise specified, which was taken as true. The court allowed this action to be prosecuted in this fictitious name so as to avoid embarrassment to the plaintiff. Even though the time passed in which Mrs. Doe could have been safely aborted, the court proceeded to resolve the issues on behalf of the class and did not require the substitution of another pregnant plaintiff.

Mrs. Doe applied for an abortion at Grady Memorial Hospital in Atlanta.[3] After a period of three weeks, she was notified that her application had been denied by the hospital's abortion committee because she did not come within one of the three reasons specified in the Georgia abortion statute. This class action was filed in the United States District Court on April 16, 1970, seeking injunctive and declaratory relief based on the unconstitutionality of the statute. Mrs. Doe's application for temporary relief was denied by order dated May 4, 1970.[4]

Appellant-physicians who are obstetricians, gynecologists, psychiatrists, medical school professors and general practitioners of medicine, brought this action on their behalf and on behalf of members of their profession, seeking to declare the statute an unconstitutional infringement on the practice of their profession and the physician-patient relationship, and further asserted the statute unconstitutionally vague in violation of due process requirements. Appellant-physicians are regularly called upon by their patients to perform or arrange for medically induced abortions. Appellants desired to perform or arrange this medical service for their patients, but felt constrained from doing so because of the lack of clarity of the Georgia abortion statute, its criminal sanctions against abortions not authorized by its terms, and the re-

[4] A subsequent application for an abortion through private physicians to a private hospital was approved, but Mrs. Doe did not have funds with which to pay her hospital bill in advance so she was unable to obtain an abortion at the private hospital. (Answers to interrogatories filed June 15, 1970.) Also, she was financially unable to travel to some other state which has less restrictive interpretation of abortion limitations. Her remaining alternatives were to continue her pregnancy or risk her life and health at the hands of a non-medical criminal abortionist.

lated threat of revocation or suspension of their license to practice medicine.[5]

Defendants below raised the issue of "standing" and "justiciability" of the controversy as to the physicians, nurses, ministers, social workers, and organizations. The court found that all plaintiffs had standing, but that only Mary Doe had sufficient "collision of interest" to present a justiciable controversy.

As to the merits of Mary Doe's class action, the three-judge court held that "the concept of personal liberty embodies a right to privacy which apparently is also broad enough to include the decision to abort a pregnancy." (Appendix, p. 11a). The court ruled that (reasons for an abortion may not be proscribed, but that the quality of the decision as well as the manner of its execution are properly within the realm of state control . . ." (Appendix, p. 13a). Thus, the portion of the statute which allowed only three reasons for abortion (impairment of health of the woman, rape, or fetus malformation) was declared unconstitutional but the remainder of the statute was declared to be a "proper exercise of state power." The remainder of the statute is basically the procedural steps for obtaining an abortion and provisions as to who can perform abortions and where abortions may be performed.

Appellants assert here that the statute as revised by the court below remains as a barrier to the constitutional rights asserted and will obstruct and interfere with such rights unless declaratory and injunctive relief is granted to all plaintiffs.

THE QUESTIONS ARE SUBSTANTIAL

This appeal presents important federal questions which have not been resolved by this Court. The three-judge court's refusal to grant injunctive relief against enforcement of portions of a statute declared facially unconstitutional raises important issues for enforcement and vindication of constitutional rights. This Court has not in recent years considered the propriety of injunctive relief against future enforcement of criminal statutes except in the area of first amendment rights. Appellants claimed an infringement on such rights, and a decision of this Court is needed to clarify the availability of injunctive relief based on first amendment and other constitutional rights.

BLEED THROUGH

Defense of criminal prosecutions in the state courts by physicians is a wholly inadequate means of determining the rights of physicians to perform abortions and the rights of women to decide when to have children. Due to inherent time limitations of pregnancy, there is no time to have the correctness of a physician's decision reviewed prior to performing the act which results in criminal liability, and such would be an unworkable procedure in any event. Thus, appellant-physicians and members of Mary Doe's class need to have the questions presented in this case resolved.

The substantive issues here are of national import and affect the lives and health of thousands of people each year. This case involves some issues raised in four other cases which have been docketed in this Court, but because an entirely different and more modern abortion statute[6] is involved in this case, oral argument and a plenary review by the Court is warranted. Because of the limited function of the Jurisdictional Statement and the complexity of issues, appellants will not attempt to develop all arguments in depth but will show the questions presented are substantial.

[6] The Georgia statute is modeled after the American Law Institute MODEL PENAL CODE § 230.3, et seq. (Proposed Official Draft 1962). The other cases involve the older statutes which permitted abortions only to "save" or "preserve the life" of the woman. See n. 11-13 for other cases docketed in this Court.

I.

THE THREE JUDGE COURT SHOULD HAVE ENJOINED FUTURE ENFORCEMENT OF THOSE PROVISIONS OF THE GEORGIA ABORTION STATUTE WHICH IT DECLARED UNCONSTITUTIONAL BECAUSE AN INJUNCTION WAS NECESSARY TO EFFECTUATE THE DECLARATORY JUDGMENT AND TO PREVENT IRREPARABLE INJURY TO IMPORTANT FEDERAL RIGHTS TO THE CLASS OF PREGNANT WOMEN WHO ARE OR WILL BE SEEKING ABORTIONS AND THE CLASS OF PHYSICIANS WHO ARE FORCED TO REJECT SUCH WOMEN AS PATIENTS OR FEAR PROSECUTION IF THEY PROVIDE THE MEDICAL SERVICES THEY DEEM NEEDED.

A. The subject matter of this appeal involves substantial federal constitutional questions.

On the merits below, appellant Mary Doe argued successfully that the concept of personal liberty included the right to privacy in deciding when to bear children and that the right to plan one's family included the right to terminate an unwanted pregnancy. The court based its decision primarily on Griswold v. Connecticut, 381 U.S. 479 (1965), without adopting either the majority view of the penumbral zone of privacy created by several fundamental guarantees or the concurring opinion concept of personal liberty preserved by the ninth amendment. The statute, insofar as it specified reasons for which an abortion was permitted, was declared overbroad by the court stating:

> This the State may not do, because such action unduly restricts a decision sheltered by the constitutional right of privacy. (Appendix p. 13a)

BLEED THROUGH

The constitutional right of privacy which includes a right to terminate an unwanted pregnancy presents a substantial federal constitutional question of national import and importance. Appellants assert that the judgment below, insofar as it recognizes the right of privacy, should be affirmed and this right accorded constitutional status by this Court.

The status of abortion as a criminal act has resulted in a state and national health problem of immense proportions. Because termination of pregnancy by physicians has virtually been prohibited by law, women have turned to self-induced "coat hanger" abortions or placed themselves in the untrained hands of illegal abortionists. In Georgia alone, there were 205 reported deaths from illegal abortion in the years 1950 to 1969,[7] and a number of these occurred after Georgia had adopted what is characterized as a "liberal" abortion statute. Since these abortions are illegal and subject those performing them to imprisonment for up to ten years there is no way to determine accurately the number of deaths per year they cause, much less to establish the number of women risking such death. Researchers in this area estimate that in the United States 200,000 to 1,000,000 abortions are illegally induced each year.[8] Additionally there are authoritative estimates of 750,000 to 1,000,000 unwanted children born each year. The multitude of psychological, emotional, economic, and sociological problems resulting to the unwilling parents and unwanted children could not possibly be discussed here, but these problems must be recognized as part of the impact of our abortion laws. One must conclude that abortion statutes, such as the Georgia statute, affect the conduct, health, and happiness of literally millions of Americans each year.

The national significance of the issues involved in this case may be seen from activities in three major areas. First, the position of the medical profession has changed in an effort to rid our country of this health problem. On June 25, 1970, the House of Delegates of the American Medical Association adopted a policy permitting licensed physicians to perform abortions in hospitals or an approved clinical setting upon consultation with two other physicians.[9] The Executive Board of the American College of Obstetricians and Gynecologists in August, 1970, similarly adopted a more liberal policy permitting the performance of an abortion based on the decision of a physician or his patient. If the decision is based on a physician's recommendation then another physician is to be consulted; if the procedure is done on the request of the woman nothing other than her written request is necessary under this new policy.

Secondly, several state legislatures have amended the abortion statutes on their books, most of which had been enacted in the mid-nineteenth century and allowed abortions only to preserve the life of the mother. Since 1967 twelve states, including Georgia, adopted abortion statutes similar to the provisions of the 1962 Draft of the MODEL PENAL CODE, and in 1970, Alaska, Hawaii, and New York removed substantially all limitations on abortions by physicians during the early stages of pregnancy. Recently the Commissioners on Uniform State Laws issued a Second Tentative Draft of a UNIFORM ABORTION ACT which would allow abortions by licensed physicians "within 24 weeks after the commencement of pregnancy, or if after 24 weeks . . ." for the reasons permitted under the MODEL PENAL CODE.

The third area involves recent litigation in state and lower federal courts of the constitutionality of state abortion statutes. The Supreme Court of California, in State v. Belous, 71 Cal. 2d 996, 458 P. 2d 194, 80 Cal. Rptr. 354 (1969), cert. denied, 397 U.S. 915 (1970), was the first court to recognize the constitutional status of a "fundamental right of the woman to choose whether to bear children . . ." finding this right in the line of Supreme Court cases such as Griswold, supra, Loving v. Virginia, 388 U.S. 1, 12 (1967), and Skinner v. Oklahoma ex rel. Williamson, 316 U.S. 535, 536, 1942), which recognized a " 'right of privacy' or 'liberty' in matters related to marriage, family and sex." In Babbitz v. McCann,[10] a federal three-judge court recognized that a woman had a "basic right reserved to her under the ninth amendment to decide whether she should carry or reject an embryo which had not yet quickened." Another three-judge court, in Roe v. Wade,[11] ruled the Texas abortion statute unconstitutional on the ground that such statutes "deprive single women and married couples of their right, secured by the Ninth Amendment, to choose whether to have children." These specific holdings, together with similar comments in United States v. Vuitch[12] and in numerous other lower court decisions, illustrate the national significance of the fundamental constitutional rights being claimed in this case.

Although this Court will probably hear argument of the Vuitch case this term, and three other cases remain on the docket (Roe and two cases involving the Minnesota abortion statute[18]), it is unlikely that a decision in any of those cases will dispose of the issues involved in this case. The cases presently docketed all involve older type abortion statutes which permit abortions only to "save" or "preserve" the life of the woman, while the Georgia abortion statute is patterned after the MODEL PENAL CODE provisions allowing abortions on the basis of other limited factors. Nor do any of the docketed cases involve, as does this case, a partial invalidation of an abortion statute where the reasons for allowing an abortion have been stricken but the procedural mechanisms for legally reaching such decision have been left intact. Because of these unique features, a decision in this case will be important not only to the citizens of Georgia and the other eleven states having versions of the MODEL PENAL CODE abortion statute but also as guidance to state legislatures throughout the nation in this developing area of constitutional rights.

B. The three-judge court should have enjoined the future enforcement of those portions of the Georgia abortion statute which it declared unconstitutional.

This action was brought under 28 U.S.C. §§ 2281-84 and 48 U.S.C. § 1983. There was no pending state court proceeding against any of the plaintiffs below. An injunction was denied, however, "on the same basis as such a prayer would be denied were a state proceeding actually in progress...." The court relied upon City of Greenwood v. Peacock, 384 U.S. 808, 828 (1968); the quotation excerpted by the court is > the vindication of defendant's federal rights is left to the state courts except in the rare situations where it can be clearly predicted . . . that > those rights will inevitably be denied by the very act of bringing the defendant to trial in the state court.

Reliance on this excerpt is misplaced since the Peacock case involved the removal of pending state criminal prosecutions. Certainly federal courts do not enjoin pending state court proceedings except in very limited circumstances because they are expressly prohibited from doing so by the anti-injunction statute, 28 U.S.C. § 2283. But that statute proscribes injunctions "to stay proceedings in a state court." Thus, as this Court has recognized, if there is no state court proceeding the anti-injunction statute is inapplicable.[14]

Congress clearly intended the federal courts to have power to declare state statutes unconstitutional and to enjoin "the enforcement, operation or execution"[15] thereof except in the circumstances to which the anti-injunction statute applies. And this Court has recognized that "Congress imposed the duty upon all levels of the federal judiciary to give due respect to a suitor's choice of a federal forum for the hearing and decision of his federal constitutional claims."[16]

[14] Dombrowski v. Pfister, 380 U.S. 479, 484 n. 2 (1965). Since there were no pending state court proceedings in this case appellants did not have to fit within any exception to the anti-injunction statute. However, it should be pointed out that, as in Dombrowski, first amendment rights of free speech and expression are involved in this case in addition to what may be a first amendment based right of privacy. Appellant physicians, nurses, ministers, social workers and counselling organizations alleged that the abortion statute interfered with their counselling women who sought their professional help in obtaining safe, speedy, and adequate medical abortions. Since abortions for economic, social, and many physical and emotional reasons were prohibited by Georgia law, counselling persons as to where such an abortion could be obtained and assisting in arrangements was a possible violation of the criminal conspiracy statute, Ga. Code § 26-3201 or could make them an accessory under Ga. Code § 26-801.

In view of this duty and the fact that the three-judge court did honor appellants' choice of a forum to the extent of granting declaratory relief on the merits of their asserted constitutional rights, it is inconsistent with sound judicial policy for the court to have failed to resolve the question with finality. If as the three-judge court's quotation suggests, the vindication of the federal rights of persons in the classes represented by appellants is to be left to the state courts, then it should not be done piecemeal. If despite all reasonable expectations state officials undertake to prosecute a physician for violation of those portions of the Georgia abortion statute declared unconstitutional by the federal court, the court cannot then leave the matter to resolution by the state courts without making a mockery of the judgment won by appellants in the federal forum of their choice.

Where, as here, no state criminal prosecution is pending or immediately threatened, potential friction in federal-state relations is at a minimum. Where the federal court has, in a novel and complex area of constitutional adjudication, declared a state statute unconstitutional, its failure to enjoin enforcement of the invalid statute simply invites friction.

Even in situations in which potential federal-state friction is at its greatest, as in Dombrowski, this Court has required enjoining state criminal prosecutions where special circumstances indicate that an erroneous initial application of constitutional statutes by the state will result in irreparable injury to important federal rights. The ephemeral time span which pregnant women have in which to exercise their constitutional right of privacy is a similarly important special circumstance[17] justifying a coercive order by the federal courts to preclude the possibility of irreparable injury resulting from the delay inherent in allowing an initial state determination.

II.

THE THREE-JUDGE COURT SHOULD HAVE DECLARED THE PROCEDURAL PROVISIONS OF THE GEORGIA ABORTION STATUTE AND ITS FURTHER REQUIREMENT THAT ABORTIONS MAY BE PERFORMED ONLY AT ACCREDITED HOSPITALS UNCONSTITUTIONAL FACIALLY OR IN OPERATION AS VIOLATIVE OF CONSTITUTIONAL GUARANTEES OF DUE PROCESS AND EQUAL PROTECTION.

A. As a result of the three-judge court's judgment, the Georgia abortion statute is so vague and ambiguous in its terms that it fails to provide sufficient warning of the conduct proscribed thereby violating basic elements of due process guaranteed by the fourteenth amendment.

The statute is set forth in full in the Appendix at pp. 1f-4f and the portion declared unconstitutional is italicized. Excepted from the criminal abortion penalties, under the statute as revised by the court below, are those abortions "performed by a physician duly licensed to practice medicine and surgery . . . based upon his best clinical judgment that an abortion is necessary . . . ." (Emphasis added.) Prior to the court's revision, the statute read ". . . based upon his best clinical judgment that an abortion is necessary because: . . ." one of the specified reasons was present, i.e., danger to the life or serious of standards or reasons was unconstitutional. See Amended Judgment, Appendix p. 3c. Another suit was filed, Polly Poe v. Fulton-DeKalb Hospital Authority Civ. No. 14223 (N.D. Ga. Oct. 7, 1970), alleging denial of an abortion and failure to advise the reason for which it was denied. The injunctive relief requested would prevent multiple suits to enforce the court's decision.

and permanent injury to the woman's health; fetal malformation; or rape. Now the test for obtaining an abortion is that a physician must decide an abortion is "necessary" based upon his best clinical judgment. Thus the statute as revised by the court is more restrictive, more ambiguous, and more vague now than it was before. A physician could reasonably fear that an abortion performed by him for economic, family, emotional or other reasons, good and sufficient to the physician and his patient, might not be considered sufficiently "necessary" under the truncated statute to avoid a criminal prosecution. A statute which places one in peril of his life or liberty may not constitutionally require one to guess at its meaning and the conduct proscribed. Eg., Smith v. California, 361 U.S. 147, 151 (1959).

B. The procedural provisions of the Georgia abortion statute declared constitutional by the three-judge court are so costly, time consuming, cumbersome and devoid of fairness as to deny Mary Doe and members of her class the right to decide when to bear children in violation of the right of privacy and in violation of the due process and equal protection guarantees of the United States Constitution.

Assuming that the district court correctly held that "the decision [to have an abortion is] sheltered by the Constitution . . ." (Appendix p. 13a), the decision may not be so encumbered with procedural requirements that it becomes an empty right or one exercisable only by the wealthy, the educated, the sophisticated, or the persistent who relentlessly pursue their rights. Again, reference must be made to the time limitations on safely terminating a pregnancy. Pregnancy test results are reliable only after approximately eight weeks,[18] yet an abortion must be performed within the first twelve weeks if the safest methods are to be used. Thus, a woman has only about four weeks in which to put together the magic procedural combination under the Georgia abortion statute. This combination requires the woman: (1) to show that she is a resident of Georgia;[19] (2) to convince her physician an abortion is "necessary"; (3) to obtain the opinions of two other physicians who agree that an abortion is "necessary"; (4) to get the decision approved by a majority of a hospital's abortion committee (a minimum of three members), although there are no standards limiting the committee's discretion; and (5) to arrange to have the abortion performed in a hospital accredited by the Joint Commission on Accreditation of Hospitals. Since there is no statutory provision for the woman to appear and be heard at a meeting of the hospital abortion committee, her proposing physician must, as a practical matter, become her advocate and present reasons sufficient to convince a majority of the hospital abortion committee of the need for the abortion. Such advocacy usually requires that the proposing physician and his consultants write extensive requests, reports, and detailed charts since again, in practice, it is difficult for the six physicians involved to meet together for a discussion of each case. A more burdensome process can hardly be imagined.[20] Cf. the unconstitutionality of cumbersome procedures where other rights are involved, eg., voting, Harman v. Forsennius, 380 U.S. 528, 539-44 (1960);

[19] Without extensive argument, appellants contend that residency is not a rational prerequisite for determining if one needs a medical service. Cf. Shapiro v. Thompson, 394 U.S. 618 (1969). Such a limitation prevents emergency treatment for a visitor in Georgia who is unable to return to her home state for such service.

[20] Hospital abortion committees are composed of staff members in the OB-GYN specialty, i.e., one's professional competitors, posing a serious conflict of interest problem. Also, in the smaller cities, it is sometimes impossible to have three committee members and three consultants.

parades and demonstrations, Shuttlesworth v. City of Birmingham, 394 U.S. 147 (1969).

Considering the limitations of time in which a meaningful decision must be made, this statutory scheme is completely lacking in procedural due process. As stated above, the woman involved has no right to appear before the hospital abortion committee and be heard, nor does she have a recognized right of appeal from its decision. An action in the courts provides no adequate remedy since that decision is subject to the delays of further appeal. In this regard, it should be pointed out that neither the American Medical Association nor the American College of Obstetricians and Gynecologists policy statements require the approval of a committee, much less the approval of a statutory hospital abortion committee.

A final procedural roadblock to obtaining a legal abortion, which was left in the statute by the three-judge court, is the requirement that abortions be performed only in licensed, accredited hospital facilities. The Georgia Department of Health issues licenses to hospitals, but accreditation is granted only by the Joint Commission on Accreditation of Hospitals, a private organization located in Chicago, Illinois. Of the 214 licensed hospitals in Georgia, only 83 have been accredited.[21] Licensed hospitals are permitted to perform general types of surgery. Accredited hospitals are required to maintain, in addition to operating room facilities, a radiology department and facilities for emergency care of mass casualties,[22] neither of which is relevant to abortion services. This artificial and medically unnecessary statutory limitation on the facilities in which abortions may be obtained further encumbers the right of many residents of Georgia to seek a termination of pregnancy. This additional procedural burden is especially true of indigent women who depend upon the public hospital in the county of their residence but who are unfortunate enough to live in the 103 Georgia counties without an accredited hospital. See map of Georgia which shows counties with accredited hospitals Appendix p. 1g.

The foregoing procedures are costly, involve great expenditure of time by the woman and her physicians and are so burdensome and devoid of fairness as to deprive appellants of basic due process. The actions of hospital abortion committees constitute state action because they are delegated decision making authority under the statute to decide whether an abortion will be performed.

C. The procedural provisions of the Georgia abortion statute declared constitutional by the three-judge court have had the effect in operation of denying equal access to medical services to poor and Negro citizens in violation of the equal protection guaranties of the United States Constitution.

On its face the Georgia statute makes no distinction on the basis of a patient's race, economic status, or social position. Yet, as applied, this statute has systematically come to deny safe medical abortion services to the poor and to the non-white residents of Georgia. Appellants assert that there is a duty on behalf of cities, counties, states, and other governmental bodies which furnish other health services to the indigent to also make abortion services available to the indigent. See Doe v. General Hospital of the District of Columbia, No. 24,011 (D.C. Cir. 1970); and United States v. Vuitch, supra, 305 F. Supp. at 1035, where such a duty was "declared" even though the court recognized that appropriations would have to be made. Observance of such a duty is not only being neglected in Georgia, it is being seriously impeded by the remaining requirements of the Georgia abortion statute.

Abortion services have for some time been available to the rich woman; she could travel to other countries and today may travel to New York, California or some other state which has a less restrictive abortion law. And under the Georgia abortion statute, she could usually find without difficulty private physicians and pyschiatrists who would make the necessary examinations to support a finding that termination of pregnancy was necessary to her psychic health. It goes without saying that the majority of women do not enjoy such affluence. Some women lack adequate means to travel to the next county. Such lack of funds, however, controls their access to medical services. The requirement of the Georgia abortion statute that abortion be performed only in accredited hospitals, discussed above, has totally removed the possibility of the less expensive office or clinical abortion facilities in the state.[23]

This creates a situation not unlike having a right to appeal a criminal conviction but not enough funds to pay for a transcript of the trial proceedings necessary to assert such right. Cf. Gardner v. California, 393 U.S. 367 (1968); Griffin v. Illinois, 351 U.S. 12, 18 (1956). As the Court stated in Griffin "there can be no equal justice where the kind of trial a man gets depends on the amount of money he has." 351 U.S. at 18-19. Similarly when Georgia had granted a right to terminate an unwanted pregnancy, it may not constitutionally encumber that right with complicated procedures that in practice are available only to the wealthy or the educated.

[23] In this regard the three-judge court observed that the State had an interest in preventing establishment of "abortion mills by the occasional opportunistic or unethical practitioner." Surely the court is not referring to specialized medical facilities but rather illegal or non-medical facilities because it will certainly be appropriate to have specialized facilities for this as for other medical services.

Not only are the poor people denied equal access to abortion services in Georgia, but statistics also show that whites receive by far the greater number of hospital abortions. During 1968, beginning with enactment of the present Georgia abortion statute in April, 69 whites as compared with only 4 Negroes received abortions; in 1969, the ratio was 147 whites to 21 Negroes; and in 1970 through June, 192 whites compared to 28 Negroes received abortions.[25] Thus, Negro women have received only 11.5 percent of the hospital abortions since enactment of the new law although Negroes represent 28.5 percent of the population. These figures should be considered in conjunction with a racial breakdown of deaths resulting from illegal abortions. Of the 205 reported deaths from 1950 to 1969, 143 or approximately 70 percent were Negro women and during the period 1965 to 1969, 88 percent (22 of 25 deaths) were Negro women.[26] Thus, while the number of legal abortions are increasing, Negro women are receiving a disproportionately small share and at the same time maternal mortality for Negro women is increasing. Even though the statute may not facially deny equal protection or equal access to medical care, these statistics demonstrate such a denial in fact.[27]

What was said by Mr. Justice White in his concurring opinion in Griswold v. Connecticut, supra, 381 U.S. at 503, is equally applicable to the abortion statute here:

> [T]he clear effect of these statutes as enforced, is to deny disadvantaged citizens of Connecticut, [27] Concerning the use of statistics to show exclusion of Negroes in the South in other contexts see, e.g., Whitus v. Georgia, 385 U.S. 545, 552 n. 2 (1967); United States v. Jefferson County Bd. of Educ., 372 F.2d 836, 887 (1966), aff'd en banc, 380 F.2d 385 (5th Cir.), cert. denied, 389 U.S. 840 (1967).

> those without either adequate knowledge or resources, to obtain private counselling, access to medical assistance and up-to-date information in respect to proper methods of birth control.... In my view, the statute with these effects bears a substantial burden of justification when attacked under the Fourteenth Amendement. (Citations omitted.)

The Georgia abortion statute denies women of Georgia access to needed medical services and its procedural requirements impose undue burdens upon those who seek to avail themselves of their right to decide when to bear children. In so doing it contravenes the due process and equal protection guarantees[28] of the fourteenth amendment. It should be declared unconstitutional and its enforcement enjoined.

III.

APPELLANT-PHYSICIANS, NURSES, SOCIAL WORKERS, MINISTERS, AND FAMILY PLANNING AND ABORTION COUNSELLING ORGANIZATIONS HAVE SUFFICIENT "STANDING" AND "COLLISION OF INTEREST" TO CHALLENGE THE GEORGIA ABORTION STATUTE.

The court ruled that all plaintiffs had "standing" to bring the action contesting the constitutionality of the Georgia abortion statute, noting the possibility that if social workers, ministers, etc., counseled obtaining an abortion not permitted under the statute they could be prosecuted for conspiracy. However, in the absence of a pending prosecution or immediate threat of prosecution against the doctors, social workers, ministers, and other parties desiring to counsel abortions, the court held that there was no adequate "collision of interests" or "exigent adversity" to give the challenge of these parties to the statute the requisite justicibility.

[28] Other equal protection considerations are involved in Ga. Code § 26-1202(e) which permits a hospital to elect not to perform abortions. It is recognized that individual doctors should have this right, as a matter of conscience, but hospitals are fictitious legal entities and not having a conscience as such can lay no claim to exemption for that reason. Public or quasi-public hospitals occupy "state action" status and have an equal protection "duty." Private hospitals receiving Hill-Burton or Medicaid funds would likewise be subject to equal protection responsibilities, cf. Simkins v. Moses H. Cone Memorial Hospital, 323 F.2d 959 (4th Cir. 1963), cert. denied 376 U.S. 938 (1964).

Appellants urge that the reliance of the district court on Poe v. Ullman, 367 U.S. 497 (1961) and United Public Workers of America v. Mitchell, 330 U.S. 75 (1947) in reaching its conclusion was not well founded. Both of those cases involved statutes as to which a long history of failure by the state to seek prosecutions showed the absence of any real threat of enforcement and therefore the absence of any real controversy between the parties. The Georgia abortion statute, however, has not been a dead formality on its books. Numerous persons have been prosecuted and convicted under the abortion statute that preceded the 1968 Georgia statute.[29] And under Ga. Code § 26-801, one who intentionally counsels a crime or otherwise aids and abets in its commission is made a party thereto subject to conviction for such action. In the circumstances of an actual history of state enforcement of its abortion statutes, appellants who desire, in the performance of their professions, to counsel abortions have > "such a personal stake in the outcome of the controversy as to assure that concrete adverseness which sharpens the presentation of issues upon which the court so largely depends for illumination of difficult constitutional questions." Baker v. Carr, 369 U.S. 186, 204 (1962), as cited in Flast v. Cohen, 392 U.S. 83, 99 (1968).

[29] See for example, White v. State, 114 Ga. App. 437 151 S.E.2d 832 (1966); Persons v. State, 93 Ga. App. 314 91 S.E.2d 358 (1956).

In any event, a failure of the state actively to prosecute appellants and members of their classes who desire to counsel abortion does not alleviate their fear of prosecution for doing so. As this Court stated in Dombrowski:

> So long as the statute remains available to the State the threat of prosecution of protected expression is a real and substantial one. 380 U.S. at 494.

So in this case, the real and substantial threat of prosecution for counseling abortions gave appellants a meaningful adversity[30] adequate to place their claim in the context of controversy necessary for judicial resolution. Further, as to the physicians, extensive encroachment on their rights to practice their profession without state interference has already been discussed and this presents concrete adverseness assuring adequate presentation of the issues.

Here an important issue as to justiciability or collision of interest is raised. This Court should review the decision below and lay to rest the uncertainty which arises out of Poe and Mitchell.

[30] This Court found no lack of adversity in Epperson v. Arkansas, 393 U.S. 97 (1968) although, as Justice Black pointed out, the statute which was there said to impose a risk of prosecution had never been enforced against anyone in its forty year existence.

CONCLUSION

For the reasons set out in this Jurisdictional Statement, the Court should note probable jurisdiction, and set the case down for plenary consideration with Briefs on the merits and oral argument.

OPINION OF UNITED STATES DISTRICT COURT GRANTING DECLARATORY JUDGMENT AND DENYING INJUNCTIVE RELIEF

JULY 31, 1970

UNITED STATES DISTRICT COURT

NORTHERN DISTRICT OF GEORGIA

ATLANTA DIVISION

MARY DOE, et al,
Plaintiffs

vs.

ARTHUR K. BOLTON, as Attorney General of the State of Georgia; LEWIS R. SLATON, as District Attorney of Fulton County, Georgia; and HERBERT T. JENKINS, as Chief of Police of the City of Atlanta, Defendants

CIVIL ACTION

NUMBER 13676

PER CURIAM.

This is an action for declaratory and injunctive relief brought pursuant to 28 U.S.C.A. §2201 and 2202, and 42 U.S.C.A. §1983 and 28 U.S.C.A. §1343. It is a class action attacking Ga. Code Ann. §26-1201, et seq. (1969) Georgia's "Abortion Act."

Plaintiffs claim to represent four sub-classes: pregnant women, single or married, wishing legal abortions; licensed physicians who wish to perform or counsel performance of legal abortions; registered nurses who desire to participate in performing or counsel performance of legal abortions; and ministers and social workers who wish to be free to advise abortion in counselling pregnant women.

Plaintiffs seek an order declaring Georgia's Abortion Statute unconstitutional and enjoining its enforcement on various grounds:

(1) the Statute is unconstitutionally vague and indefinite on its face and as applied, failing to provide sufficient warning of the conduct proscribed, in violation of the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment to the United States Constitution;

(2) Georgia's Abortion Statute unconstitutionally abridges a woman's right to decide to terminate an unwanted pregnancy, in restricting that fundamental liberty without an overriding compelling state interest;

(3) the Statute unconstitutionally restricts the right of the physicians, nurses, ministers and social workers to practice their professions;

(4) Georgia's Abortion Statute produces discrimination against poor and non-white women in violation of the Equal Protection Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment to the United States Constitution.

PENDING MOTIONS

Arthur K. Bolton, sued in his official capacity as Attorney General of Georgia has moved for an order dismissing the claim against him on the ground that no relief could be granted against him since he is not charged generally with the enforcement, application or administration of the Georgia criminal statutes.

As plaintiffs observe, Article VI, § X, Par. II of the Georgia Constitution, Ga. Code Ann. §2-4502 (1933) requires the Attorney General to represent the State in any civil or criminal case when required by the Governor. Furthermore, he may be required to give the Governor advisory opinions on the abortion statute. Ga. Code Ann. §40-1602 (1933). Finally, the Attorney General is head of the Department of Law, which is vested with authority and jurisdiction in all matters of law relating to governmental departments, boards and agencies. Ga. Code Ann. §40-1614 (1943). The Attorney General has sufficient connection with enforcement of the statutes attacked to justify retaining him as a party.[1] See Arneson v. Denny, 25 F.2d 993 (W.D. Wash. 1928); Jackson v. Colorado, 294 F. Supp. 1065, 1072 (D. Colo. 1968); James v. Almond, 170 F. Supp. 331, 341-342 (E.D. Va. 1959); International Longshoremens' & W. U. v. Ackerman, 82 F. Supp. 65, 124 (D. Haw. 1948), rev'd on other grounds 187 F.2d 860 (9th Cir. 1951); Revins v. Prindable, 39 F. Supp. 708, 710 (E.D.Ill. 1941). Accordingly, that motion is denied.

The Attorney General has also objected to interrogatories which plaintiffs served for answer by a witness, Roger Rochat, M. D. In view of the disposition of this case made below, no ruling on this motion is necessary.

The motion of Ferdinand Buckley, Esquire, for reconsideration of the revocation of his appointment as guardian ad litem will be dealt with in connection with the discussion under MERITS below.

[1] The Court is also aware that the Attorney General regularly interprets State criminal laws and decisions in published opinions and circulars to State judges and law enforcement officers.

The motion of the National Legal Program on Health Problems of the Poor to submit a brief as amicus curiae is granted.

The defendant Lewis R. Slaton, District Attorney of Fulton County, filed motions seeking orders requiring disclosure of plaintiff's identity, granting a continuance for discovery for a reasonable time thereafter, and requiring plaintiff to submit to a physical and mental examination. In view of the reasons for which it is held that the complaint of this plaintiff presented a justiciable controversy, these motions are directed toward obtaining information which is not relevant to the case. Accordingly, they are denied.

JURISDICTION

A. Substantial Constitutional Question.

A three-judge court was convened pursuant to 28 U.S.C.A. § 2281 and 2284. Such action is proper where plaintiffs attack the constitutionality of a state statute, raising a substantial constitutional question, and seek equitable relief against its enforcement. Idlewild Bon Voyage Liquor Corp. v. Epstein, 370 U. S. 713, 715 (1962).

Plaintiffs here attack the constitutionality of Ga. Code Ann. § 26-1201 et seq. (1969) on the grounds that it infringes rights protected by various Amendments to the United States Constitution. They seek an injunction against enforcement. In light of recent cases on the subject of the Constitutional right to an abortion, this Constitutional question appears substantial. See Roe v. Wade, ——— F. Supp. ——— (N. D. Tex., No. 3-3690-B, June 17, 1970); Doe v. Randall, ——— F. Supp. ——— (D. Minn., No. 3-70-Civ.-97, May 19, 1970); Doe v. Scott, ——— F. Supp. ——— (N.D. Ill., No. 70-C-395, March 27, 1970); Babbitz v. McCann, 310 F. Supp. 293 (E.D. Wis. 1970); United States v. Vuitch, 305 F. Supp. 1032 (D.D.C. 1969), app. docketed, No. 1155 (February 5, 1970); California v. Belous, 71 Cal. 2d 991, 458 P.2d 194 (1969), cert. den. 397 U. S. 915 (1970).

B. Justiciability.

Standing

By motion to dismiss, Lewis R. Slaton, District Attorney of Fulton County, contends that all plaintiffs other than Mary Doe lack standing to maintain this action. The basis for the claims of these plaintiffs is that because they are not free to perform or counsel the obtaining of abortions, they are unconstitutionally restricted in the practice of their professions.

There are certainly instances in which any of these plaintiffs would have standing to claim a constitutional right to practice his profession, and infringement thereof. For instance, few would dispute that a social worker being prosecuted for conspiracy because he (or she) counselled obtaining an abortion, and referred the client to a physician for the abortion, would have standing to seek a declaratory judgment of his (or her) asserted constitutional right and infringement thereof. See Griswold v. Connecticut, 381 U. S. 479 (1965).

But absent prosecution or indictment, that these plaintiffs do have standing is more difficult to see. Whether their claim is otherwise justiciable is irrelevant. Flast v. Cohen, 392 U. S. 83, 100 n. 21 (1968). The sole issue is whether there is a logical link between the status they assert (physician, nurse) and the claim they seek adjudicated, or between their status and both the type of enactment attacked and the nature of the constitutional infringement alleged. 392 U. S. at 102.

Under either test, all the plaintiffs have standing. As physicians, nurses, ministers or social workers they attack a criminal statute potentially applicable to them, on the grounds that it unconstitutionally restricts their right to practice. Accordingly, the motion to dismiss for lack of standing is denied.

Collision of Interests

Article III of the United States Constitution limits the jurisdiction of the federal courts to cases and controversies. And it is well established that in actions for declaratory judgments, a District Court may not render an advisory opinion on the constitutionality of a state statute. Rather there must be "exigent adversity," an actual controversy in which the constitutionality of the statute is drawn into question in a truly adversary context. See Golden v. Zwickler, 394 U. S. 103, 108 (1969); Poe v. Ullman, 367 U. S. 497 (1961); United Public Workers of America v. Mitchell, 330 U. S. 75, 89 (1947).

Most akin to the instant case is Poe v. Ullman, 367 U. S. 497 (1961). There, a married couple, a married woman and their physician sought a declaratory judgment that Connecticut's statutes prohibiting the use of contraceptive devices and the giving of medical advice in the use of such devices violated plaintiffs' Fourteenth Amendment rights, depriving them of life and liberty without due process of law. None of the plaintiffs had been indicted or prosecuted under the statutes. There had been only one recorded prosecution for violation of the statutes in the seventy-five years since their enactment, and that single instance occurred twenty years before the declaratory judgment action was brought. The Supreme Court suggested that the lack of a pending prosecution or immediate threat of such prosecution against the particular plaintiffs made the claims non-justiciable, citing United Public Workers of America v. Mitchell, 330 U. S.

75 (1947). 367 U. S. at 501. But the Justices went on to find that the lack of recorded prosecutions, the unchallenged, open, ubiquitous public sales of contraceptive devices showed a deeply embedded State policy against enforcement, amounting to a tacit agreement not to prosecute violators of the statutes. The majority therefore held:

> "It is clear that the mere existence of a state penal statute would constitute insufficient grounds to support a federal court's adjudication of its constitutionality in proceedings brought against the State's prosecuting officials if real threat of enforcement is wanting." 367 U. S. at 507.

However, these three cases seem precedent for the proposition that in the absence of a pending or threatened indictment or prosecution of the particular plaintiffs bringing a declaratory judgment action, a federal court cannot consider the constitutionality of the challenged criminal statute.

However in 1968, the Supreme Court decided Epperson v. Arkansas, 393 U. S. 97 (1968), in which a public school teacher argued that the Arkansas statute prohibiting the teaching of evolution was unconstitutional. There was no pending or threatened indictment or prosecution against the teacher. There was no record of any prosecutions under the challenged statute. The teacher's dilemma was solely that (1) the new biology textbooks she was supposed to use in the approaching term contained a chapter on evolution, and (2) her action for a declaratory judgment in state court, granted on the trial level, had been reversed by the Arkansas Supreme Court. The United States Supreme Court majority reached the merits and reversed the decision of the Arkansas Supreme Court in an opinion which summarily brushed aside the question of justiciability. 393 U. S. at 101-102.

Apparently, then, the majority felt that the appeal presented a "substantial controversy . . . of sufficient immediacy and reality." Golden v. Zwickler, 394 U. S. 103, 108 (1969).

In the instant case, the plaintiffs Mary Doe alleges that having properly applied to the Abortion Committee of Grady Memorial Hospital for a legal therapeutic abortion allowed by Ga. Code Ann. § 26-1202 (1969), she was denied an abortion solely on the grounds that her present situation did not come within the terms of Ga. Code Ann. § 26-1202(a)(1)(1969).

Georgia's Abortion Act defines a criminal abortion as the act performed by a person who administers a substance or uses an instrument or other means with intent to produce a miscarriage or abortion. Ga. Code Ann. § 26-1201 (1969). However, Ga. Code Ann. § 26-1202(a) establishes three circumstances under which an abortion shall not be considered a criminal abortion. And Ga. Code Ann. § 26-1202(b)(1969) prescribes procedure which must be followed if an abortion is to be authorized by or performed under 1202(a).

Ga. Code Ann. § 26-1202(b)(1969) provides in relevant part:

> "No abortion is authorized or shall be performed under this section unless each of the following conditions is met:
> (6) The performance of the abortion has been approved in advance by a committee of the medical staff of the hospital in which the operation is to be performed. This committee must be one established and maintained in accordance with the standards promulgated by the Joint Commission on the Accreditation of Hospitals, and > its approval must be by a majority vote of a membership of not less than three members of the hospital's staff; the physician proposing to perform the operation may not be counted as a member of the committee for this purpose.

Thus, the denial of plaintiff's application for an abortion, on the grounds alleged, was not the decision of a private physician declining to render professional services, occasioned by the mere existence of Georgia's Abortion Act. The statute confers upon the hospital committee power to grant or deny abortions. A decision denying an application for abortion on the ground that the woman's situation does not fall within one of the three enumerated exceptions is an exercise of that power, which allegedly violated plaintiff's constitutional rights. To this extent then, this staute has been invoked against the plaintiff Mary Doe, causing an alleged constitutional deprivation. Here, there has been actual interference with a claimed constitutional right by the decision of a body which the State has vested with power to grant or deny legal abortions. These circumstances put plaintiff and the defendants on opposite sides of a very real and lively controversy, amendable to judicial resolution.

Accordingly, it appears that Mary Doe's complaint, in this context, presents a justiciable controversy. Since the claims of the other plaintiffs do not stand in such a posture, the Attorney General's motion to dismiss must be granted to that extent.

C. Exhaustion.

There is no merit to the defendant Slaton's motion to dismiss for failure to exhaust state remedies. It does not appear that there are any administrative remedies for the denial by a hospital committee of an application for an abortion. And however desirable such a requirement might be for orderly judicial administration, there is no requirement that a litigant in federal court exhaust state judicial remedies, where he is asserting a claim in proceedings other than habeas corpus involving a subject over which the federal and state courts have concurrent jurisdiction. As will appear below, the instant case does not involve granting injunctive relief.

THE MERITS

Plaintiff asserts that certain cases leading up to and following Griswold v. Connecticut, 381 U. S. 479 (1965) establish a Constitutional right to privacy broad enough to encompass the right of a woman to terminate an unwanted pregnancy in its early stages, by obtaining an abortion. See Stanley v. Georgia, 394 U. S. 557 (1969); Loving v. Virginia, 388 U. S. 1 (1967); Skinner v. Oklahoma, 316 U. S. 535 (1942); Olmstead v. United States, 277 U. S. 438, 478 (1928) (dissenting opinion of Mr. Justice Brandeis); Pierce v. Society of Sisters, 268 U. S. 510 (1925); Meyer v. Nebraska, 262 U. S. 390 (1923). While the Court agrees that the breadth of the right to privacy encompasses the decision to terminate an unwanted pregnancy, we are unwilling to declare that such a right reposes unbounded in any one individual. Rather, we are of the view that although the state may not unduly limit the reasons for which a woman seeks an abortion, it may legitimately require that the decision to terminate her pregnancy be one reached only upon consideration of more factors than the desires of the woman and her ability to find a willing physician.

In Griswold v. Connecticut, 381 U. S. 479 (1965), the Supreme Court held that the decision to use contraceptive devices is an aspect of a relationship lying within a penumbral zone of privacy created by several fundamental constitutional guarantees, and that a state law forbidding the use of such devices unduly invades that area of protected freedoms with maximum destructive effect upon that relationship. 381 U. S. at 485. In a concurring opinion, Mr. Justice Goldberg differed with the majority only to the extent of stipulating that the right to marital privacy is encompassed in his concept of personal liberty because of the Ninth Amendment, rather than because of penumbral emanations of specific constitutional guarantees.

For whichever reason, the concept of personal liberty embodies a right to privacy which apparently is also broad enough to include the decision to abort a pregnancy.[2] Like the decision to use contraceptive devices, the decision to terminate an unwanted pregnancy is sheltered from state regulation which seeks broadly to limit the reasons for which an abortion may be legally obtained. However, unlike the decision to use contraceptive devices, the decision to abort a pregnancy affects other interests than those of the woman alone, or even husband and wife alone.

Once conception takes place and an embryo forms, for better or for worse the woman carries a life form with the potential of independent human existence.[3] Without

[2] We see no connection between this theory and the claimed unlimited right of a woman "to use her body in any way she wishes" read into Griswold by some. There are obvious limitations to the latter such as self abuse, e.g. disease, drugs, suicide, etc. and the rights of others in which the state clearly has an interest. Any such theory in its ultimate is flatly rejected.

[3] This view of the impact of conception on the decision not to have children implies that the distinction between a quick and unquick fetus, and even that between embryo and fetus is not relevant here.

And since the Court does not postulate the existence of a new being with federal constitutional rights at any time during gestation, the motion of Mr. Ferdinand Buckley for reconsideration of the order revoking his appointment as guardian ad litem for the embryo (or fetus) is denied. Mr. Buckley's motion to intervene in such capacity is also denied. However, he has the Court's appreciation for his participation in this litigation as amicus curiae.

positing the existence of a new being with its own identity and federal constitutional rights, we hold that once the embryo has formed, the decision to abort its development cannot be considered a purely private one affecting only husband and wife, man and woman.

A potential human life, together with the traditional interests in the health, welfare and morals of its citizenry under the police power, grant to the state a legitimate area of control short of an invasion of the personal right of initial decision.

The whole thrust of the present Georgia statute[4] is to treat the problem as a medical one. Such approach is reasonable and seemingly sound inasmuch as medical practitioners are in the best position by virtue of training to judge concurrently the basis as well as the risk inherent in such a decision. In this respect, the state moreover has a legitimate interest in seeing to it that the decision—personal and medical—is not one undertaken lightly and without careful consideration of all relevant factors, whether they be emotional, economic, psychological, familial or physical. For example, the legislature might require any number of conditions such as consultation with a licensed minister or secular guidance counselor as well as the concurrence of two licensed physicians or any system of approval related to the quality and soundness of the decision in all its aspects. It certainly has a clear right to circumscribe a decision made by a woman alone or by a woman and a single physician and to guard against the establishment of transient "abortion mills" by the occasional opportunistic or unethical practitioner and the concomitant dangers to his patrons and the public. Such controls and requirements, so long as they do not restrict the reasons for the initial decisions and do not violate the

Due Process and Equal Protection Clauses of the Fourteenth Amendment, are properly within the sphere of legislative discretion. In that respect, where abortions may be obtained only from licensed physicians and surgeons, and only after psychiatric consultation, the mere fact that physicians and psychiatrists are more accessible to rich people than to poor people, making abortions more available to the wealthy than to the indigent, is not in itself a violation of the Equal Protection Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment to the United States Constitution. Cf. Dandridge v. Williams, 397 U. S. 471 (1970); MacQuarrie v. McLaughlin, 294 F. Supp. 176 (D. Mass. 1968), aff'd 394 U. S. 456 (1969).

Moreover, there is an overriding interest in the manner of performance as well as the quality of the final decision to abort. Obvious need for control through licensing, sanitation requirements and proper medical standards in the execution of a legal abortion are examples. Again such decisions address themselves to legislative decision based upon informed judgment.

Having decided that the reasons for an abortion may not be proscribed, but that the quality of the decision as well as the manner of its execution are properly within the realm of state control, the present statute must be examined in such light.

Rather than regulating merely the quality of the decision to have an abortion, and the manner of its performance, the Georgia statute also limits the number of reasons for which an abortion may be sought. This the State may not do, because such action unduly restricts a decision sheltered by the Constitutional right to privacy. See Griswold v. Connecticut, 381 U. S. 479 (1965); California v. Belous, 71 Cal. 2d 991, 458 P. 2d 194 (1969), cert. den. 397 U. S. 915 (1970). The question becomes a matter of statutory overbreadth.

Based upon the above, the court finds the following portions of George Code §26-1202 to be in violation of the constitutional rights of petitioner:

A. Section (a) beginning with the word "because" on line 5 and through subsection (a)(3) in its entirety.

B. Section (b) subsection (3) beginning with the word "because" on line 6 and through the end of said subsection.

C. Section (b) subsection (6) in its entirety.

D. Section (c) in its entirety.

There being no showing to the contrary, the court further finds the remainder of said Code §26-1202 to constitute a proper exercise of state power within the context of this opinion.[5]

An appropriate formal declaratory judgment may be presented upon request of any party.

ABSTENTION

It is recognized that there is no pending state court proceeding against which the injunction prayed by plaintiff would operate. Nevertheless, the request for injunctive relief is denied, on the same basis as such a prayer would be denied were a state proceeding actually in progress:

> "... the vindication of the defendant's federal rights is left to the state courts except in the rare situations where it can be clearly predicted ... that those rights will inevitably be denied by the very act of bringing the defendant to trial in the state court." City of Greenwood v. Peacock, 384 U. S. 808, 828 (1968).

However under the authority of Zwickler v. Koota, 389 U. S. 241 (1967), the Court has proceeded to issue the declaratory relief, in spite of its unwillingness to broadly enjoin future prosecutions under the Act. Accordingly, plaintiff's request for a declaratory judgment is hereby granted. Judgment shall issue in the form described above.

IT IS SO ORDERED.

CIVIL ACTION

JUDGMENT

The action came on for hearing on defendants' motions to dismiss on June 15, 1970, before a three-Judge Court composed of Lewis R. Morgan, United State Circuit Judge, Sidney O. Smith, Jr., and Albert J. Henderson, Jr., United States District Judges.

Plaintiffs' request to introduce evidence in proof of allegations of the complaint was denied; defendants' motions to dismiss were treated as motions for summary judgment; argument was heard on the Court's jurisdiction and the constitutional issues raised. The Court issued its opinion on July 31, 1970.

Having determined that a substantial constitutional question was raised, one which created a justiciable controversy between plaintiff Mary Doe and the defendants, over which question this Court has jurisdiction and which it does not abstain from exercising; and

Having granted plaintiff Mary Doe's request for a declaratory judgment and denied her request for injunctive relief,

Judgment is hereby entered as follows:

1. The following portions of the Criminal Code of Georgia, § 26-1202[1], are declared to be in violation of the constitutional rights of Petitioner Mary Doe, within the context of the aforesaid opinion:

A. Section (a) beginning with the word "because" on line 5 and through subsection (a)(3) in its entirety.

B. Section (b) subsection (3) beginning with the word "because" on line 6 and through the end of said subsection.

AMENDED JUDGMENT OF UNITED STATES DISTRICT COURT

OCTOBER 13, 1970

UNITED STATES DISTRICT COURT

NORTHERN DISTRICT OF GEORGIA

ATLANTA DIVISION

vs.

ARTHUR K. BOLTON, as Attorney General of the State of Georgia; et al

NUMBER 13676

Since the Court's opinion of July 31, 1970, several motions have been filed necessitating this opinion and order.

MOTION OF AMICUS CURIAE

Ferdinand Buckley filed a motion on September 3, 1970, to alter or amend the Court's judgment of August 25, 1970, to rule on several of his earlier motions and prayers. Accordingly, that judgment is hereby amended in the following (See FN) respect:

Mr. Buckley's motion for reconsideration of the order revoking his appointment as guardian ad litem for the embryo (or fetus), and his motion to intervene in any representative capacity on behalf of the embryo or fetus is denied. This ruling makes it unnecessary, and the Court declines, to rule on the prayers in the answer and counterclaim Mr. Buckley filed before revocation of his appointment as guardian ad litem.

MOTIONS OF JANE ROE

Jane Roe petitions for leave to intervene as a plaintiff, moves for a temporary restraining order, and asks that the Court clarify and enforce its opinion of July 31, 1970. Said petition, and accordingly also the motion and the request are denied for two reasons.

First, the Court is informed by counsel for all concerned that Georgia Baptist Hospital has reconsidered its earlier decision and subsequently granted Jane Roe's application for an abortion. Said action renders the petition of Jane Roe moot, there now being no sufficient collision of interests between Jane Roe and the defendants.

Second, Jane Roe's petition to intervene makes it clear that her controversy was with Georgia Baptist Hospital, and only tangentially with the defendants in this case. Under such circumstances there is no showing that Mary Doe—representing the class of pregnant women denied abortions because of the Georgia statute attacked—could not adequately represent the tangential interest of Jane Roe in this action. See Allen Calculators, Inc. v. National Cash Register Co., 322 U. S. 137, 141 (1944); Durkin v. Pet Milk Co., 14 F.R.D. 374 (W.D. Ark. 1953).

In spite of the above, the motion presents an aspect of the case which justifies some amplification of the previous declaratory judgment. The court concludes that this should be done by way of amendment sua sponte. Rule 60(b)(6); Klapcott v. United States, 335 U. S. 601 (1948); Bros. Incorporated v. W. E. Grace Mfg. Co., 320 F.2d 594 (5th Cir. 1963).

The problem relates to the role and function of the "abortion committees" in the several hospitals. Ga. Code § 26-1202(5). The thrust of the original opinion was to carry out the apparent intent of the Georgia legislature by making the ultimate decision on individual abortions a medical one. However, in line with constitutional principles, the ultimate decision cannot be restricted to the three reasons stated in the statute. This left the abortion committee free to decide whether an abortion was "necessary" on the broader medical basis, namely, the totality of circumstances surrounding each patient.

From the motion it is apparent that those committees who have voluntarily adopted the standards promulgated by the American College of Obstetricians and Gynecologists as controlling have placed themselves in the position of being restricted by the same reasons stated in the statute.[1] What is denied directly cannot be accomplished indirectly. It follows that the abortion committees cannot be limited to the stated reasons as the sole basis for approval of an individual abortion, nor can they so limit themselves by the adoption of such standards. Any such action by a hospital committee is declared to be an unconstitutional exercise of delegated power.

In sum, the statutory processes of approval are left standing. The patient is required to obtain the approval of (1) the certifying physician, (2) the two consulting physicians, and (3) the abortion committee of the ad-

[1] The Georgia statute requires the hospital to apply standards promulgated by the Joint Commission on the Accreditation of Hospitals. No such restrictive reasons for approval of an abortion are contained therein. However, the voluntary standards promulgated by the American College of Obstetricians and Gynecologists in part limit the grounds for abortion to the three stated statutory reasons: injury to health of the mother; danger of grave physical or mental defect to the child; and pregnancy due to rape. Any such limiting restrictions, as seen, must fail. Likewise, lack of consent by the husband, while it may freely be considered by the committee, may not be automatically established as an absolute bar.

By way of additional comment, good faith administration of the statute as now constituted would prohibit a committee from secretly restricting abortions to those statutory reasons, which the court has already deleted. To the contrary, all relevant factors should be considered and an informed medical judgment made.

mitting hospital. Failure to obtain approval at any level necessarily precludes abortion on that application. A majority of the abortion committee shall control its action, whether for approval or for disapproval.

To the extent stated herein, the original opinion is modified.

IT IS SO ORDERED.

TEXT OF GEORGIA ABORTION STATUTE

Ga. Code § 26-1201. Criminal Abortion

Except as otherwise provided in Section 26-1202, a person commits criminal abortion when he administers any medicine, drug or other substance whatever to any woman or when he uses any instrument or other means whatever upon any woman with intent to produce a miscarriage or abortion. (Acts 1968, pp. 1249, 1277.)

26-1202. Exception

(a) Section 26-1201 shall not apply to an abortion performed by a physician duly licensed to practice medicine and surgery pursuant to Chapter 84-9 or 84-12 of the Code of Georgia of 1933, as amended, based upon his best clinical judgment that an abortion is necessary because:

(1) A continuation of the pregnancy would endanger the life of the pregnant woman or would seriously and permanently injure her health; or

(2) The fetus would be very likely be born with a grave, permanent, and irremediable mental or physical defect; or

(3) The pregnancy resulted from forcible or statutory rape.

(b) No abortion is authorized or shall be performed under this section unless each of the following conditions is met:

(1) The pregnant woman requesting the abortion certifies in writing under oath and subject to the penalties of false swearing to the physician who proposes to perform the abortion that she is a bona fide legal resident of the State of Georgia.

(2) The physician certifies that he believes the woman is a bona fide resident of this State and that he has no information which should lead him to believe otherwise.

(3) Such physician's judgment is reduced to writing and concurred in by at least two other physicians duly licensed to practice medicine and surgery pursuant to Chapter 84-9 of the Code of Georgia of 1933, as amended, who certify in writing that based upon their separate personal medical examinations of the pregnant woman, the abortion is, in their judgment necessary because of one or more of the reasons enumerated above.

(4) Such abortion is performed in a hospital licensed by the State Board of Health and accredited by the Joint Commission on Accreditation of Hospitals.

(5) The performance of the abortion has been approved in advance by a committee of the medical staff of the hospital in which the operation is to be performed. This committee must be one established and maintained in accordance with the standards promulgated by the Joint Commission on the Accreditation of Hospitals, and its approval must be by a majority vote of a membership of not less than three members of the hospital's staff; the physician proposing to perform the operation may not be counted as a member of the committee for this purpose.

(6) If the proposed abortion is considered necessary because the woman has been raped, the woman makes a written statement under oath, and subject to the penalties of false swearing, of the date, time and place of the rape and the name of the rapist, if known. There must be attached to this statement a certified copy of any report of the rape made to any law enforcement officer or agency and a statement by the solicitor general of the judicial circuit where the rape occurred or allegedly occurred that, according to his best information, there is probable cause to believe that the rape did occur.

(7) Such written opinions, statements, certificates, and concurrences are maintained in the permanent files of such hospital and are available at all reasonable times to the solicitor general of the judicial circuit in which the hospital is located.

(8) A copy of such written opinions, statements, certificates, and concurrences is filed with the Director of the State Department of Public Health within ten (10) days after such operation is performed.

(9) All written opinions, statements, certificates, and concurrences filed and maintained pursuant to Paragraphs (7) and (8) of this subsection shall be confidential records and shall not be made available for public inspection at any time.

(c) Any solicitor general of the judicial circuit in which an abortion is to be performed under this section, or any person who would be a relative of the child within the second degree of consanguinity, may petition the superior court of the county in which the abortion is to be performed for a declaratory judgment whether the performance of such abortion would violate any constitutional or other legal rights of the fetus. Such solicitor general may also petition such court for the purpose of taking issue with compliance with the requirements of this section. The physician who proposes to perform the abortion and the pregnant woman shall be respondents. The petition shall be heard expeditiously and if the court adjudges that such abortion would violate the constitutional or other legal rights of the fetus, the court shall so declare and shall restrain the physician from performing the abortion.

(d) If an abortion is performed in compliance with this section, the death of the fetus shall not give rise to any claim for wrongful death.

(e) Nothing in this section shall require a hospital to admit any patient under the provisions hereof for the purpose of performing an abortion, nor shall any hospital be required to appoint a committee such as contemplated under subsection (b) (5). A physician, or any other person who is a member of or associated with the staff of a hospital, or any employee of a hospital in which an abortion has been authorized, who shall state in writing an objection to such abortion on moral or religious grounds shall not be required to participate in the medical procedures which will result in the abortion, and the refusal of any such person to participate therein shall not form the basis of any claim for damages on account of such refusal or for any disciplinary or recriminatory action against such person.

26-1203. Punishment

A person convicted of criminal abortion shall be punished by imprisonment for not less than one nor more than 10 years. (Acts 1968, pp. 1249-1280.)

vs.

HENRY WADE,
Appellee

ON APPEAL FROM THE UNITED STATES DISTRICT COURT FOR THE NORTHERN DISTRICT OF TEXAS

REPLY TO JURISDICTIONAL STATEMENT

Appellee Henry Wade and the State of Texas respectfully move the Court to dismiss Appellants' appeal herein or, in the alternative, to affirm that portion of the judgment denying Appellants injunctive relief. In the further alternative, Appellees move the Court, if the Court assumes jurisdiction of this cause, to consider all constitutional issues raised below including the question of the constitutionality of Articles 1191, 1192, 1193, 1194 and 1196, Vernon's Annotated Penal Code of the State of Texas, hereinafter referred to as the Texas Abortion Laws.

JUDGMENT AND OPINION BELOW

The Judgment of the United States District Court for the Northern District of Texas is included in the Appendix to the Jurisdictional Statement of Appellants at pages 4a-6a, and the Opinion is at pages 7a-20a.

JURISDICTION

Appellants seek to invoke the jurisdiction of this Court under 28 U.S.C., Section 1253.

STATE STATUTES INVOLVED

Appellants correctly specify the Texas statutes under consideration in their Jurisdictional Statement at pages 4-5; however, they have listed them out of numerical order in that they have listed Article 1196 first.

QUESTIONS PRESENTED

A. Whether Appellants are entitled to injunctive relief against the enforcement of the Texas Abortion Laws?

B. Whether the Texas Abortion Laws infringe upon rights guaranteed to women by the Ninth Amendment to the United States Constitution?

C. Whether the Texas Abortion Laws are void because of unconstitutional overbreath?

D. Whether abstention is warranted as to Appellants' request for injunctive relief against the enforcement of the Texas Abortion Laws?

STATEMENT AND PROCEEDINGS BELOW

Appellants have extracted allegations of fact contained in their Complaints to supplement their statement of the nature of the case before the Court. Briefly, the proceedings were instituted in the United States District Court for the Northern District of Texas, Dallas Division, as a request for a declaratory judgment that the Texas Abortion Laws are unconstitutionally overbroad and vague, and for injunctive relief against their enforcement. Appellant Jane Roe represented herself to be an unmarried pregnant woman. Appellants John and Mary Doe simultaneously filed suit as a married couple seeking the same relief although Mary Doe did not contend she was pregnant. Appellant James Hubert Hallford intervened as a physician and is presently, as well as at the time of filing his intervention suit, under indictment for violation of the Texas Abortion Laws. The named defendant was Appellee Henry Wade, Criminal District Attorney of Dallas County, Texas. The State of Texas sought and obtained leave of the Court to respond to the Appellants' Complaints.

After oral submission, the United States District Court, sitting as a three-judge court, rendered its decision and entered its judgment, which are included in the Appendix to the Jurisdictional Statement at pages 4a-20a.

Thereafter, in chronological order, the following instruments were filed in this Court and in the United States Court of Appeals for the Fifth Circuit, to-wit:

1. Appellees herein gave Notice of Appeal to the Fifth Circuit—appended herein as Appendix A.

2. Appellants herein, Jane Roe and James Hubert Hallford, gave Notice of Appeal to the Fifth Circuit—appended herein as Appendix B and Appendix C (these Notices are referred to as Notice of Protective Appeal in the Appendix to the Jurisdictional Statement at pages 21a-24a).

3. Appellee herein, the State of Texas, gave Notice of Appeal to this Court—appended herein as Appendix D.

4. Appellants herein gave Notice of Appeal to this Court—appended to the Jurisdictional Statement at pages 1a-3a.

5. Appellants herein filed their Motion to Hold Appeal in Abeyance in the Fifth Circuit—appended herein as Appendix E.

6. Appellee herein, Henry Wade, filed Appellant's Motion in Opposition to Motion to Hold Appeal in Abeyance in the Fifth Circuit—appended herein as Appendix F.

ARGUMENT

I.

Appellants' Appeal Should Be Dismissed

A. Injunctive Relief as to Appellant Jane Roe.

The United States District Court found that Appellants John and Mary Doe failed to show standing, but that Appellant Jane Roe had standing to bring this lawsuit (Appendix to Jurisdictional Statement at page 5a). Appellant Jane Roe filed her complaint in the District Court on March 3, 1970, and it has now been some eight months since the filing of same. The query is whether there is a justiciable controversy entitling such Appellant to injunctive relief in that the issue sought to be adjudicated has been rendered moot by subsequent developments, i.e., termination of her pregnancy? No justiciable controversy is presented to a federal court when the parties seek adjudication of moot questions. Flast v. Cohen, 392 U.S. 83, 88 S.Ct. 1942, 20 L.Ed.2d 947 (1968). Accord, Brockington v. Rhodes, —— U.S. ——, 90 S.Ct. 206, 24 L.Ed.2d 209 (1969).

A requirement that must be established before a three-judge Federal court can entertain an action on its merits (and grant injunctive relief) is that the party challenging a statute as invalid must show that he (she) has sustained or is immediately in danger of sustaining some direct injury as a result of its enforcement. Massachusetts v. Mellon, 262 U.S. 447, 43 S.Ct. 597, 67 L.Ed. 1078 (1923); Ex parte Levitt, 302 U.S. 633, 58 U.S. 1, 82 L.Ed. 493 (1937). It can only be logically assumed that Appellant Jane Roe is not in need of an abortion at this time to terminate her pregnancy. Further, Appellant Roe could not be prosecuted in the Texas courts for submission to an abortion, nor could any woman. Gray v. State, 178 S.W. 337 (Tex. Crim. 1915); Shaw v. State, 165 S.W. 930 (Tex.Crim. 1914).

This Court may properly conclude that, as to Appellant Jane Roe, no justiciable controversy is presented to invoke the jurisdiction of a federal court that would go to this Court's jurisdiction to review the District Court's denial of injunctive relief as to such Appellant. Accord, Flask v. Cohen, supra.

B. Injunctive Relief as to Appellant James Hubert Hallford.

Appellant Hallford's action is, in effect, an action to enjoin or stay proceedings in the State court where he is under indictments for violating the Texas Abortion Laws. In such instances, this Court has required or sanctioned federal forbearance. Atlantic Coast Line Railroad Company v. Brotherhood of Locomotive En- gineers, 398 U.S. 281, 90 S.Ct. 1739, 26 L.Ed.2d 234 (1970); Cameron v. Johnson, 390 U.S. 611, 88 S.Ct. 1335, 20 L.Ed.2d 182 (1968); Brooks v. Briley, 274 F.Supp. 538 (M.D.Tenn. 1967), affirmed, 391 U.S. 361, 88 S.Ct. 1671, 20 L.Ed.2d 647.

Historically there has been great reluctance by federal courts to interfere in the operations of a State court. See, e.g., Stefanelli v. Minard, 342 U.S. 117, 72 S.Ct. 118, 96 L.Ed. 138 (1951). This principle has been codified in 28 U.S.C., Section 2283. None of the statutes which Appellants rely upon as conferring jurisdiction upon this court expressly authorize an injunction to stay proceedings in a state court.

C. Pendency of Appeal in Fifth Circuit.

Since the filing of its Notice of Appeal to this Court (Appendix D), Appellees herein have determined that the only forum available to them for appeal from the judgment below is to the Fifth Circuit. Gunn v. University Committee to End the War in Viet Nam, —— U.S. ——, 90 S.Ct. 2013, 26 L.Ed.2d 684 (1970); Goldstein v. Cox, —— U.S. ——, 90 S.Ct. 671, 24 L.Ed.2d 663 (1970); Mitchell v. Donovan, —— U.S. ——, 90 S.Ct. 1763, 26 L.Ed.2d 378 (1970). Appellants herein will not be prejudiced by determination of this appeal by the Fifth Circuit.

II.

Consideration of All Constitutional Issues

In the event this Court should assume jurisdiction of this appeal, Appellees respectfully request this Court to consider all constitutional issues presented below. This Court has previously held that, upon review of a final judgment, it considers all the substantial federal questions determined in the earlier stages of the

CONCLUSION AND PRAYER

Appellees submit that Appellants have not shown they are entitled to injunctive relief and move the Court to dismiss Appellants' appeal herein or, in the alternative, to affirm that portion of the judgment of the United States District Court denying injunctive relief to Appellants.

In the further alternative, Appellees move the Court, if the Court assumes jurisdiction of this cause, to consider all constitutional issues raised in the District Court.

NOTICE OF APPEAL
THE SUPREME COURT OF THE UNITED STATES

Notice is hereby given that the State of Texas, Responding Party Defendant, Appellant, hereby appeals to the Supreme Court of the United States from that part of the final judgment entered in the above causes on the 17th day of June, 1970, in favor of Plaintiffs, Jane Roe, John Doe and Mary Doe, and Intervenor, James Hubert Hallford, M.D., and against the named Defendant, Henry Wade, and Responding Party Defendant, State of Texas, wherein the Court granted summary declaratory relief finding the Texas Abortion Laws, Articles 1191, 1192, 1193, 1194 and 1196, Texas Penal Code, unconstitutional.

This appeal is taken pursuant to Title 28, U.S.C., Section 1253.

I.

The Clerk will please prepare a transcript of the record in these causes, for transmission to the Clerk of the Supreme Court of the United States, and include in said transcript the following:

A. All pleadings of the parties in these causes including all briefs in support of the State of Texas' pleadings.

B. The court reporter's transcription of the proceedings before the Court.

C. All evidentiary items on file in this cause including depositions, stipulations and request for admissions and replies thereto, if any.

D. All orders of the Court.

II.

The following questions are presented by this appeal:

A. Whether the Plaintiffs and Intervenor had standing to challenge the constitutionality of Articles 1191, 1192, 1193, 1194 and 1196, Texas Penal Code?

B. Whether the Plaintiffs and Intervenor failed to state a claim upon which relief could be granted for the reason that they failed to plead facts which raised any substantial constitutional question?

C. Whether the Plaintiffs and Intervenor failed to state a claim upon which relief could be granted for the reason that they failed to show that they suffered or will suffer any irreparable injury and that they had no adequate remedy at law?

D. Whether Intervenor, James Hubert Hallford, M.D.'s, Complaint is barred by 28 U.S.C. 2283?

E. Whether, as held by the Court, Article 1191, Texas Penal Code, is unconstitutional?

F. Whether, as held by the Court, Article 1192, Texas Penal Code, is unconstitutional?

G. Whether, as held by the Court, Article 1193, Texas Penal Code, is unconstitutional?

H. Whether, as held by the Court, Article 1194, Texas Penal Code, is unconstitutional?

On Appeal From the United States District Court for the Northern District of Texas

MOTION TO HOLD APPEAL IN ABEYANCE

I. INTRODUCTION

The present appeal to this Court was taken by Appellant Wade from a declaratory judgment rendered below by a statutory three-judge federal district court that the Texas Abortion Laws violate the federal constitution by reason of unconstitutional vagueness and overbreadth. The judgment below, while granting declaratory relief, denied an injunction against future enforcement of the aforesaid statutes. From that portion of the judgment, Appellees here have taken an appeal directly to the Supreme Court of the United States pursuant to 28 U.S.C. §1253 (1964 ed.). Appel-lees make the present motion to hold the appeal in abeyance pending disposition by the Supreme Court. In the event that the Supreme Court's action allows the appeal here to go forward, Appellee respectfully requests an additional 20 days time within which to file a brief, and leave to file a brief of 50 pages.

II. REASONS FOR HOLDING APPEAL IN ABEYANCE

Title 28, U.S. Code §1253, authorizes an appeal from a three-judge district court order "granting or denying . . . an interlocutory or permanent injunction. . . ." The decision below denied such an injunction. While it is unusual that declaratory relief is granted, and an injunction denied, there have been such cases from time to time in the past, and the Supreme Court has heard such appeals. See, e.g., Carter v. Jury Comm'n of Greene County, 396 U.S. 320, 328 (1970); Williams v. Rhodes, 393 U.S. 23, 26-28 (1968). It is the action on the injunction which governs appealability.

When the appeal goes up properly, the entire case is opened for review. As Dandridge v. Williams, 397 U.S. 471 (1970) teaches:

> "The prevailing party may, of course, assert in a reviewing court any ground in support of his judgment. . . ." 397 U.S. at 475 n. 6.

Hence Appellant Wade may contest the declaratory judgment in the Supreme Court by way of defense to the propriety of not granting an injunction. Wade is in no way prejudiced by the holding of the present appeal in abeyance. He need do little more than change the heading on the brief already submitted to this Court.

III. RELIEF REQUESTED

Accordingly, Appellee respectfully requests the following:

(1) That the present appeal be held in abeyance pending disposition of this case by the Supreme Court of the United States in an appeal filed by Appellee (See Jurisdictional Statement attached hereto);

(2) That the record on this appeal be certified to the District Court for transmission to the Supreme Court of the United States for use in the appeal of this case docketed there as No. 808, October 1970 Term;

(3) That in the event this appeal is ultimately allowed to go forward, Appellee be granted an additional 20 days within which to file a brief, and that leave be granted to file a printed brief of 50 pages length, exclusive of indices and appendices.

Respectfully submitted:

APPELLANT'S MOTION IN OPPOSITION TO MOTION TO HOLD APPEAL IN ABEYANCE

Appellant HENRY WADE hereby opposes the motion to hold the appeal in abeyance which was previously filed by appellees herein, and would show the Court:

Appellees have invoked the jurisdiction of this Court, as the record herein reflects (Record, pp. 21, 22).

2.)

Under authority of *Gunn v. Appellees will be in no way prejudiced by this Court's determination of the appeal from the declaratory judgment herein.

WHEREFORE, appellant prays that appellee's motion to hold this appeal in abeyance be in all things denied.

On Appeal from the United States District Court For the Northern District of Georgia

MOTION TO DISMISS

The Appellees move the Court to dismiss the instant appeal herein from the judgment of the United States District Court for the Northern District of Georgia, Atlanta Division, on the ground that it is manifest that the questions on which the decision of the cause depends are so unsubstantial as not to need further argument.

I.

THE STATUTE INVOLVED AND THE NATURE OF THE CASE

(A) THE STATUTE

This appeal attempts to raise questions concerning the validity of certain portions of Georgia's 1968 abortion law, both facially and in operation. Ga. Laws 1968, pp. 1249, 1277-1280; Criminal Code of Georgia §§ 26-1201, 1202, and 1203. These sections are set out in the Appendix to Appellant's Jurisdictional Statement, pp. 1f-4f. The portions of the cited law which figure in this appeal prescribe an orderly and careful procedure to safeguard the health and life of the woman to be aborted as well as to assure a measure of caution and deliberation before such a drastic life-destroying step is taken.

Three basic steps are provided. The pregnant woman's doctor, who is to perform the abortion, must state that in his judgment the abortion is necessary and that the woman is a resident of the State. Second, two other physicians must concur in his judgment that the abortion is necessary, based on their separate personal medical examinations of the pregnant woman. Third, the abortion is to be performed in a licensed and accredited hospital. A committee of the hospital's staff, composed of not less than three members, must approve the abortion by majority vote. Although the physician proposing to perform the abortion may not be a member of that committee, the two physicians who concurred with his judgment are not so excluded. Consequently, the statute may be interpreted as requiring the approval of only three physicians, as it may be that the two concurring physicians are the same persons who constitute the approving majority in a hospital committee. The State courts have not been asked to construe this item or, for that matter, any other portion of the abortion statute. These conditions, imposed as preliminary steps to be taken before an unborn child's life is extinguished are contained in subsection (b) of Code Section 26-1202.

(B) THE PROCEEDINGS BELOW

Appellants sought a declaratory judgment invalidating as an abridgment of constitutional rights the entire abortion law of Georgia; they also sought a broad injunction against the law's "enforcement, operation, or execution." Plaintiff-Appellants were the unidentified, assertedly pregnant "Mary Doe", certain physicians who purportedly wished to perform abortions, and nurses, social workers, ministers, family planning and abortion counseling organizations all purportedly desiring to advise pregnant women with respect to abortions. It was not alleged that they were being prosecuted or in any way threatened or acted against by any of the Defendant-Appellees, or by anyone else for that matter, with respect to the statute. Its mere existence constituted the basis of their complaint.

A three-judge court convened, heard argument, and received briefs, all primarily on the questions of facial constitutionality and their jurisdiction in the matter.

On July 31, 1970, the court issued its opinion. It concluded that the case presented a substantial constitutional question; that there was a cognizable, justiciable controversy, but only between the unidentified "Mary Doe" and Defendants; that a pregnant woman has a constitutionally-protected right to decide to abort a pregnancy; that the State cannot proscribe the reasons for abortion but may only control the quality of the decision and its manner of execution; and that the portions of the law which limited the permissible reasons for abortion were unconstitutional. Appendix to Appellants' Jurisdictional Statement, pp. 1-a to 15-a. Appellants' request for injunctive relief was denied, and the declaratory relief offered was formalized by order and judgment on August 24, 1970. Appellants' Jurisdictional Statement, Appendix, pp. 1-b to 3-b. Subsequent to the Notices of Appeal, the court sua sponte modified its original opinion to state that hospital abortion committees cannot limit themselves by the adoption of the same standards which were declared unconstitutionally restrictive in the State's criminal law. It also amended its judgment to deny the motion to reconsider revocation of the guardian ad litem appointment and to deny representative intervention on behalf of the unborn child. The questions presented in this appeal are not based on the court's modification and amendment, and they are therefore basically unrelated.

II.

ARGUMENT

THE QUESTIONS ON WHICH THE DECISION OF THE CAUSE DEPENDS ARE SO UNSUBSTANTIAL AS NOT TO NEED FURTHER ARGUMENT.

Preliminarily, it must be noted that in attempting to justify and demonstrate the substantiality of the first question proposed by Appellants, with respect to the justification for an injunction, they engraft a general discussion of the issues involved in the whole abortion problem in an effort to clothe their specific question with the substantiality inherent in this currently volatile subject. This, it is submitted, confuses the real question presented and fails to answer the question as to why the contentions raised in this appeal should be fully explored by this Court. In other words, the myriad of issues springing from changes in the states' abortion laws and from the attitudes of the nation's population are irrelevant in terms of the issue of whether the lower court should have issued an injunction against the enforcement, operation, or execution of Georgia's abortion statute by Appellees against Appellants.

That question is a mere collateral segment of the body of concern surrounding abortion, if indeed it is a segment peculiar to that subject at all. The views of the medical profession, which itself does not establish a state's policy concerning the definition of crime, the policies of other states as implemented through their legislatures' enactments, which under no principle of our federal system may be thrust upon an unwilling, coequal State, and the actual controversies being litigated in various jurisdictions and involving dissimilar statutes have no bearing on the purported "right" to an injunction in this case.

Therefore, the magnitude of the abortion controversy, with all of its complex components and spin-off questions, does not lend weight or substance to the specific question raised here.

(A) WHETHER THE LOWER COURT SHOULD HAVE ISSUED AN INJUNCTION IS NOT A MATTER TO WHICH THIS COURT NEED DEVOTE ITS FURTHER ATTENTION.

Appellants contend that they were entitled to an injunction from the three-judge court, enjoining the "enforcement, operation or execution" of the portions of the state statute declared unconstitutional. This is based on the theory that the anti-injunction statute, 28 U.S.C. § 2283, which specifically prohibits enjoining proceedings in a state court, is not involved since no state proceedings are pending or threatened. It follows, Appellants contend, that therefore the prohibition does not apply and the court had a wider latitude in granting an injunction.

But such a view completely overlooks the nature of, and prerequisites for, an injunction. A proper analysis of this extraordinary equitable remedy will dispel the notion that a substantial federal constitutional question is involved in the district court's declination of an injunction. The denial was based on the discretionary use of the staying hand of abstention, the court stating that the vindication of the rights of "Mary Doe" should be left to the State courts. Even if the other Appellants had not been dismissed as Plaintiffs for lack of a justiciable controversy, and the denial of injunction applied also directly to them, the same result is required.

The specific prohibition of Section 2283 does not change the basic prerequisites for injunctive relief under Section 2281, nor does it alter the nature of such a remedy. Regardless of what else is required, the granting of an injunction is always within the sound discretion of the trial court. American Federation of Labor; Metal Trades Department v. Watson, 327 U.S. 582, 66 S.Ct. 761, 90 L.Ed. 873 (1946); Government and Civic Employees Organizing Committee, CIO v. Windsor, 116 F.Supp. 354 (N.D. Ala. 1953), aff'd 347 U.S. 901, 74 S.Ct. 429, 98 L.Ed. 1061 (1954); Abbott Laboratories v. Gardner, 387 U.S. 136, 87 S.Ct. 1507, 18 L.Ed.2d 681 (1967); Petroleum Exploration v. Public Service Commission, 304 U.S. 209, 58 S.Ct. 834, 82 L.Ed. 1294 (1937). It has been long recognized that injunctive relief is a transcendent or extraordinary power, to be used sparingly and only in a clear and plain case. Irwin v. Dixion, 9 How. 10, 13 L.Ed. 25 (1850). Since an injunction is an extraordinary equitable remedy, an appeal from its denial must establish an abuse of discretion. United States v. W. T. Grant Co., 345 U.S. 629, 633, 73 S.Ct. 894, 97 L.Ed. 1303 (1953). Appellants here have made no such allegation, nor offered any grounds to support such a finding. And as said in Petroleum Exploration v. Public Service Commission, supra:

> "To justify the use of the extraordinary power of a court of equity, there must be allegation and proof of threatened injury under some of the recognized sources of equitable jurisdiction."

Despite Appellants' argument, the fact that there is no pending or threatened State action against "Mary Doe" or any of the other Appellants does not open the door to injunctive relief by removing the anti-injunction impediment. Contrarily, it adds fuel to the justification of the injunction's denial. The enactment of Section 2283 did not remove or lessen the general prerequisites for injunctive relief under Section 2281.

There are two elements starkly missing from this case, the absence of which elements not only shows that the lower court's denial hints of no abuse of discretion at all, but going one step further, shows that an injunction would not have been warranted.

The first absent element is irreparable injury. As recognized in Wells v. Hand, 238 F.Supp. 779 (M.D. Ga. 1965), aff'd sub nom. Wells v. Reynolds, 382 U.S. 39, 86 S.Ct. 160, 15 L.Ed.2d 32 (1965):

> "The controlling question is whether the plaintiffs > have made a sufficient showing that the need for equitable relief by the injunction is urgent in order to prevent great and irreparable injury. American Federation of Labor v. Watson, 327 U.S. 582, 66 S.Ct. 761, 90 L.Ed. 873 (1946). The injunctive relief sought . . . must be measured by the extraordinary circumstances rule and considerations of whether the danger of irreparable loss is both great and immediate." Id. 238 F.Supp. at 786.

Stated another way, exceptional circumstances and a clear showing of necessity are required to interfere to prevent the enforcement of a criminal statute. Spielman Motor Sales Co. v. Dodge, 295 U.S. 89, 55 S.Ct. 678, 79 L.Ed. 1322 (1935).

The "irreparable injury" claimed in the instant appeal is, to say the least, conjectural and suppositious. No facts whatsoever with respect to these particular Appellants are claimed in support of the cry. One such "irreparable injury" urged is the possibility of state prosecution of "a physician". But Appellants even admit that such an eventuality would only occur "despite all reasonable expectations." Even in Appellants' view, such prosecution is only "potential". Jurisdictional Statement, p. 14. The second "irreparable injury" apparently urged is not specifically identified, although Appellants assert that a special circumstance is the short time span a pregnant woman has in which to procure an abortion. What the irreparable injury to this unidentified group of women would be, without the intervention of a general injunction in the present case, is left to assumption, as is the answer to whether the injury needs prevention by federal injunction. To warrant such intervention, the injury claimed must be "clear and imminent". American Fed- eration of Labor; Metal Trades Department v. Watson, 327 U.S. 582, 66 S.Ct. 761, 90 L.Ed. 873 (1946).

What clear and imminent, great and irreparable loss to "Mary Doe", whoever she is, will result without a permanent injunction? What clear and imminent, great and irreparable loss will result to that body of pregnant women in Georgia which "Mary Doe" presumes to represent? What clear and imminent, great and irreparable loss will result to the physicians, or to the nurses, or to the ministers, or to the social workers, or to the organizations, without an injunction in the present case? The complete absence of answers to these questions in Appellants' case illustrate that an injunction would not be warranted. Far more would be needed to present to this Court for full review a substantial federal constitutional question involving the lower court's refusal of injunctive relief.[1]

Even in Dombrowski[2] relied upon by Appellants, the granting of injunctive relief was deemed appropriate because "the denial . . . may well result in the denial of any effective safeguard against the loss of protective freedoms of expression, and cannot be justified." Such is obviously not the case here.

[1]Appellants claim that injunctive relief would prevent multiple suits. They offer for illustration the attempted intervention in this case of "Jane Roe", and the independent suit filed by "Polly Poe." But "Jane Roe's" quarrel was with Georgia Baptist Hospital, and "Polly Poe's" suit is against Fulton-DeKalb Hospital Authority. Neither of these organizations were defendants in the instant case so that, even putting aside all other dissimilar circumstances, an injunction against the current Appellees would not enjoin those organizations unless it were shown that they were persons in active concert or participation with Appellees and received actual notice of the injunctive order. Federal Rules of Civil Procedure, 65(d); Zenith Radio Corporation v. Hazeltine Research, 395 U.S. 100, 112, 89 S.Ct. 1562, 23 L.Ed.2d 129 (1969).

The second failure with respect to the request for injunctive relief in this case is the total absence of any threatened or probable act which might cause irreparable injury. Without such, injunctive relief may not be granted. Public Service Commission v. Wycoff Co., 344 U.S. 237, 73 S.Ct. 236, 97 L.Ed. 291 (1952). See also Beacon Theatres, Inc. v. Westover, 359 U.S. 500, 79 S.Ct. 948, 3 L.Ed.2d 988 (1959); Cavanaugh v. Looney, 248 U.S. 453, 39 S.Ct. 142, 63 L.Ed. 354 (1918). Not only do Appellants admit that no State criminal prosecution is pending or threatened, they assert no pending, threatened, or probable act of any kind by any of the Appellees against any of them, much less an act that would be prohibited. As early stated by this Court, the injury must be impending and threatened, so as to be averted only by the protective preventive process of injunction, in order for it to issue. Truly v. Wanzer, 5 How. 141, 12 L.Ed. 88 (1847). There must be at least a threat of irreparable injury, as required by traditional doctrines of equity. Cameron v. Johnson, 390 U.S. 611, 88 S.Ct. 1335, 20 L.Ed.2d 182 (1968).

Apparently, Appellants' asserted justification for injunction is the combination of Appellees' capacities as office-holders, combined with the existence of a State criminal statute declared partially unconstitutional. Such does not warrant injunctive relief. As held in Watson v. Buck, 313 U.S. 387, 61 S.Ct. 962, 85 L.Ed. 1416, (1941), even a general statement that an officer stands ready to perform his duty to prosecute violators of a criminal statute is not the equivalent of a threat that prosecutions are to be begun immediately, in such numbers, or in such manner as to indicate the virtual certainty of that extraordinary injury which alone justifies equitable suspension of proceedings in criminal courts under an invalid statute.

Much less, then, can Appellants suggest that this Court review the denial of injunction and reverse it as an abuse of discretion. In the absence of any claim that the statute is being, or will be, asserted to violate any constitutionally protected rights of the Appellants in their various capacities, it is submitted that an injunction would be completely unappropriate, so that its denial need not be reviewed.

As recognized by this Court in Dombrowski v. Pfister, supra:

> "It is generally to be assumed that state courts and prosecutors will observe constitutional limitations as expounded by this Court, and that the mere possibility of erroneous initial application of constitutional standards will usually not amount to the irreparable injury necessary to justify a disruption of orderly state proceedings." 380 U.S. at 484-485.

Appellants' contention is that since part of the statute was declared unconstitutional, an injunction is mandated against its enforcement, operation, or execution. Such a proposition presents no substantial federal constitutional question, because if Appellant's position were correct, an injunction against future enforcement would automatically be required in every case where a statute's constitutionality is rejected. And such is not the law. As noted in Zwickler v. Koota, 389 U.S. 241, 88 S.Ct. 391, 19 L.Ed.2d 444 (1967), the appropriateness and merits of a declaratory judgment, and the propriety of issuing an injunction, are to be decided irrespective of each other.

(B) WHETHER THE REMAINING PROVISIONS OF GEORGIA'S ABORTION LAW RAISE DUE PROCESS AND EQUAL PROTECTION QUESTIONS OF FEDERAL CONSTITUTIONAL MOMENT IS PREMATURE, LACKS STATUS AS A JUSTICIABLE CONTROVERSY, AND DOES NOT LEND ITSELF FOR REVIEW AS A SUBSTANTIAL CONSTITUTIONAL QUESTION.

(1) Appellants propose that the Court examine the statute in its new posture, with the exclusion of the portions struck by the lower court. The judicial surgery undertaken by the three-judge court has left the statute in a different frame and has vastly changed the nature of the statute so that it now takes on a more health-oriented primary purpose. Such a drastic change should not, it is submitted, subject the remainder to scrutiny by this Court at the first instance. The lower court viewed the unchanged statute as an attempt to treat abortion as a medical problem. Opinion of the District Court, Appellants' Jurisdictional Statement, p. 12-a. Georgia, however, had viewed it as more than merely medical, and prescribed criminal sanctions for all but specified types of abortions.

The judicial conversion of the statute should first be opened to State examination. The legislature, which has not met since the declaratory judgment was rendered, should have an opportunity to review and possibly revise the statute. As this Court has on numerous occasions repeated:

> "We construe a criminal statute. 'It is the legislature, not the Court, which is to define a crime, and ordain its punishment.' " Arroyo v. United States, 359 U.S. 419, 79 S.Ct. 864, 3 L.Ed.2d 915 (1959), citing a line of cases.

The legislature should be afforded time to adjust the remaining provisions to the policy of the State. This Court has traditionally left matters of State policy to those governments. As was said in Building Service Employees International Union v. Gazzam, 339 U.S. 532, 70 S.Ct. 784, 94 L.Ed. 1045, (1950):

> "The public policy of any state is to be found in its constitution, acts of the legislature, and decisions of its courts. 'Primarily, it is for the law makers to determine the public policy of the State.' Twin City Pipe Line Co. v. Harding Glass Co., 283 U.S. 353, 357, 75 L.Ed. 1112, 1116, 51 S.Ct. 476, 83 ALR 1168."

The State appellate courts have not yet construed the abortion law adopted in 1968, either in its entirety or as altered in the proceedings below. The construction of State statutes is primarily the concern of State courts. Here, there has been no authoritative declaration by the State, and the State's construction could conceivably avoid any decision under the Fourteenth Amendment. Such was the case in Reetz v. Bozanich, 397 U.S. 82, 90 S.Ct. 788, 25 L.Ed.2d 68 (1970).

The prematurity of a substantial federal constitutional question is demonstrated by Appellants' own argument. They have construed the new law in such a way that it is favorable to their "burdensome" argument. Appellants' construction is not authoritative nor substantiated by fact. For example, it is claimed that the pregnant woman has no right to appear before the hospital abortion committee[3]. This detail is a subject on which the statute is silent and the Appellants vociferous. A construction has not been sought from the State courts. No reason is given why the State would interpret and construe the statute contrary to constitutional requirements, nor is it contended that due process could not be afforded under the procedure prescribed. Appellants' objection, postulated without proof, may well be open to settlement without involving matters of constitutional magnitude. Consequently, there is no substantial federal constitutional question which compels full review by this Court presently.

(2) Even if the Court would agree that the statute is ripe for this ultimate review, the charge of vagueness and ambiguity is unsubstantial.

The lower court modified the statute so that its concern is with medical matters primarily. Appellants complain that the test is so vague and ambiguous that it violates due process. According to the statute, as modified by the court, an abortion is permitted where it is deemed necessary in the best clinical judgment of a duly licensed physician-surgeon. Taking this criterion in its context, and considering additionally that an abortion will not be performed except where two additional physician-surgeons independently come to the same conclusion of necessity, and a hospital committee approves it, it is obvious that the test is not so vague as to fail to pass constitutional muster.

[3]Appellants' Jurisdictional Statement, p. 18.

The due process clause of the Fourteenth Amendment to the federal Constitution requires a State to frame its criminal statutes so "that those to whom they are addressed may know what standard of conduct is intended to be required." Cline v. Frink Dairy Co., 274 U.S. 445, 458, 47 S.Ct. 681, 71 L.Ed. 1146 (1927). It is explicit in the statute that, before an abortion may be performed, the physician-surgeon must have concluded, upon an application of his best clinical judgment, that it is necessary. It is only the performance of an abortion without this prerequisite finding, that is proscribed. It is patent that such a test does not fail to give adequate warning of the conduct proscribed. It is patent that a doctor's finding of necessity for an operation, as judged by clinical standards in a medical frame of reference, do not fail to give adequate warning of the conduct proscribed.

This Court has recognized that lack of precision in criminal statutes is not itself offensive to the requirements of due process. In Roth v. United States, 354 U.S. 476, 491-492, 77 S.Ct. 1304, 1 L.Ed.2d 1498 (1957), reh. den., 355 U.S. 852, the Court quoted from the Petrillo case.[4]

> "'. . . [T]he constitution does not require impossible standards'. All that is required is that the language 'conveys sufficiently definite warning as to the proscribed conduct when measured by common understanding and practice. . . .'"
> "'. . . That there may marginal cases in which it is difficult to determine the side of the line on which a particular situation falls is not sufficient reason to hold the language too ambiguous to define a criminal offense. . . .'"

[4] United States v. Petrillo, 332 U.S. 1, 7, 8, 67 S.Ct. 1538, 91 L.Ed. 1877, 1883 (1947).

(3) The claims of "Mary Doe" and the class she claims to represent with respect to purported due process and equal protection violations, present no question for review. None of the arguments are based on a concrete body of facts. The total absence of a proven set of circumstances leaves a void which prevents the subjection of nebulous propositions to the revealing light of cold, hard fact which would comprise a real case or controversy. There is no frame of reference to relate theory to. Consequently, the appeal presents only a general discussion of the pros and cons of unbridled abortion. Such a situation lacks that crystalized adverseness which would remove it from the realm of the merely hypothetical.

Moreover, the procedure for obtaining an abortion is patently defendable as an attempt to surround the irreversible decision, in which the termination of the life of another is involved, with care and caution.

(C) THE QUESTION AS TO THE "STANDING" AND "COLLISION OF INTEREST" OF APPELLANTS OTHER THAN "MARY DOE" PRESENTS NO SUBSTANTIAL FEDERAL CONSTITUTIONAL QUESTIONS FOR REVIEW.

Appellants, physicians, nurses, social workers, ministers, and counselling organizations question the lower court's conclusion that their challenge to the statute lacked the requisite justiciability. The Court was right. There is no assertion of dispute between any of the Appellants and any of the Appellees, except with respect to their opinions concerning the statute. No adverse relationship was asserted. Since the availability of declaratory relief depends on whether there is a "live dispute between the parties", and this is absent in the current case, nothing remains for this Court to review. Powell v. McCormick, 395 U.S. 486, 517-518, 89 S.Ct. 1944, 23 L.Ed.2d 491 (1969). As held by this Court in Maryland Casualty Co. v. Pacific Coal and Oil Co., 312 U.S. 270, 273, 61 S.Ct. 510, 85 L.Ed. 826, 828 (1941):

> "[There must be] a substantial controversy between parties having adverse legal interests, of sufficient immediacy and reality to warrant the issuance of a declaratory judgment."

Appellants claim a "personal stake" by virtue of the conspiracy and the aiding and abetting statutes. Yet they point to no case in Georgia under either the old Georgia abortion statute or the presently-challenged one, illustrating a possibility of prosecution for conspiring to perform an abortion or for aiding or abetting in its performance by counselling or otherwise. The "collision of interest" is consequently merely conjectural.

Moreover, the question of the dismissed Plaintiffs' standing is not of great importance since the lack of a justiciable controversy as to them did not prevent the court from issuing a declaratory judgment favoring their contentions.

CONCLUSION

WHEREFORE, Appellees respectfully submit that the questions upon which this cause depends are so unsubstantial as not to need further argument, and Appellees move the Court to dismiss the appeal from the United States District for the Northern District of Georgia.

3. The State Has No Interest in Increasing Its Population; On the Contrary, Its Interest, if Any, Is in Limiting Population Growth 18

4. The State Has No Interest in Requiring That All Embryos Develop and Be Born 19

a. The Law Has Never Restricted Abortions for the Purpose of Protecting the Embryo 19

b. There Is No Legal Recognition of the Fetus as a Person; Live Birth Is Required Before Any Rights Attach 20

c. The View That "Human Life" Commences With Conception Is a Philosophical Conclusion Not Supported by Scientific Evidence 20

5. Conclusion 21

II.

The Application and Effect of Restrictive Abortion Laws, Such as the Georgia Abortion Law, Results in Discrimination Against Poor and Non-White Women in Exercising Their Fundamental Interest in Marital and Individual Privacy, Denying to Them the Equal Protection of the Laws 22

A. Factual Data Demonstrate Discrimination Against the Poor and Non-White 22

B. As a Result of the Disproportionate Unavailability of Hospital Abortions to Them, the Poor and the Non-White Resort to Unsafe Criminal Abortions Which

Lead to High Mortality and Morbidity Rates 29

C. Where Abortion Restrictions Have Been Eliminated, the Poor and the Non-White in Fact Receive Abortion Services in a Non-Discriminatory Manner 31

D. The Impact of the Restrictive Abortion Law Effectively Denies Equal Protection to the Poor and Non-White 32

III.

Where the State Has Permitted Abortions to Take Place in Certain Hospitals Under Certain Conditions, but Has Delegated Unreviewable Authority Without Standards to a Private Body to Decide in Which Hospitals Abortions May Take Place, and Has Delegated Unreviewable Authority to Physicians and Committees of Physicians to Decide Under Which Conditions Abortions May Take Place, and Said Physicians Have Compelling Reasons to Skew Their Decisions Against Granting Abortions, and Where Such Delegations of Authority Are Likely to Result and in Fact Result in Discrimination in Obtaining Abortion Against the Poor and Non-White, the State Has Denied to the Poor and Non-White the Equal Protection of the Laws 37

A. Restricting Lawful Abortions to Accredited Hospitals Results in Discrimination Against the Poor and Non-White 37

B. Delegation of Authority to Physicians and Their Committees to Approve Abortions at Their Peril Results in Discrimination Against the Poor and the Non-White 43

MARY DOE, et al., etc.,

Appellants,

vs.

ARTHUR K. BOLTON, Attorney General of the State of Georgia, et al., etc.,

Appellees.

On Appeal From the United States District Court for the Northern District of Georgia.

Motion for Leave to File Brief Amici Curiae in Support of Appellants.

The National Legal Program on Health Problems of the Poor, the National Welfare Rights Organization and the American Public Health Association hereby respectfully move the Court for leave to file their attached brief amici curiae in support of appellants in the above-entitled matter.

The National Legal Program on Health Problems of the Poor is a law reform center funded by the U.S. Office of Economic Opportunity to provide support for OEO Legal Services programs across the country in cases involving health problems of the poor, and to provide, through education, research and legal representation, assistance in the preparation of important litigation in health law. In that capacity, the Program participated as amicus curiae in this case in the court below. The Program is based at UCLA School of Law.

The National Welfare Rights Organization is a voluntary association with 125,000 members in 50 states, organized to represent the interests of low income people and welfare recipients with regard to redress of legal grievances, to act as a spokesman for such people and to educate and inform them of their legal rights.

The American Public Health Association is a voluntary association of professionals and others in the field of health care who are concerned about improving the quality and the means of providing for the health care of the American people. The APHA works to identify and study these problems, and to communicate its concerns to the government and the public.

These organizations share the view that restrictive state abortion laws, such as the Georgia statute here under review, have a negative effect on the health and well-being of American women, and have a particularly severe impact on the nation's poor and non-white populations. It is the poor and non-white who suffer most from limited access to legal abortion, and it is they who incur greatly disproportionate numbers of deaths and crippling injuries as a result of being forced to seek criminal abortion.

There are a number of grounds for constitutional challenge to the abortion law here under review. Amici request leave to file this brief at the invitation of counsel for appellants, in order to present in some depth the argument that the discriminatory application and effect of the abortion law denies to the poor and non-white the equal protection of the law.

It is the understanding and belief of amici that this argument will not be developed in any detail in the principal briefs for appellants, and that appellants rely on the within brief for this purpose. Therefore, the equal protection analysis and issues raised in this brief will not be repetitious of other arguments.

BRIEF OF AMICI CURIAE.

Summary of Argument.

A woman who seeks an abortion is asserting certain fundamental rights which are protected by the Constitution. Among these are the rights to marital and family privacy, to individual and sexual privacy; in sum, the right to choose whether to bear children or not. These rights are abridged by the state's restriction of abortions to limited circumstances. To justify such an abridgment, the state must demonstrate a compelling interest; no such compelling interest exists to save the Georgia abortion law.

The state's interest in protecting the woman's health no longer supports the restrictions on abortion set forth in the Georgia statute. Medical science now performs abortions more safely than it brings a woman through pregnancy and childbirth. Any state interest in discouraging non-marital sexual relationships must be served by laws penalizing these relationships, and not by an indirect, overly broad prohibition on abortion. There is no evidence, in any case, that abortion laws deter such sexual relationships. The state's purported interest in expanding the population lacks any viability today; government policy in every other area is now squarely against it. And any purported interest in permitting all embryos to develop and be born is not supported anywhere in the Constitution or any other body of law.

Because of its restrictions, the Georgia statute denies to poor and non-white women equal access to legal abortions. It is an undeniable fact that abortion in Georgia and in virtually every other state in the United States is far more readily available to the white, paying patient than to the poor and the non-white. Studies by physicians, sociologists, public health experts, and lawyers all reach this same conclusion. The reasons for it are not purely economic, i.e., that because abortion is an expensive commodity to obtain on the medical marketplace, it is therefore to be expected that the rich will have greater access to it. It is also because in the facilities which provide health care to the poor, abortion is simply not made available to the poor and non-white on the same conditions as it is to paying patients. As a result, the poor resort to criminal abortion, with its high toll of infection and death, in vastly disproportionate numbers.

Largely to blame are restrictive abortion laws, such as the Georgia statute, in which the legislature has made lay judgments about what conditions must exist before abortions can be legally performed, and has delegated the authority to make such decisions to physicians and committees of physicians with the threat of felony punishment if they err on the side of granting abortion. Unlike more privileged women, poor and non-white women are unable to shop for physicians and hospitals sympathetic to their applications, cannot afford the necessary consultations to establish that their conditions qualify them for treatment, and must largely depend on public hospitals and physicians with whom they have no personal relationship, and who operate under the government's eye, for the relief they seek. The resulting discrimination is easily demonstrated.

The state has confounded the unequal treatment of the poor and non-white by requiring that abortions may only be performed in hospitals accredited by the Joint Commission on Accreditation of Hospitals, thus severely limiting the number of hospitals to which the poor and non-white may have access, without any legitimate state purpose for doing so. The state has also worsened the discriminatory treatment of the poor and non-white by permitting all hospitals to arbitrarily reject abortion patients, including hospitals which have federal constitutional responsibilities not to discriminate by virtue of their public or publicly-subsidized status.

In the absence of any compelling state interest, the harsh discriminatory effect on the poor and the non-white resulting from the operation of the Georgia abortion law denies to poor and non-white women the equal protection of the laws in violation of the Equal Protection Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment.

ARGUMENT.

I.

THE GEORGIA ABORTION LAW INFRINGES UPON THE RIGHT TO MARITAL AND INDIVIDUAL PRIVACY WITHOUT A COMPELLING STATE INTEREST.

A. The Statute Infringes Upon the Right to Privacy.

The right to privacy has been recognized as a constitutionally protected right. The Georgia abortion statute infringes on the right to marital privacy and the woman's right to individual privacy.

1. Marital Privacy.

In Griswold v. Connecticut, 381 U.S. 479, this Court recognized the right to marital privacy when the Court voided a state statute prohibiting dissemination of contraceptive information and devices. The Court defined the right to privacy in terms of the right to personal solitude and autonomy and applied it to a "zone of privacy in marriage," thereby setting forth a right that may not be disturbed by the state without a compelling and valid interest.

The explicit recognition in Griswold of a right of marital privacy is but one decision in a line of decisions, dating over fifty years, giving constitutional protection to various rights in the procreative, marital and family context, none of which is explicitly enumerated in the Bill of Rights. These decisions include Skinner v. Oklahoma, 316 U.S. 535, 536 ("the right to have offspring" is a constitutionally protected "human right"); Pierce v. Society of Sisters, 268 U.S. 510, 534-35 (the right to send one's children to private school is derived from "the liberty of parents and guardians to direct the upbringing and education of children under their control"); and Meyer v. Nebraska, 262 U.S. 390, 399 (the liberty guaranteed by the Fourteenth Amendment denotes "the right of the individual to . . . marry, establish a home and bring up children"). More recently, Loving v. Virginia, 388 U.S. 1, 12, specifically held that the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendmant protects "the freedom to marry . . . as one of the vital personal rights essential to the orderly pursuit of happiness by free men".

Recognition of the right of privacy asserted in the case now before the Court thus would not usher in a vast increase in judicial power. What has been said pertaining to Griswold applies here:

> It required no judicial roving at large to reach the conclusion that the freedom of the marital relationship is a part of the bundle of rights associated with home, family, and marriage—rights supported by precedent, history and common understanding. . . . In exercising its powers in Griswold to protect a fundamental personal liberty, the Court, far from advancing to a new milepost on the high road of judicial supremacy, was treading a worn and familiar path. Kauper, "Penumbras, Peripheries, Emanations, Things Fundamental and Things Forgotten: The Griswold Case," 64 Mich. L. Rev. 235, 258 (1958).

This Court, in Griswold, endorsed the contention that certain areas of one's life are so personal that they are nobody else's business; that there is a right to simply withdraw into personal intimacy without hindrance by the State, and a right to protection of this private sphere. Without any 'invasion' of the marital bedchamber, and without any attempt by the state to obtain incriminating evidence, the Court held the Connecticut statute to be an invasion of the protected "zone of marital privacy." Surely, the State had no interest in invading the sanctity, or privacy, of any other decisions involving family planning.

> Griswold's act was to prevent formation of the fetus. This, the court found, was constitutionally protected. If an individual may prevent conception, why can he not nullify that conception when prevention has failed? Clark, "Religion, Morality and Abortion: A Constitutional Appraisal," 2 Loyola U. (L.A.) L. Rev. 1, 9 (Apr. 1969).

The Georgia statute, by limiting the authorization of abortions to certain situations, puts limits upon the married couple's fundamental right to decide whether or not to bear a child, at the instant when an ovum is fertilized. Until that moment, the couple has complete freedom of choice as to when, whether, and how often they shall produce children. But once fertilization occurs, their freedom of choice ends and they may not choose not to have a child. The state thus invades, and even supersedes, a married couple's constitutional right to control the use of their procreative powers. Under Griswold it is surely not the means of control, but the power to control which is significant.

The existence and enforcement of this statute allows the state to intrude into the very essence of the marital relationship and indeed to affect the very course and fate of the marriage itself. As did the Connecticut anti-contraceptive statute, the Georgia abortion statute unconstitutionally "operates directly on an intimate relation of husband and wife." 381 U.S. at 483.

2. The Right of Privacy of the Individual Woman.

The right to privacy, to seclusion and autonomy, established as to married couples in Griswold, supra, surely belongs to individuals as well.

The right of a woman to control her own body, specifically whether or not to continue a pregnancy, is inherent in the decision in Terry v. Ohio, 393 U.S. 1, 8-9, that "no right is more sacred . . . than the right of every individual to the possession and control of his own person. . . ." See also Olmstead v. United States, 277 U.S. 438, 478 (Brandeis, J., dissenting).

The right of the woman to decide whether to terminate an unwanted pregnancy follows inexorably from the broad principle that she is entitled to be "let alone" by the state and its agents. For a state to adopt such provisions as the State of Georgia has done in this statute represents an impermissible intrusion into her right to her personal integrity and is a deprivation of her personal liberty. By compelling her, against her will, to continue a pregnancy, the woman may be adversely affecting the essential direction and quality of her own life (and perhaps the lives of others with whom she lives and works, as well). If a woman is viewed as an individual entity, and not as a vessel for propagation, each time she determines whether to bear a child or not, she is without doubt making a truly fundamental choice of her life. Women are no longer a vehicle for a determination by others that supervening social interests require their frequent childbearing for the purpose of adding to the population. Through the medium of the abortion law, however, they are subject to the determination of society in general, which (so far as the lawmaking process is concerned) is largely male, that no woman may make for herself the decision not to complete a pregnancy to term when she does not desire to. As set out below, the state has no compelling interest in demanding that a woman should carry an unwanted child.

Several courts have acknowledged that the woman's right to her physical integrity requires that she be allowed to make the decision as to the termination of her pregnancy without hindrance by the state. These cases stand for the proposition that abortion statutes are wholly inconsistent with the existence of a right so fundamental in nature, and are, therefore, unconstitutional. In one of these cases was the state's interest in the policy expressed in the challenged abortion statute considered to be of sufficiently compelling nature to justify legislative efforts to circumscribe a woman's right to decide, after consultation with her physician, to terminate her pregnancy.

In People v. Belous, 71 Cal. 2d 954 (1969), cert. denied, 397 U.S. 915, for example, the Supreme Court of California, in striking down as unconstitutional the pre-1967 abortion law of California, stated:

> The rights involved in the instant case are the woman's right to life and to choose whether to bear children. The woman's right to life is involved because childbirth involves risks of death.
>
> The fundamental right of the woman to choose whether to bear children follows from the Supreme Court's and this Court's repeated acknowledgment of a "right of privacy" or "liberty" in matters related to marriage, family, and sex. 71 Cal. 2d at 963 (footnotes and citations omitted).

See also Babbitz v. McCann, 310 F. Supp. 293 (E.D. Wis. 1970), appeal dismissed per curiam, 400 U.S. 1, where the court said:

> The police power of the state does not . . . entitle it to deny to a woman the basic right reserved to her under the Ninth Amendment to decide whether she should carry or reject an embryo which has not quickened. 310 F. Supp. at 302.

The right "to be let alone" has, to be sure, been qualfied in a few cases involving physical intrusion into the body, but only where the state interest has been compelling, that is, where the exercise of that right has threatened the rights of other members of society. For example, the power of the state to require vaccinations and to quarantine persons suffering from contagious diseases, although upheld, has been limited to situations involving "great dangers", and "the safety of the general public." Jacobson v. Massachusetts, 197 U.S. 11, 29 (1904). In Jacobson, even so minor an infringement of liberty and of the individual's sovereignty over his body as vaccination was held to require a strong justification.

Also supporting the individual's right to control his own body are recent cases which have upheld the individual's right to refuse medical treatment, even though such a refusal will clearly result in death. See e.g., Erickson v. Dilgard, 44 Misc. 2d 27, 252 N.Y.S. 2d 705 (Nassau County Sup. Ct. 1962); In re Brooks Estate, 32 Ill. 2d 361, 205 N.E. 2d 435 (1965).

In a case where blood transfusions were permitted without the patient's consent, Pres. & Directors of Georgetown College, Inc. v. Jones, 231 F. 2d 1000 (D.C. Cir. 1964), cert. denied, 377 U.S. 978, the court based its order on two grounds: (1) the state had an interest in preserving the life of a woman whose small child might become a public charge if she died; and (2) the patient was too weak from loss of blood to be capable of making a competent decision. This case was followed in United States v. George, 239 F. Supp. 752 (D. Conn. 1965), in which blood transfusions were ordered while the patient was semiconscious, but withdrawn several days later when the patient regained consciousness.

These cases demonstrate that an individual has a right to refuse medical treatment unless the state's interest is so great that the rest of society will be endangered absent such treatment. Similarly, the state has no right to prevent an individual woman from obtaining medical treatment she desires, where that treatment represents no danger to the community as a whole.

B. The Statute Infringes Upon Fundamental Constitutional Rights Without Serving Any Compelling State Interest.

> Where there is a significant encroachment upon personal liberty, the State may prevail only upon showing a subordinating interest which is compelling. Bates v. Little Rock, 361 U.S. 516, 524.

The Georgia abortion statute does not serve any compelling state interest to justify its infringement upon constitutionally protected rights. The statute does not serve any valid health purpose; instead it causes a severe health problem. The state has no valid interest in regulating morality indirectly through an abortion statute. The state has no valid interest in increasing population through an abortion statute. And the state has no interest in requiring that all embryos develop and be born.

1. The Statute Serves No Health Interest of the State; On the Contrary, It Has Created a Severe Health Problem.

Because a state has a valid interest in protecting the health of its citizens, one frequently-asserted justification for restrictive abortion laws has been the state's concern with preserving the health of the woman because of the medical dangers associated with abortion in the past. Indeed, the history of abortion legislation in the United States shows that such a concern was a primary, if not the sole, reason for the passage of such restrictive laws during the nineteenth century. But current medical knowledge and techniques have drastically reduced the hazards of abortion, and any such state interest has disappeared. Now, pregnancy itself may be more harmful to woman's health than an abortion performed under medically approved conditions.

a. The History of the Abortion Statute.

Abortion before "quickening" (i.e., when the first fetal movements are felt by the pregnant woman, usually about the fourth or fifth month) was not a crime under the common law of England; even after quickening, abortion was only a misdemeanor. 3 Coke, Institutes 50 (1648). American law followed suit until the nineteenth century, when legislation making abortion prior to quickening a crime began to appear. These new laws were designed to protect the health of the woman, as State v. Murphy, 27 N.J.L. 112, 114 (Sup. Ct. 1858) declared:

> The design of the [abortion] statute was not to prevent the procuring of abortions, so much as to guard the health and life of the mother against the consequences of such attempts.

The risk of even hospital abortions in the 19th century was formidable, but it is now safer for a woman to have a hospital therapeutic abortion during the first trimester than to bear a child. People v. Belous, supra at 965.

> "At the time the abortion laws were passed, the laws made some medico-legal sense. But now, in view of the progress of medical science, these laws . . . make no sense whatsoever." Hall, "Abortion Laws: A Call for Reform," 18 DePaul L. Rev. 584, 585 (1969). The rate of maternal mortality from complications of or associated with pregnancy and childbirth (excluding induced abortion) is 18 deaths per 100,000 live births, while the rate of mortality associated with legal abortions performed in hospitals at an early stage of gestation is three deaths per 100,000 abortions. Tietze, "Mortality with Contraception and Induced Abortions," 45 Studies in Family Planning 6 (Sept. 1969).

There is no longer any health interest served by Georgia's abortion statute.

b. The Adverse Effect Upon Health of the Georgia Law.

Present restrictive abortion laws, instead of protecting the health of women, have produced a result in direct conflict with that goal. When unable to obtain competent medical treatment, meeting proper medical standards, in appropriate medical facilities, women commonly resort to abortions performed under "back-alley" conditions which often lead to illness and death. The law has thus created "a public health problem of pandemic proportions." Hall, "Abortion in American

BLEED THROUGH

Hospitals," 57 Am. J. Pub. Health 1933, 1934 (1967). The number of criminal abortions performed annually in the United States is not known but has been estimated at from 200,000 upwards. The incidence of infection and permanent physical damage is high, and death is a constant threat. Recent studies reveal a high —and increasing—incidence of infected abortions in the hospitals studied (primarily large city hospitals) and describe such septic abortions as a chief cause of maternal deaths. See, e.g., Moritz & Thompson, "Septic Abortion," 95 Am. J. Obst. & Gynec. 46 (1966).

It is thus clear that illegal abortions present a significant health problem. By making abortion a crime (unless it comes within the categories of the existing law), the state has succeeded in making highly dangerous a form of conduct which serves a necessary function for society and which can be performed safely under the proper medical conditions. See Kummer, "A Psychiatrist Views Our Abortion Enigma," in The Case for Legalized Abortion Now 114 (Guttmacher ed. 1967). The Georgia statute is thus contrary to, rather than in furtherance of, any state interest in protecting the health of its women.

2. The State Has No Valid Interest in Indirectly Legislating Morality, and the Statute Does Not Actually Serve Any Moral Purpose.

It is sometimes asserted that the State has a moral interest in prohibiting abortion because the availability of abortions will tend to encourage promiscuity. If the Georgia legislature is concerned with deterring fornication and adultery, it may enforce statutory prohibitions of and penalties for those acts themselves. "It may not do so, however, by making the penalty a personally, and socially, undesired pregnancy." Baird v. Eisenstadt, 429 F. 2d 1398, 1402 (1st Cir. 1970), prob. juris. noted, 401 U.S. 934.

Even if some state interest in circumscribing promiscuity could be shown, there is no evidence that promiscuity has been decreased or even affected by the existence of abortion laws. If the prevention of such conduct were indeed one purpose of the legislation, the statutory scheme is too indirect to accomplish the legislative intent. Since married women who conceive unwanted pregnancies by their husbands are equally subject to the act, the method of control is not limited to the "evil" sought to be regulated. The statute involved here does not purport to distinguish between married and unmarried women. Even where premarital or extramarital relationships are banned, as in Connecticut at the time of the Griswold opinion, a ban on abortions by married couples in no way reinforces the state's ban on other sexual relationships. "At most [such a] broad ban is of marginal utility to the declared objective." Griswold v. Connecticut, supra at 506 (White, J., concurring).

3. The State Has No Interest in Increasing Its Population; On the Contrary, Its Interest, If Any, Is in Limiting Population Growth.

In view of the increasing public concern over our rapidly multiplying population, any supposed state interest in increasing the number of lives in being can hardly be raised as a justification for the prohibition of abortion. Indeed, the growing emphasis of both federal and state agencies upon preplanning of families and limitation of their size makes mainifestly inconsistent treating the termination of pregnancy as a crime, while birth control devices are not merely permitted but are openly promoted and encouraged by the government. See, e.g., 42 U.S.C. 705(a)(12); 45 C.F.R. 220.20, 220.21.

4. The State Has No Interest in Requiring That All Embryos Develop and Be Born.

There is not now, nor has there ever been, a state interest which requires that all embryos develop and be born.

a. The Law Has Never Restricted Abortions for the Purpose of Protecting the Embryo.

The English common law, followed in this country until the advent of statutory law, permitted abortion before quickening with the woman's consent. The woman's right to abort her pre-quickened fetus was thus "an ancient common-law liberty" of which she was not deprived until the nineteenth century. Means, "The Law of New York Concerning Abortion and the Status of the Foetus, 1664-1968: A Case of Cessation of Constitutionality," 14 N.Y.L.F. 411, 420, 453 (1968). Even under the current Georgia statute, the woman is not prosecuted or punished for her complicity in obtaining an illegal abortion or for aborting herself.

If anything, the historical development of the abortion statutes reflects an interest in protecting the well-being of the woman. "The new statutes were inspired by reverence for life, to be sure; but the life they revered was the pregnant woman's, not that of the unquickened foetus." Id. at 508.

b. There Is No Legal Recognition of the Fetus as a Person; Live Birth Is Required Before Any Rights Attach.

All of the statutes and rules which are generally relied upon to show that an embryo or fetus is legally equivalent to a born child "require a live birth or reflect the interest of the parents." People v. Belous, supra at 968, 968 n. 12.

(1) No recovery is permitted for injuries negligently inflicted upon a fetus by a third person unless the fetus is born alive. Prosser, Law of Torts 336 (4th ed. 1971).

(2) No recovery whatsoever is permitted in many states for wrongful death where there is a stillbirth. Even in those jurisdictions which recognize such a cause of action, it is a recognition on behalf of the parents, who have suffered a distressing wrong in the loss of a child whose birth they desired. Id. at 337. Moreover, every one of those cases requires that the injury have occurred when the fetus was viable (the cases say "quick"). See 15 A.L.R. 3d 992 (1967).

(3) The fetus has no property rights; it must be born alive to take property. See, e.g., People v. Belous, supra, at 968 n. 12.

c. The View That "Human Life" Commences With Conception Is a Philosophical Conclusion Not Supported by Scientific Evidence.

The view that human life commences with conception cannot be supported by any scientific evidence one way or the other. At what point a fetus becomes a "human being" is a subject more fitting for philosophical debate than for scientific judgment. Precisely because human development is a continuum, any choice of a starting point for an individual human being is largely arbitrary. Choosing the point of fertilization of the egg by the sperm is no more logical or meaningful than choosing any other.

> It is said that, as a biological fact, life begins with the fertilized ovum. But in one sense 'life' began in the prehistoric slime and has been continuous since. The question is not when life begins but when human personality begins. This is where the phrase 'the unborn child' subtly begs the question.
> The phrase 'unborn child' can be used, without offense to common sense, in respect of the viable foetus, that is, after about the seventh month of pregnancy, when the foetus is capable of surviving apart from the mother. But the further one goes back in the development of the foetus the more questionable its application becomes. Williams, The Sanctity of Life and the Criminal Law, 197 (1957).

The existence of a conceptus cannot be equated with the life of a grown woman. This woman is—beyond dispute—a human being. To equate her life and her constitutional rights with those of a non-viable fetus is to make a moral judgment. Any individual is entitled to adopt such a moral judgment for guidance in his or her private life, but it is surely a judgment which he cannot enforce upon others through legislation. See Epperson v. Arkansas, 393 U.S. 97.

5. Conclusion.

A single conclusion is dictated by all of the above: the Georgia abortion statute serves no compelling state interest. Because it fails to serve any compelling state interest, its invasion of fundamental rights is in clear violation of the Federal Constitution.

II.

THE APPLICATION AND EFFECT OF RESTRICTIVE ABORTION LAWS, SUCH AS THE GEORGIA ABORTION LAW, RESULTS IN DISCRIMINATION AGAINST POOR AND NON-WHITE WOMEN IN EXERCISING THEIR FUNDAMENTAL INTEREST IN MARITAL AND INDIVIDUAL PRIVACY, DENYING TO THEM THE EQUAL PROTECTION OF THE LAWS.

While amici contend that to receive proper medical care in the form of an abortion approved and performed by a physician is, by itself, a fundamental interest protected by the Constitution (Part I, supra), it is not necessary for abortion to be declared a constitutional right to hold that its discriminatory denial violates guarantees of equal protection. Even when an interest is not found to be fundamental under the Due Process Clause, it may be deemed fundamental under the Equal Protection Clause, and unequal treatment with respect to that interest upheld only on a very strong showing of justification. Note, "Developments in the Law—Equal Protection," 82 Harv. L. Rev., 1065, 1130 (1969).

A. Factual Data Demonstrate Discrimination Against the Poor and Non-White.

The State of Georgia has established a set of categories describing the circumstances under which women may obtain abortions within the State. On their face, these categories allow this treatment for all women who are similarly situated with respect to those circumstances, and excludes from this treatment all others.

Presumably, therefore, those women who qualify for a legal abortion according to the terms of the statute should be able to obtain one, regardless of their race or socio-economic status. There is nothing demonstrable in the differences of skin color or economic condition which suggests that a substantially smaller proportion of the poor or the non-white fall into these categories than do the white and the non-poor, or that the poor and non-white have a substantially different moral attitude on abortion.

On the contrary, a recent study of births occurring between 1960 and 1965 led investigators to conclude that one-third of Negro (as contrasted with one-fifth of white) births were unwanted. "This high level of unwanted births among Negroes indicates the magnitude of the burden of unwanted dependents that is borne by this population. . . ." Bumpass and Westoff, "The Perfect 'Contraceptive' Population," 169 Science, 1177, 1179 (1970). Unwanted births were in general more than twice as high for families with incomes of less than $3000 as for those with incomes of over $10,000; this differential was "particularly marked among Negroes." Id. The results indicated, in the view of the investigators, that there is a "coincidence of poverty and unwanted births rather than a propensity of the 'poor' to have unwanted children." Id.

One explanation for this high level of unwanted births among the poor and the non-white is surely the fact that they do not have equal access to abortions. Data demonstrate that the poor and the non-white do not receive this medical treatment on the same terms as do others. They thus suffer a particularly harsh and adverse effect from the operation of this statute, as they do from that of the other restrictive abortion laws which have existed and currently exist in the United States. Dr. Alan F. Guttmacher has summed up the evidence:

> Both in regard to incidence and indications between patients on private and clinic services in voluntary and municipal hospitals . . . it has long been apparent . . . that municipal hospitals follow the letter of the law of the abortion statute much more exactly than voluntary hospitals, and also that private patients are generally treated by a more lenient interpretation of the law than service patients. Guttmacher, "Abortion—Yesterday, Today and Tomorrow," in Guttmacher (ed.), The Case for Legalized Abortion Now (1967).

The additional burdens placed upon indigent women by public hospitals before these women can obtain abortions (obtainable with far greater ease elsewhere by those who can pay) have been discussed by the two federal courts which examined the procedures at the District of Columbia General Hospital, Doe v. Gen. Hosp., 313 F. Supp. 1170 (D.D.C. 1970), 434 F. 2d 423 and 434 F. 2d 427 (D.C. Cir. 1970). Because the poor rely primarily upon public hospitals for their medical services, denials or delays at those institutions are tantamount to a denial of prompt medical care solely because these women are without funds. "[T]he mere state of being without funds is a neutral fact—constitutionally an irrelevance, like race, creed, or color." Edwards v. California, 314 U.S. 160, 184 (Jackson, J., concurring). Yet that state has led to very different medical treatment where restrictive abortion laws exist.

Dr. Robert E. Hall has collected and reported data supporting this conclusion. In New York City, between 1960 and 1962, Dr. Hall found that:

BLEED THROUGH

> . . . the ratio of therapeutic abortions to live births in the proprietary hospitals was 1:250; on the private services of the voluntary hospitals, 1:400; on the ward services of the same voluntary hospitals, 1:1,400; and in the municipal hospitals, 1:10,000. The same inequity pertains to ethnic origin. The rate of therapeutic abortions per live births among white women in New York is 1 per 380, among nonwhites 1 per 2,000, and among Puerto Ricans 1 per 10,000. Hall, "Abortion in American Hospitals," 57 Am. J. Pub. Health 1933, 1934 (1967).

In a survey of 65 randomly selected major American hospitals, Dr. Hall similarly discovered that the rate of therapeutic abortions was 3.6 times higher on the private services of these hospitals than on their ward services. Hall, "Therapeutic Abortion, Sterilization and Contraception," 91 Am. J. Obst. & Gynec. 518, 519 (1965).

Kenneth R. Niswander has substantiated similar data from a study of Buffalo, New York, hospitals. Niswander, "Medical Abortion Practices in the United States," in Smith (ed.), Abortion and the Law 53 (1967).

Furthermore, he has written:

> Hospitals vary greatly in their abortion practices. At the Los Angeles County Hospital, which treats only clinic patients . . . from 1946 to 1951 there was an incidence of one therapeutic abortion per two thousand eight hundred sixty-four (2,864) deliveries. At the opposite extreme, one finds reputable hospitals permitting abortion for one out of every 35-40 deliveries. The variation in the hospitals surveyed by [Robert E.] Hall extended from no abortions in 24,417 deliveries to one in 36 deliveries. It seems inconceivable that medical opinion could vary so widely. Socioeconomic factors must be playing a major role in the decision to abort in certain institutions. Id. at 54-55 (emphasis added).

Data collected from New York City by other investigators for the period 1951-1962 revealed that:

> Therapeutic abortion occur[red] most frequently among the white population by a considerable margin. The white ratio [was] more than five times that among the nonwhites and 26 times that among the Puerto Ricans. (Well over 90 per cent of all therapeutic abortions in New York City [were] performed on white women.) Gold, et al., "Therapeutic Abortions in New York City: A 20-Year Review," 55 Am. J. Pub. Health 964, 966 (1965) (emphasis added).

A nationwide survey of all short-term general hospitals participating in the Professional Activities Survey from 1963 to 1965 led to this conclusion:

> . . . [T]he incidence of therapeutic abortion was almost twice as high among white women as among the nonwhite group. . . . Tietze, "Therapeutic Abortions in the United States," 101 Am. J. Obst. & Gynec. 784, 786 (1968).

Similar statistics and conclusions appear throughout the literature in this area:

> Perhaps the greatest injustice resulting from our present policies is the creation of a double standard for private and indigent patients. . . . Almost universally greater consideration is extended to the private patient for a multitude of reasons which, not infrequently, include a recognition of their social and economic prestige. Mandy, "Reflections of a Gynecologist," in Rosen (ed.), Abortion in America 288-89 (1967).

The rich and the poor, it should be noted, are not treated alike: many ethical physicians, for instance, are much more lenient in their application of indications for therapeutic abortion to private patients than to indigent patients on municipal hospital services. It is the 'private practice' patient, therefore, who can more readily obtain a therapeutic abortion. Kleegman, "Planned Parenthood: Its Influence on Public Health and Family Welfare," in Rosen (ed.), Abortion in America 254, 256 (1967).

A partial explanation for the marked disparity in these figures appears to lie in the far lower incidence of abortions performed for psychiatric reasons among poor and non-white women. In an era when non-psychiatric medical reasons for abortions have steadily decreased (Guttmacher, "The Shrinking Non-Psychiatric Indications for Therapeutic Abortion" in Rosen (ed.), Therapeutic Abortion 12 (1954)), a steadily increasing number of abortions have been performed for psychiatric reasons. Poor and non-white women have not been the recipients of this treatment, however, to the same extent as their white and wealthier sisters. As Hall wrote in 1965, the discrepancy documented above

> . . . may be attributed to the higher incidence of abortions for psychiatric indications among pri> vate patients. Whereas at Sloane Hospital [for Women, in New York City] one therapeutic abortion was performed for psychiatric reasons per 1,149 deliveries on the ward service, the comparable ratio for the private service was one per 104. . . . It would appear therefore that private patients with unwanted pregnancies are more often referred for primary psychiatric evaluation and/or that psychiatric justification for abortion is more easily obtained for private patients. Hall, "Therapeutic Abortion, Sterilization and Contraception," 91 Am. J. Obst. & Gynec. 518, 519, 522 (1965).

Dr. Hall's survey of 65 major hospitals confirms the same wide discrepancy in granting psychiatrically-related abortions. (Hall, op. cit. at 518.)

Why has this phenomenon occurred? Perhaps because

> ". . . by the very nature of things, ward patients are less likely to have the necessary consultations requested, including the psychiatric, and to have the necessary recommendations made and accepted by a hospital board, than are their well-to-do sisters. Ethical and conscientious physicians decry this fact, but nevertheless find it impossible to controvert. . . . Rosen, "A Case Study in Social Hyprocrisy," in Rosen (ed.), Abortion in America 299, 306-07 (1967).

"Reform" legislation such as that in issue here is far from a complete answer to this problem. As one writer has noted:

> . . . [I]t must be recognized that moderate reform is essentially middle-class reform. It benefits those who are sufficiently well-educated, well-connected and well-financed to take advantage of the liberalized law. Where will the ghetto dweller find a psychiatrist to testify that she runs a grave risk of emotional impairment if she is forced to give birth to her *n*th baby? Packer, The Limits of the Criminal Sanction 344 (1968).

BLEED THROUGH

The Georgia statute's onerous requirements of consultation and review, moreover, limit access to legal abortion to those who can afford all the unnecessary services mandated by the statute. See §§26-1202(b)-(3), (4), (5) and (6), 26-1202(c), Ga. Code Ann. These provisions require a woman to retain a physician to approve her request, retain two other physicians to review and concur in that approval, have access to a licensed and accredited hospital and a committee therein to further approve the application, and possibly be prepared to defend her request in a court action brought by relatives of the fetus to the second degree (which may include persons who are total strangers to her). Only the latter provision was struck down by the court below. See Appellant's Jurisdictional Statement herein, App. F., pp. 2f, 3f, 4f.

B. As a Result of the Disproportionate Unavailability of Hospital Abortions to Them, the Poor and the Non-White Resort to Unsafe Criminal Abortions Which Lead to High Mortality and Morbidity Rates.

While socioeconomic conditions never per se legally warrant therapeutic abortion, socioeconomic status nevertheless frequently determines whether or not an abortion will be performed, and if performed, whether that self-same abortion will be therapeutic or criminal. Rosen, "Psychiatric Implications of Abortion: A Case Study in Social Hypocrisy," 17 W. Res. L. Rev. 435, 450 (1965).

Criminal abortion has been described as the greatest single cause of maternal mortality in the United States; it is one of the greatest causes of disease, infection, and resulting sterilization as well. See Leavy & Kummer, "Criminal Abortion: Human Hardship and Unyielding Laws", 35 So. Cal. L. Rev., 123 (1962); see also People v. Belous, supra at 965-966. The poor and the non-white suffer disproportionately from the "back-alley" abortionists, whose services they seek out in lieu of the medically safe hospital abortions generally denied them.

California, the only state known to officially compile such figures, in its most recent published report notes that approximately 7 percent of that state's non-white female population subjected themselves to criminal abortion in 1968, as opposed to only 1½ percent of the state's white female population. (California Dept of Public Health, Third Annual Report on the Implementation of the California Therapeutic Abortion Act, Tab. 4 (1970).

The often tragic results of these abortions are also documented. In their New York study, Drs. Gold, et al., op. cit. at 970-71, noted that the ratio of criminal abortion deaths per 1,000 live births was 4.0 for white women and 16.2 for non-whites. Likewise, Dr. Hall's 1960-62 study led him to conclude that approximately half of the puerperal deaths among New York's Negroes were due to criminal abortions as opposed to only a quarter of the puerperal deaths among white women. Hall, op. cit., 57 Am. J. Pub. Health at 1934.

BLEED THROUGH

In Georgia itself, non-hospital abortions caused the deaths of 205 residents between 1950 and 1969. Of these 205 non-hospital abortion deaths, 143 (70%) were of black women. Of the 25 Georgia women who died as a consequence of legal abortions between 1965 and 1969, 22 (88%) were black. While the abortion mortality rate for white Georgia women fell 80% from 1950-54 to 1965-69 (partially reflecting adopting of the instant, "reform" law in 1968), abortion mortality among black Georgia women declined by only 33% between the same two five-year periods. "Non-hospital abortion mortality in Georgia is primarily a black health problem." U.S. Dep't of HEW, Public Health Service, Center for Disease Control, Abortion Surveillance Report 10 (1970), citing Rochat, et al., Division of Maternal Health, Georgia Dep't of Public Health, "An Epidemiological Analysis of Abortion in Georgia" (1970).

C. Where Abortion Restrictions Have Been Eliminated, the Poor and the Non-White in Fact Receive Abortion Services in a Non-Discriminatory Manner.

In sharp contrast to the above data has been the experience in New York State since July 1, 1970, when categorical restrictions on abortion were eliminated. See N.Y. Pen. Law §125.05 (McKinney Supp. 1970). On April 5, 1971, New York City health officials reported that the city's public hospitals, which restricted abortions to city residents, were performing an average of 511 a week, and the "vast majority" of those women would be unable to afford abortions in private hospitals. N.Y. Times, Apr. 6, 1971, at 25.

A later report, issued on June 29, 1971, was even more revealing:

> In the first six weeks, non-whites and Puerto Ricans, who had little access to legal abortions prior to the law, received half the abortions done on women in [New York City]. In the first nine months, 31% of the city's abortions done on state residents were reimbursable under Medicaid. American Medical News, July 12, 1971, at 9.

It is clear from this evidence that where the law has eliminated restrictions on the obtaining of abortions, the poor and non-white women who were previously unble to exercise the financial and other kinds of leverage required to have a "therapeutic" abortion, are able to obtain medically safe abortions on an equal basis with all other women, and they do obtain them to at least the same extent as their more privileged sisters. One result has been a drop in the maternal mortality rate: New York City hospitals now report treating far fewer victims of "botched" illegal abortions than they did in years past. "The maternal mortality rate—to which criminal abortions have always contributed a major portion—is now at a record low of 2.3 per each 10,000 live births, compared with 5.2 . . . at this time last year." Id.

D. The Impact of the Restrictive Abortion Law Effectively Denies Equal Protection to the Poor and Non-White.

It has been amply demonstrated above that poor and non-white women are not treated equally with other women in obtaining lawful abortions. However neutral its facial appearance, and however unexceptionable its underlying intent, the practical effect of a statute in denying equal treatment to classes of persons, such as the poor or the non-white, must be measured by the Court.

> Though the law itself be fair on its face and impartial in appearance, yet, if it is applied and administered by public authority with an evil eye and an unequal hand, so as practically to make unjust and illegal discriminations between persons in similar circumstances, material to their rights, the denial of equal justice is still within the prohibition of the constitution. Yick Wo v. Hopkins, 118 U.S. 356, 373-74.

The standard articulated in Yick Wo has been consistently applied by this Court. Moreover, it has been applied to statutes which have a natural discriminatory effect, whether or not there is evidence of any "evil" public administration.

Where the class affected is the poor, see Griffin v. Illinois, 351 U.S. 12 (state's provision of criminal appeal, but not of free transcript held to be an effective denial of equal protection to poor defendants); Harper v. Virginia Bd. of Elections, 383 U.S. 663 (state's exaction of a poll tax from all voters held to be an effective denial of equal protection to poor voters); Shapiro v. Thompson, 394 U.S. 618 (state's refusal to make welfare payments to residents of less than one year held to be an effective denial of equal protection to poor recent residents and to the foreign poor who wish to travel to the state); Douglas v. California, 372

U.S. 353 (state's provision of criminal appeal, but where appellate court decides in advance of hearing whether appointment of counsel for indigent would be "helpful", held to be an effective denial of equal protection to poor defendants). See also Williams v. Oklahoma City, 395 U.S. 458; Gardner v. California, 393 U.S. 367; Long v. District Court of Iowa, 385 U.S. 192; Rinaldi v. Yeager, 384 U.S. 305; Hobson v. Hansen, 269 F. Supp. 401 (D.D.C. 1967), aff'd sub nom. Smuck v. Hobson, 408 F. 2d 175 (D.C. Cir. 1969).

Where the class affected is non-white, see Gomillion v. Lightfoot, 364 U.S. 339 (state's drawing of voting district lines which effectively excluded Negroes from a city district held to be an effective denial of equal protection to Negroes); Patton v. Mississippi, 332 U.S. 463, and Smith v. Texas, 311 U.S. 128 (state's facially neutral system of jury selection was administered to largely exclude Negroes held to be an effective denial of equal protection to Negroes).

The impact of the cases cited immediately above is that, while the state may not be bound to confer the benefit at issue (here, the categorical exceptions to its basic anti-abortion statute), if it chooses to do so it is obliged not to effectively preclude enjoyment of the benefit to classes like the poor and non-white. Thus, in Griffin v. Illinois, supra, the state was not obliged by due process to provide appeals from criminal convictions, but since it had chosen to do so, it could not provide them in a manner that effectively denied poor persons access to the appeal process.

BLEED THROUG

> The effect of the [Griffin] decision is to require Illinois to take account of economic inequities not of its own creation. Note, "Developments in the Law—Equal Protection," supra, 82 Harv. L. Rev. at 1178.

If the State of Georgia had chosen not to regulate the medical practice of abortion, the prevailing standards of medical practice in the United States today would sanction its performance without categorical restrictions. See AMA, Policy Regarding Abortion (Resolution of AMA House of Delegates, June 25, 1970) discussed in "AMA Eases Abortion Rules," N.Y. Times, June 26, 1970, at 1; American College of Obstetrics & Gynecology, Policy on Abortion, discussed in Medical Tribune, Oct. 12, 1970, at 1. It is true that the poor and non-white would still be limited in obtaining treatment by the natural factors of inability to pay, not having a family physician, and the limited number of free or subsidized-care facilities in their communities. Nevertheless, it is clear that the state's entry into the field has aggravated the natural limitations of the poor and the non-white by imposing artificial limitations, as well as onerous and costly procedural requirements. The state has elected, first, to penalize the provision of abortion services by everyone, including physicians. It has then permitted physicians to provide this treatment for certain statutory categories of qualified women. At the same time, the state has prescribed necessary steps to secure qualification which are so burdensome as to make it extremely difficult for the poor and non-white to qualify. This results in an effective denial of equal protection to the poor and non-white.

We have contended (Part I, supra) that abortion to a woman is a fundamental interest, and it is being restricted by the state without a compelling state interest. The discrimination in the application and effect of the statute likewise lacks a compelling state interest, or even any rational connection to a legitimate state purpose.

In sanctioning the vastly disproprotionate exclusion of the poor and non-white from abortion services, the state cannot assert that its purpose is to cut down the number of abortions. Where abortion is otherwise lawful, and the poor or non-white woman legally qualifies, the state has no interest in eliminating that which it does not prohibit. The impact on the poor and non-white cannot be justified in terms of state budget-saving, since restrictive abortion laws do not bear any rational relation to the allocation of state resources, and they are clearly not a mere economic regulation. See Dandridge v. Williams, 397 U.S. 471. Even were budget-saving asserted, in that medical care for the poor and non-white is often subsidized by public funds (e.g., the Medicaid program, 42 U.S.C. 1396 et seq.), it cannot be accomplished by arbitrarily selecting classes to suffer the deprivation. Shapiro v. Thompson, 394 U.S. 618.

BLEED THROU

III.

WHERE THE STATE HAS PERMITTED ABORTIONS TO TAKE PLACE IN CERTAIN HOSPITALS UNDER CERTAIN CONDITIONS, BUT HAS DELEGATED UNREVIEWABLE AUTHORITY WITHOUT STANDARDS TO A PRIVATE BODY TO DECIDE IN WHICH HOSPITALS ABORTIONS MAY TAKE PLACE, AND HAS DELEGATED UNREVIEWABLE AUTHORITY TO PHYSICIANS AND COMMITTEES OF PHYSICIANS TO DECIDE UNDER WHICH CONDITIONS ABORTIONS MAY TAKE PLACE, AND SAID PHYSICIANS HAVE COMPELLING REASONS TO SKEW THEIR DECISIONS AGAINST GRANTING ABORTIONS, AND WHERE SUCH DELEGATIONS OF AUTHORITY ARE LIKELY TO RESULT AND IN FACT RESULT IN DISCRIMINATION IN OBTAINING ABORTION AGAINST THE POOR AND NON-WHITE, THE STATE HAS DENIED TO THE POOR AND NON-WHITE THE EQUAL PROTECTION OF THE LAWS.

Two other aspects of the Georgia abortion law result in an effective denial of equal protection to the poor and the non-white. One is the requirement that abortions, to be lawful, must be performed in a hospital accredited by the Joint Commission on Accreditation of Hospitals. The second is the provision that other physicians must approve the procedure.

A. Restricting Lawful Abortions to Accredited Hospitals Results in Discrimination Against the Poor and Non-White.

§26-1202(b)(4), Ga. Code Ann., provides that abortions can only be performed in state-licensed hospitals which are also accredited by the Joint Commission on Accreditation of Hospitals (JCAH). Eighty-three of 214 state-licensed hospitals in Georgia are so accredited, leaving 103 Georgia counties without an accredited hospital. See Appellant's Jurisdictional Statement herein, p. 18, App. G.

The JCAH is a private, voluntary national accrediting body located in Chicago, Illinois. It surveys and accredits only those hospitals which request this sevice. See Silver & Worthington, "Regulation of Quality of Care in Hospitals," 35 Law & Contemp. Problems, 305, 310-11 (1970).

The state has delegated to this private body the authority to choose which Georgia hospitals may lawfully perform abortions. It is instructive to compare this delegation of authority with the three broad areas of delegation which have traditionally been upheld as constitutionally valid. See McGautha v. California, ... U.S. ...., 91 S. Ct. 1454, 1499-1504 (1971) (Brennan, J., dissenting).

First, the Georgia legislature has not delegated this power to select which of its hospitals may perform abortions under reasonably fixed statutory standards. McGautha v. California, supra, 91 S. Ct. at 1502, citing Communist Party of U.S. v. SACB, 367 U.S. 1; U.S. v. Rock-Royal Co-Op., 307 U.S. 533. The legislature has provided no standards at all, and indeed the JCAH would not be bound to accredit by state-fixed standards. Nor has the state impliedly incorporated by reference the fixed and existing standards of an expert body. See, e.g., Schecter Poultry Corp. v. U.S., 295 U.S. 495; Carter v. Carter Coal Co., 298 U.S. 238. The JCAH standards are subject to change, and have in fact been changed since the adoption of §26-1202 (b)(4), Ga. Code Ann. See JCAH, Accreditation Manual for Hospitals 1970 (1971), setting forth new accreditation standards which went into effect July 1, 1971.

Second, the Georgia legislature has not delegated a rule-making power to technical experts, under generally declared policy goals, by which the rule-making process itself serves to illuminate the policy decisions being made and allows for meaningful legislative supervision or review. McGautha v. California, supra, 91 S. Ct. at 1502-03, citing, e.g., U.S. v. Grimaud, 220 U.S. 504 (Dept. of Agriculture's rule-making power to "improve and protect" the national forests); Red Lion Broadcasting Co. v. FCC, 399 U.S. 367 (the "fairness" doctrine). Again, of course, the JCAH would not be bound by state-fixed policy goals even if they were declared in the statute, which they are not. If § 26-1202(b)(4), Ga. Code Ann., may be read to support an inference that the state is concerned about the quality or integrity of the facility performing abortions, this concern would seem to be satisfied by the requirement of state licensing. The legislature obviously has the power of supervision and review of its state licensing standards, which is a critical reservation of legislative power in a valid delegation of authority. 91 S. Ct. at 1503. The state has no such power of review over the rule-making functions of JCAH, and indeed the rule-making functions of JCAH are in no wise guided by any express or inferable purpose in the Georgia law.

Even assuming an inferable and legitimate state purpose in the quality and integrity of facilities performing abortions which, arguendo, might not be satisfied by state licensing requirements, the delegation of this authority to JCAH would seem facially to be an irrational classification. The JCAH Accreditation Manual for Hospitals, supra, contains no special provisions for abortion services, nor does it even mention the word. To the extent that the quality and integrity of the facility are concerned, the JCAH accreditation requirement would also seem to be an irrational classification for the performance of abortions because there is no articulated nor understandable reason why abortion requires a different quality or integrity of hospital organization than more difficult and dangerous forms of medical treatment, such as neurosurgery, open heart surgery or organ transplants. For all such medical services, the people of Georgia may choose to enter a state-licensed or a licensed and accredited hospital. For abortion alone, the women of Georgia are not allowed to enter a state-licensed hospital unless it is also accredited.

Third, the rule-making or adjudicative functions here delegated by the Georgia legislature to JCAH (i.e., to adopt standards for and to decide which hospitals qualify to perform abortions) are not premised "upon an explanation of both the findings and reasons for a given decision", establishing a body of precedent from which general principles may be deduced. 91 S. Ct. 1503-04, again citing Red Lion Broadcasting Co. v. FCC, supra. In fact, the "findings and reasons" for JCAH accreditation decisions are treated by JCAH as confidential, and are not even shown to the Secretary of Health, Education and Welfare for Medicare certification purposes, much less to the Georgia legislature. See Silver & Worthington, op. cit., supra at 325.

For the foregoing reasons, amici contend that the Georgia legislature, in §26-1202(b)(4), Ga. Code

Ann., has delegated its authority to select which hospitals may perform legal abortions in Georgia in a manner violative of the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment. McGautha v. California, supra, 91 S. Ct. at 1500, n. 22; Yick Wo v. Hopkins, 118 U.S. 356.

The impact of this invalid delegation of authority is to create a classification of hospitals which serves no legitimate state purpose, and which has the practical effect of denying abortion services to a significant number of poor persons in Georgia, denying to the poor the equal protection of the laws under the Fourteenth Amendment.

We have already discussed the lack of a rational connection between any legitimate state purpose concerned with the quality and integrity of a hospital facility in the performance of abortion and the JCAH accreditation requirement. Granting the legitimacy of such a state concern, it cannot be accomplished through an unconstitutional and arbitrary means (the unreviewable delegation to JCAH), particularly when it might be accomplished properly, as through state licensing with articulated or legislatively reviewable standards. Yick Wo v. Hopkins, supra; McGautha v. California, supra (Brennan, J., dissenting); See also NAACP v. Alabama, 377 U.S. 288; Thornhill v. Alabama, 310 U.S. 88.

There would seem to be no legitimate state purpose served in cutting down the number of abortions by limiting the hospitals in which they can be performed (83 of 214 licensed hospitals, supra), in that the concern here is with abortions which are otherwise legal under state law. There is obviously no legitimate purpose served in prohibiting that which is lawful.

There are no state economic, or budget-saving purposes served in the accreditation requirement per se, and there is no demonstrable connection between this classification and a rational allocation of state resources. See Dandridge v. Williams, 397 U.S. 471.

On the other hand, the practical discriminatory effect of this irrational classification on the poor is clear. A poor woman who resides in one of 103 Georgia counties without a JCAH accredited hospital, but which may have a ready, willing and able state-licensed hospital, and who qualifies for an abortion according to law, bears a double burden. She must not only obtain the funds necessary to travel to another county, she must also find another accredited hospital, able and willing to perform the service free or through a publicly-subsidized program.

Even though the accreditation statute has no facial discriminatory intent as to the poor, its practical effect must be measured. Yick Wo v. Hopkins, supra. Proper and lawful medical care must be viewed as fundamental to the right to life. Where access to proper and lawful medical care is conditioned by the state by creation of a classification, serving no legitimate or rational state purpose, which has the effect of denying that care to a particular group such as the poor, the effect of that classification is to deny equal protection of the laws to the poor. See Shapiro v. Thompson, 394 U.S. 618; Harper v. Virginia Bd. of Elections, 383 U.S. 663; Griffin v. Illinois, 351 U.S. 12.

B. Delegation of Authority to Physicians and Their Committees to Approve Abortions at Their Peril Results in Discrimination Against the Poor and the Non-White.

The Georgia legislature has created certain protected classes of women who may receive legal abortion: those who would suffer life or permanent health threatening consequences, those who are likely to bear defective children, or those who have been the victims of sexual assault. §26-1202(a), Ga. Code Ann. The court below struck down the specification of these classes but retained the general classification of women for whom abortion is deemed "necessary". See Appellant's Jurisdictional Statement herein, App. F, p. 1-f.

The legislature has then delegated its authority to determine who falls into these classes, and under what circumstances, to physicians and hospital committees made up of physicians. Two physicians other than the woman's own must concur in the finding, and this concurrence must in turn be approved by a committee of at least three additional physicians in the accredited hospital which is to perform the abortion. §26-1202(b)(3) and (5). This statutory procedure was not invalidated by the court below.

Abortion is otherwise criminal in Georgia, punishable by a one to ten year prison term. §§26-1201, 26-1203, Ga. Code Ann.

Abortions performed outside of the Georgia abortion law (§26-1201 et seq.) or performed in error under the statute are criminal abortions. Physicians may clearly be prosecuted even though excepted under the statute, since a prosecutor and jury may not agree with the physician as to the "necessity" of the abortion or the presence of the life or health-threatening conditions or other circumstances specified in the law. The burden of going forward with the evidence to prove non-necessity may be on the prosecution, but the decisions of physicians are not immune from prosecution. See U.S. v. Vuitch, .... U.S. ...., 91 S. Ct. 1294, 1298; but cf. U.S. v. Vuitch, 91 S. Ct. 1294, 1311-12 (Stewart, J., dissenting in part).

The Georgia legislature has assigned to these physicians the task of determining whether a woman falls into one of the specified categories at their peril. The court below did not eliminate the peril, but merely limited the category for decision to the word "necessary." In either case, a prosecutor may choose to disagree with the determination in favor of the woman, and a "second-guessing lay jury" may choose to convict. See U.S. v. Vuitch, supra, 91 S. Ct. at 1312 (Stewart, J., dissenting in part).

It must be noted here that so long as this second-guessing of medical judgment is permitted, the mere existence of a moral temper adverse to abortion in the prosecutor's office or in the community may have a heavy influence on the making of that judgment. The majority in Vuitch suggest that this "danger exists in all criminal cases, not merely those involving abortions." U.S. v. Vuitch, supra, 91 S. Ct. at 1299, n. 7. This is not so. In virtually all criminal cases the factual issue for the jury to decide is whether or not the defendant committed the criminal act charged, the act and the crime being one and the same. In abortion cases, commission of the act of abortion by the physician, or its abetment by the committee, may be conceded. The criminality of the act under the statute is, in every case, a matter of qualitative judgment. This is not to say that voir dire of jurors and the watchfulness of judges does not help blunt the danger (U.S. v. Vuitch, id.) but it does point up the danger to physicians in a hostile environment when it is not their commission or abetment of the act which may be criminal, but the quality of their expert judgment. This "danger" does not exist in all criminal cases. Mr. Justice Clark has added:

> . . . [D]octors face an uncertain fate when performing an abortion. This uncertainty will continue unless the legislatures or courts provide relief from liability. Clark, "Religion, Morality and Abortion: A Constitutional Appraisal", 2 Loy. U. (L.A.) L. Rev. 1, 7 (1969).

On the other hand, no prosecution or penalty exists for physicians who decide that the woman is not qualified for an abortion. In considering the slanted consequences of this kind of legislative delegation, the California Supreme Court, in that state's landmark abortion case, said:

> The inevitable effect of such delegation may be to deprive a woman of an abortion when under any definition [of the statutory categories] she would be entitled to such an operation, because the state, in delegating the power to decide when an abortion is necessary, has skewed the penalties in one direction: no criminal penalties are imposed where the doctor refuses to perform a necessary operation, even if the woman should in fact > die. . . . The pressures on a physician to decide not to perform an absolutely necessary abortion are . . . enormous. . . . People v. Belous, supra at 973.

Amici do not suggest that every physician faced with the possibility of prosecution, and with having his own medical judgment subjected to lay public review, cannot nevertheless render a fair decision on the merits of an application for abortion. But the risk to be run that the average physician will not be able "to hold the balance nice, clear and true" is substantial, and its impact on Due Process plain. Tumey v. Ohio, 273 U.S. 510, 532. This kind of risk of a skewed decision by a personally interested decision-maker has regularly been held to be an invalid delegation of authority. See In re v. Murchison, 349 U.S. 133; Mayberry v. Pennsylvania, 400 U.S. 455; Jackson v. Denno, 378 U.S. 368; Tumey v. Ohio, supra.

Furthermore, the decision-making process under this delegation of authority has all the aspects of a star chamber proceeding. Time is obviously of the essence in considering an application for abortion, and there is no appeal from an abortion committee's decision. The decision is made in private, with no provision for personal appearance by the applicant. And in this situation, the question to be decided may be one of life or death, the most fundamental of all human rights.

Where a poor, non-white woman is in need of abortion, the delegation of this authority results in a denial of equal protection, because the poor woman is restricted by her economic circumstances to seeking abortion in an accredited hospital willing or otherwise obliged to treat indigents. Nothing in the law or in common medical practice prevents the affluent woman from consulting with any physician and going to any accredited hospital most likely to provide the desired treatment. The denial of abortion to a poor woman under these circumstances has the effect of a decision res judicata. The more affluent woman may shop among hospitals and doctors until she finds those who will favor her application, even if it has been rejected elsewhere.

> The most disastrous result of the abortion committee system has been the economic and social discrimination against one group—the ward patients. In large cities the poor . . . are virtually denied the same medical care as the privileged few. Lader, Abortion 29-30 (1966).

The abortion practices of hospitals treating the poor, as compared with the same practices respecting the affluent (Part II, supra), reflect the discriminatory result of this delegation of authority. Thus, in effect, a denial of equal protection results when a statute conferring a right to an abortion upon certain kinds of women operates to confer decision-making authority as to the affluent upon numerous abortion-providers, but in effect results in limiting decision-making authority as to the poor to one (or none) or a very few lawful abortion providers with substantial and compelling interests impairing their ability to decide impartially whether a woman is entitled to an abortion.

IV.

GEORGIA'S STATUTORY OPTION FOR HOSPITALS TO REJECT ABORTION PATIENTS, TO THE EXTENT IT IS EXERCISED BY PUBLIC OR PUBLICLY-SUBSIDIZED HOSPITALS, SANCTIONS A DENIAL OF EQUAL PROTECTION TO THE CLASS OF PATIENTS REQUIRING ABORTION, HAVING A PARTICULARLY SEVERE IMPACT ON THE POOR AND NON-WHITE.

§26-1202(e), Ga. Code Ann., permits hospitals to elect to refuse patients seeking abortion services.

Appellants and amici have no quarrel with the notion that individual physicians with religious or moral objections may choose not to perform abortions. See Appellant's Jurisdictional Statement herein, p. 22. Hospitals, however, are fictitious entities, without religious or moral scruples per se. Indeed, the statute does not suggest religious or moral reasons as the standard for hospitals in exercising this option; the statute permits its exercise at whim.

Hospitals which are publicly owned or operated, which are recipients of Hill-Burton federal construction subsidies (42 U.S.C. 291 et seq.), or which participate in the federal Medicaid program and receive federal Medicaid funds (42 U.S.C. 1396 et seq.) have sufficient public nexus to be engaged in state action, prohibiting them from denying equal protection of the law to irrationally selected classes of persons. When these particular kinds of hospitals choose to deny services to a class of patients, the impact on the poor is clear, since publicly owned hospitals largely serve the poor, Hill-Burton hospitals have a statutory obligation to provide service to the poor (42 U.S.C. 291c(e)) and Medicaid funds are devoted exclusively to welfare recipients or the medically indigent related to welfare categories (42 U.S.C. 1396).

Hospitals which have received Hill-Burton subsidies have been held to be bound by constitutional equal protection requirements. The same public nexus analysis would seem to apply to publicly owned hospitals and those receiving federal Medicaid funds. See Simkins v. Moses H. Cone Memorial Hosp., 323 F. 2d 959 (4th Cir. 1963), cert. denied, 376 U.S. 938; Sams v. Ohio Valley Gen'l Hosp. Assn., 413 F. 2d 826 (4th Cir. 1969).[1]

Simkins involved refusing admission of black doctors and their patients to Hill-Burton funded private hospitals. It was held that this amounted to state action in violation of the equal protection clause. The finding was perhaps made easier because the inherently suspect classification of race was present. In Sams, however, there was no inherently suspect class, but merely a refusal by the Hill-Burton funded private hospital to grant staff privileges to doctors whose offices were located outside the county. Relying solely on the test of a rational basis for the classification (see e.g., Dandridge v. Williams, supra) the court could find none. The court gave particular weight to the consequences of the policy for a patient living in the county being denied hospital service because his physician's office was across the county line. 413 F. 2d at 829.

The impact of the state-sanctioned policy under consideration here, to turn away the class of patients who require abortion service, is similar. Where those patients are poor, it will have the tragic consequence of denying them any treatment at all. Where a public, a Medicaid or a Hill-Burton hospital, which otherwise cares for the poor and is capable of rendering abortion services (e.g., by having an obstetrical staff, etc.), and which is the only conveniently located licensed and accredited hospital for an indigent who legally qualifies for an abortion, and who has a ready, willing and able staff physician to perform it, chooses to reject all abortion patients as a class, then that indigent abortion patient is denied equal protection of the law.

[1]There are more than 190 Hill-Burton funded hospitals in Georgia, which is about 75% of all its licensed hospitals. See U.S. Dep't of HEW, Hill-Burton Project Register 80-92 (1969).

There is no legitimate state purpose served in sanctioning an elimination of abortion services in such a hospital. One state purpose might be to cut down the number of abortions. But where state law permits abortion, and where the patient is eligible for the service under state law, there would seem to be no legitimate state purpose served in denying her the treatment.

Another such purpose might be to save state funds, to the extent they are involved in supporting a public hospital, or in the state matching funds under Medicaid (42 U.S.C. 1396a(a)(2)). But state budget-saving is not a legitimate state purpose when the class to suffer the deprivation of the state funds is arbitrarily and unreasonably selected. See Shapiro v. Thompson, supra.

Another such purpose might be religious or moral objection to abortion. But no such standard is articulated in the statute, perhaps in recognition of the fact that hospitals cannot, as ficitious entities, have religious or moral scruples. Without such an articulated standard, however, the statute clearly permits public, Hill-Burton and Medicaid hospitals to exclude abortion patients for any reason at all, which would seem clearly offensive to the constitutional responsibilities of those hospitals. Thus, abortion patients might be excluded from an otherwise nonsectarian public or publicly-subsidized hospital solely because of the religious objections of the current administrator, or medical director, or the currently sitting majority of the board of directors.

The state may assert that it has not dictated the elimination of abortion services, but has only permitted hospitals to choose not to render them. The issue here is not what the rights of the parties might be were the state law silent on this subject, and an individual hospital decided to discriminate against abortion patients. The issue here takes for granted the legality of abortion in Georgia, at least under specified circumstances, and the state's permission under express color of law for hospitals to turn away this class of patients. The state should not be allowed to expressly permit by law an arbitrary discrimination against a class, without a legitimate state purpose, where it could not compel the same. See Griffin v. County School Board of Prince Edward County, 377 U.S. 218 (state law permitted, by local option, the closing of schools, where purpose was to discriminate against the class of Negro students); Reitman v. Mulkey, 387 U.S. 369 (state law permitted the conveying of property to anyone the conveyor might choose, where the purpose was to authorize discrimination in housing).

It may be contended that this statutory provision of "choice" to exclude abortion patients and thus to effectively deny treatment to the poor and non-white is more closely analogous to the situation in James v. Valtierra, ... U.S. ....., 91 S. Ct. 1331, where mandatory referenda for low-cost housing projects were upheld against a claim that they permitted voters to discriminate against the poor. But the Court, in James, placed heavy reliance on the procedure there involved (a "democratic" election) and on the legitimate public purposes served thereby (giving the people a voice in approving huge expenditures of public funds and a consequent lowering of tax revenues, and a voice in general community planning). 91 S. Ct. at 1334. Here, as mentioned, the only procedure provided is the whim of the hospital, and there is no such legitimate state purpose served in excluding these patients.

V.

CONCLUSION.

The equal protection infirmity of a statute whose burden is felt more acutely by the poor has been noted in Mr. Justice White's concurring opinion in Griswold v. Connecticut, supra at 503:

> [T]he clear effect of these statutes as enforced is to deny disadvantaged citizens of Connecticut, those without either adequate knowledge or resources to obtain private counseling, access to medical assistance and up-to-date information in respect to proper methods of birth control. . . . In my view, a statute with these effects bears a substantial burden of justification when attacked under the Fourteenth Amendment. Yick Wo v. Hopkins, 118 U.S. 356; Skinner v. Oklahoma, 316 U.S. 535; Schware v. Board of Bar Examiners, 353 U.S. 232; McLaughlin v. Florida, 379 U.S. 184, 192.

Because this Georgia statute, like all restrictive abortion laws, has the clear effect of denying poor and nonwhite citizens of Georgia equal access to safe hospital abortions without any justification whatsoever, it violates the Equal Protection Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment.

MOTION FOR LEAVE TO FILE A BRIEF AS AMICUS CURIAE

Robert L. Sassone hereby respectfully moves for leave to file a brief amicus curiae in this case. The consent of the attorneys for the parties has been obtained.

The interest of Robert L. Sassone in this case arises from the fact that he is the President of LIFE (League for Infants, Fetuses, and the Elderly, an organization of over a thousand individuals, including many clergymen, doctors and attorneys). The members of LIFE fear that declaring abortion control laws unconstitutional may lead to lessened respect for the value of human life.

Certain of the individual members of LIFE have examined certain of the recent lower court decisions and briefs relating to the constitutionality of abortion control laws. These examinations have indicated that certain statistical, medical and sociological arguments by defendants have not been answered, or that the answers have omitted important data. In addition, arguments in favor of the right to live of the unborn have omitted important data. The rights of the unborn are relevant in determining the constitutionality of the abortion control law in question, because abortion involves a balancing of rights, not a mere consideration of only the rights of the mother.

The present brief sets forth data in short sections which may be read separately if the Court feels that the data in any of the individual sections is relevant and not adequately set forth elsewhere.

Respectfully submitted,

ROBERT E. DUNNE,

Attorney for Amicus Curiae.

BRIEF OF AMICUS CURIAE ROBERT L. SASSONE IN SUPPORT OF RESPONDENT

The Powers Of A Sovereign State Include The Power To Limit The Reasons For Abortion.

Nearly every nation at some time or other has forbidden or strictly limited the power of a woman to obtain an abortion. The Tenth Amendment states: "The powers not delegated to the United States by the Constitution, nor prohibited by it to the states, are reserved to the states respectively, or to the people." Accordingly, unless it is shown that the Constitution prohibits states from limiting the reasons for abortion, the states have that power. Those nations, such as England, which respect rights not enumerated in a formal constitution afford a precedent for the scope of protection which should be afforded women seeking an abortion because of a right to privacy guaranteed by the Ninth Amendment, since the Ninth Amendment reserves to the people those rights of the people not enumerated in the Constitution. A search of the laws of other nations has not indicated any other nation which has defined the inherent rights of the people to include a right to privacy in women sufficiently broad to prevent the state from regulating the reasons for obtaining an abortion.

In Areas Other Than Abortion The Right To Privacy Is A Relative Right, Not An Absolute Right.

Numerous examples in Tort and Criminal Law indicate that the right to privacy is a relative right.[1] A woman cannot in privacy, even though she harm no other person, legally utilize or even possess certain forbidden drugs such as LSD or heroin. The right to privacy was considered a mere relative right by the framers of the Constitution. Had they not considered the right to privacy a mere relative right, they would not have carefully defined additional protection for the small portion of the right to privacy protected by the guarantee against unreasonable search and seizure.

The Right To Life Is The Most Nearly Absolute Right.

The right to life forms the foundation for nearly all other rights. Remove the right to life and the other rights become valueless. The preciousness of this right to the unborn may be surmised from the following:

"We hold these truths to be self-evident; that all men are created equal, that they are endowed by their Creator with certain inalienable rights, that among these rights are life . . . that to secure these rights, governments are instituted among men . . . . " Declaration of Independence.

"Nor shall any state deprive any person of life, liberty, or property without due process of law, nor deny to any person within its jurisdiction that equal protection of the laws." Fourteenth Amendment, Constitution of the United States.

"The child, by reason of his physical and mental immaturity, needs special safeguards and care, including appropriate legal protection, before as well as after birth." Declaration of the Rights of a Child, General Assembly of the United Nations, November 20, 1959.

In Areas Other Than Abortion The Right To Privacy Is Insufficient Reason To Take The Life Of Another Human Being.

In areas other than abortion the right to privacy does not give the right to take the life of another human, even an invading inferior human being. There is a dispute as to the seriousness of the imposition on the woman by her unborn baby. The extent of the woman's right to privacy should be determined in part by the seriousness of the invasion of that right to privacy. Analogous in some ways to the invasion of a mother's body by an unwanted unborn baby is the invasion of a building by a trespasser or a petty thief, where the thief's right to live is protected. "But spring guns and other man-killing devices are not justifiable against a trespasser or even a petty thief."[2]

When we apply the well-tested common law policy relating to traps to abortion, we find that the case for the preservation of life is stronger in many ways in the case of abortion, where the baby is invited in by actions by the woman.

In the case of the traps, the person whose right to privacy is being invaded is entirely powerless to prevent the invasion in many cases, since the measures necessary to make property thief-proof cost more than most persons can afford. In the case of abortion, the mother not only has the power to prevent the pregnancy, she had to actively participate in a sexual act before the conception could occur. In addition, after participating, she had to refrain from taking steps, such as a morning-after pill or D & C, to prevent implantation. In the case of traps, the protected invader of privacy may well be guilty of a criminal act, yet he still is protected. In the case of abortion, the victim is personally entirely innocent, regardless of the acts of his parents.

Burden And Degree Of Proof.

Whenever a human being is faced with the legal loss of his life, the burden of proof that that person should lose his life lies with those who are attempting to take his life, and the burden of proof is not a mere preponderance of the evidence. The Court should not do less in the case of innocent unborn humans than it does for more mature humans who are accused of serious crimes. Before defining the law to permit the killing of millions of unborn children, the Court should require the pro-abortionists to prove their case beyond a reasonable doubt.

The Scope Of The Right To Privacy In The Area Of Abortion Should Be Determined In Part By Comparing The Conflicting Rights And By Determing The Results Likely To Follow If Various Alternatives Are Adopted.

The issue of abortion is more than a question of the freedom of a woman to control the reproduction functions of her body. It is also a question of those circumstances under which a human being may be permitted to take the life of another. Granting an absolute right to aborton because of the right to privacy will cause abortion on demand to exist, the advantages and disadvantages of abortion on demand may be analyzed in part by analyzing the experience of the large nations which have had sufficiently large volume of abortions over a sufficiently long period of time under carefully monitored conditions.

Loosening Abortion Laws May Have Significant Unforeseen Future Effects.

In Ballard v. Anderson, 4 Cal.3d 873, 484 P.2d 1345, 95 Cal.Rptr. 1 (1971), the California Supreme Court ruled that the 1967 California Abortion Law permits a minor of any age to get an abortion without parental knowledge or consent, a result not mentioned during debate in 1967. A New York court has held that New York cannot limit medicaid for abortions to abortions for medical reasons.[3] Neither of these events were foreseen or discussed at the time the respective abortion laws were being discussed. Declaring abortion laws unconstitutional may cause unforeseen, possibly unwanted, future events. Will a 12 or 13 year old girl then have the right to become pregnant and to get an abortion without parental knowledge and consent, such as happened in California? If the minor is permitted to get an abortion, does not her right to privacy give her a right to be sterilized without parental knowledge or consent? Will not more unborn Americans be executed in a relatively few years than the number of Jews by the Nazis? Will not a woman, have a right to deliberately conceive a child, then kill that child by means of abortion, for purposes such as toxicity tests? It is probable that the unforeseen results from giving a woman an absolute right to privacy in the area of abortion will be far more imaginative than the few possibilities suggested herein. If the Court permits abortion for no reason, where will it logically be able to draw a line when the same anti-life arguments are extended?

Abortion Is Only The Opening Wedge Of A Broad Based Attack On The Right To Live.

The scope and severity of the attacks on the right to live are such that if the right to live is destroyed in a particular small area, it may be impossible to prevent the right to live from being destroyed in other areas. HB 3184, prefiled October, 1969, by Representative Sackett in Florida, and introduced annually since, would permit three doctors and one judge to order the execution of persons they felt deserving of execution. SB 1421-70, introduced by Nadao Yoshinaga, February 4, 1970, in Hawaii, the week after Hawaii passed its aborton-on-demand law, provides that every woman giving birth to her second child must be sterilized regardless of her opinions or belief or those of her doctor. These two bills, if passed, would make legal in America a large percentage of the actions of the Nazis which were labeled atrocities in the 1940's. There is sufficient pressure, however, to go far beyond these two bills in America today. The California Medical Association has stated in an an editorial: "The traditional western ethic has always placed great emphasis on the intrinsic worth and equal value of every human life regardless of its stage or condition . . . . This traditional ethic is still clearly dominant, but there is much to suggest that it is being eroded at its core and may eventually even be abandoned . . . . It will become necessary and acceptable to place relative rather than absolute values on such things as human lives . . . . The process of eroding the old ethic and substituting the new has already begun. It may be seen most clearly in changing attitudes toward human abortion. In defiance of the long held Western ethic of intrinsic and equal value for every human life regardless of its stage, condition or status, abortion is becoming accepted by society as moral, right and even necessary . . . . Since the old ethic has not yet been fully displaced it has been necessary to separate the idea of abortion from the idea of killing, which continues to be socially abhorrent. The result has been a curious avoidance of the scientific fact, which everyone really knows, that human life begins at conception and is continuous whether intra- or extra-uterine until death. The very considerable semantic gymnastics which are required to rationalize abortion as anything but taking a human life would be ludicrous if they were not often put forth under socially impeccable auspices. It is suggested that this schizophrenic sort of subterfuge is necessary because while a new ethic is being accepted the old one has not yet been rejected. . . . Medicine's role with respect to changing attitudes toward abortion may well be a prototype of what is to occur . . . . One may anticipate further development of these roles as the problems of birth control and birth selection are extended inevitably to death selection and death control whether by the individual or by society."[4]

Whether it be best sellers such as "Population Bomb," which likens human beings to a cancer which must be removed–even though the operation will require many cruel and apparent heartless decisions, TV talk shows, magazine articles[5], or talks at schools, etc., general principles are being proposed for America today which are broad enough to encompass most of the worst acts of the Nazis. It is very possible that today in America the right to live may be whittled away by a series of small steps, each justified for varying reasons, so that the sum result of all those steps will be undesirable. The first and most difficult step is to establish in the law, as the Court is being asked to do in this case, that a certain class of human beings are subhumans whose lives may be taken with no more justification than needed to step on an ant. Once that first large step is taken, and the right to privacy becomes a license to kill, the subsequent small steps may come easily, rapidly and inevitably.

The Protection Of The Right To Life Should Be Based On Current Medical Knowledge (Which Indicates That A 10-Ounce Child Can Survive), Not Medical Knowledge Hundreds Of Years Old.

All would agree that "shooting or otherwise damaging a corpse is not homicide."[6] An apparently drowned child would have been pronounced dead in years past, and a court in those days would exonerate from homicide one who cut off the child's head a moment after the heart stopped. Would this be just today, when we have modified the definition of a corpse because of advances in techniques for life revival, restoration and resuscitation, such as artificial respiration, open heart massage, transfusions, transplants, and a variety of life-restoring stimulants, drugs and new surgical methods.

The "quickening" barrier for fetus survival was long ago broken. In the 1930's, a ten-ounce premature infant survived its early birth to grow to become a normal size adult.[7] This Court should not disregard the medicine of the 1930's and hold that a woman's right to privacy gives her a license to kill her unquickened unborn child because that child would have been too small to have survived in 1600. Nor should this Court rule that a nine-ounce child can be killed by its mother, because the "nine-ounce barrier" for premature infants is no more sacred than the "four-minute mile barrier" was for runners.

Experiments going back into the early 1960's[8] have indicated that artificial wombs for unborn humans are only a matter of time. It is expected that before the present decade ends,[9] that is, sometime before 1980, any unborn human being, perhaps even those weighing less than one ounce, old enough to have developed a placenta, may be removed from its mother, placed in an artificial liquid environment, fed food and oxygen from a heart-lung machine through its placenta, and enabled to develop until it can breathe and eat like a normal newborn child. This year, in Sydney, Australia, Richard Brodrick, a child only six inches long, nearly survived.[10] In a matter of a few short years, any woman wishing to terminate an early pregnancy will be able to terminate the pregnancy without the death of the child. The doctor will be able to carefully remove the placenta and child and give the child a chance to live, if the law protects the child.

" 'Responsible' physicians would hope not to abort a mother whose baby would be over one pound. But -- one of our colleagues recently witnessed a four pound baby killed by the salt method and delivered stillborn. Another practice is that of some so-called physicians in New York City and elsewhere of injecting salt solution and immediately sending the mother home. Within two weeks in Cincinnati two babies weighing three-and-a-fourth and three-and-three-fourths pounds were delivered dead from mothers who had had this procedure."[11]

Unless it sustains strong abortion laws, the Court will, in effect, make a new legal definition–the subhuman who can be killed with impunity. It will then be much easier to increase the scope and variety of those innocents falling within the "subhuman class" than it was to establish the first class of innocent, legal subhumans.

Abortion Has Caused Emotional Disturbance In Non-Christian Japan Among About 80% Of Aborton Patients.[12]

"The average of six surveys in Japan indicates that most women with abortion experience do not approve of it without reserve. The 1963 survey by the Aichi Committee on the Eugenic Protection Law indicates that 73.1% of the women who experienced abortion felt 'anguish' about what they did. In the 1964 survey of Dr. Kaseki, 59% responded that they felt abortion was something 'very evil' and only 8% said they don't think it should be called something bad. In the Gamagori City survey, 65% had some reason to be sorry. In the 1968 survey of the Nagoya City area, 67% of the women responded that they felt the fetus is an individual human being from the beginning, not a part of the mother. 42% of the women in the survey responded that abortion is not good. In addition another 57% that it is not good but it couldn't be helped; and only 1% didn't know whether to call it bad or good. In the 1969 survey by the Prime Minister's Office, 88% answered that abortion is bad, or it is not good but cannot be helped.

"In the 1965 Mainichi survey, only 18% responded that they 'did not feel anything in particular' when they experienced abortion for the first time; 35.3% felt 'sorry about the fetus'; 28.1% felt they did something wrong; 4.3% worried about fecundity impairments; 6.5% had other answers, and 7.9% did not answer." Ibid.

In Japan, The Physical Abnormality Rate Following Abortion Has Been About 29%.

"All public opinion surveys taken indicate that several million women in Japan believe that their health has been harmed by abortion; that is, legal abortion. The surveys cover a total of 16-17 million married women, not counting the unmarried, among whom many have also experienced abortion. If roughly half of them have experienced at least one abortion (which is a conservative estimate); and if 30% of them have adverse health effects as a result, the number of women affected is already above 2.5 million; there are more if we also count the unmarried, and those who have moved into the higher age categories.

"This appears to be the picture which emerges from the public opinion surveys. In the 1959 Mainichi survey, 28.4% of those who had abortion reported 'some kind of bad effect'; in the 1963 Aichi survey, 13% indicated damage from the operation; in the 1964 Welfare Ministry survey, 24.1% indicated that they were physically unwell since the operation; in the 1965 Mainichi survey, 18.5% indicated (after only one abortion) that they were physically unwell after the operation; in the 1968 Nagoya survey by Women's Associations, 59% indicated that they were severely troubled with adverse after-effects, or in less good health; and in the 1969 survey of the Office of the Prime Minister, 31% indicated that some kind of physical abnormality came about as a result of abortion; this averages to 29% in the six surveys; not counting those who did not reply to this question.

ed: 18.5% indicate that they were physically unwell after one operation; 22.7% after two; 40.4% after three; 51.7% after four operations. . . .

"The 1969 survey of the Office of the Prime Minister indicates the following list of complaints: 9.17% sterility (after 3 years); 14.8% habitual spontaneous abortion; 3.9% extra-uterine pregnancies; 17.4% menstrual irregularities; 20% abdominal pains; 19.7% dizziness; 27.2% headache; 3.5% frigidity; 13.5% exhaustion; 3.6% neurosis.

"Even though the operating physician performs everything normally the woman experiences a sudden change from the pregnant state to the non-pregnant state. Her body has been functioning at high capacity to provide nourishment for the developing fetus and to dispose of wastes. When the fetus is wrenched out of her body, the reason for this prodigious physical activity is suddenly removed. Dr. Y. Moriguchi compares it to slamming emergency brakes on a train which is going at full speed (Katorikku Shingaku, Jochi University, II, II, 4, pp. 353-362). As a result the syndrome of the unbalanced sympathetic nervous system may appear (see Dr. Nakatsu "Mistakes in Abortion and Prognosis" in OBSTETRICS AND GYNECOLOGY, Sept. 1960, pp. 53-59)."[13] states: "And from what they answered, it appears the 1970's woman is as straitlaced as ladies of Victoria's day . . . . 65% of the women interviewed think premarital sex is immoral. More astounding, 54% of the men think so, too.

"Also shot down as socially unacceptable: trial marriages (77% of the women oppose and 69% of the men) and bearing children out of wedlock (85% of the women, 82% of the men oppose). In fact, 89% of the women and 87% of the men think society would fall apart without the institution of marriage."

Permissive Abortion Laws Are Unlikely To Reduce The Numbers Of Battered Children.

". . . Dr. Edward Lenoski, Professor of Pediatrics at the University of Southern California, did a four-and-a half year study of 400 battered children. He determined that 90% of the battered children in his study were planned pregnancies. Ninety per cent is far above average for planned pregnancies. Most of our readers undoubtably deeply cherish and love the children that they have been given. How many of you, however, actually planned the conception of 90% of them? We could apparently kill all 'unwanted' babies in the early stages of pregnancy, but still not significantly reduce the numbers of battered children.

"Dr. Lenoski has also determined that since the advent of the contraceptive pill (which has certainly reduced unwanted pregnancies), child beating is up threefold."[15]

Deaths From Pregnancy Are Not Sufficient Reason To Forbid Abortion Limitation Laws.

United States Vital Statistics indicate a death rate per pregnancy caused by deliveries and complications of pregnancy, childbirth and the pur perium of 28 per hundred thousand in 1967. Some mothers, however, have less than adequate medical care during pregnancy. The true risk of pregnancy, given mediocre medical care, is probably closer to 10 deaths per hundred thousand births. United States Vital Statistics indicate that the death rate per hundred thousand live births among white New England women during 1965-67 was 10.8 per hundred thousand live births. The death rate among women receiving inadequate medical care is probably 5 to 10 times as high or perhaps even higher, as can be seen by the nationwide non-white death rate of 69.5 per hundred thousand live births in 1967. Those white women in New England who did not receive adequate medical care probably had a death rate far higher than 10 per hundred thousand live births, although no such statistics are available in the United States Vital Statistics. Accordingly, the death rate per hundred thousand live births for women receiving adequate medical care was probably less than 10 per hundred thousand live births in the period 1965-67. In addition, the long term trend in death rates from pregnancy since the 1920's has been a reduction by more than 50% in the death rate from pregnancy each 10 years. There is some evidence that the long term trend is slowing down, but if it holds, the death rate for women receiving adequate medical care in the years 1973-75 will be about 5 per 100,000 live births.

In comparing the death rates caused by abortion and pregnancy, it should be noted that in the case of legal abortions, the woman is generally given what is considered to be adequate medical care. Accordingly, no improvement in medical care based on today's knowledge is likely to significantly reduce the death rate from abortion.

While United States Vital Statistics list nearly 1,000 deaths from pregnancy and related causes in 1967 and 1968, with only 130 deaths from abortion in 1968 and 160 in 1967, abortion is not thereby shown to be safer. The pregnancy death quantities are deceivingly high because all abortion deaths are included in maternal mortality figures, as well as a number of women who die during or after pregnancy of kidney disease, high blood pressure, and stroke conditions that might have claimed them whether they were pregnant or not. In addition, the risk from one pregnancy is spread over about 12 months. If aborted, the woman may become pregnant again soon, as indicated by the following table by KOYA, MURAMATSU, Bulletin of the Institute of Public Health, (Japan) IV, No. 1-2, Sept. 1954, for women not using contraceptives.

Months	Percentage Pregnant
	After abortion	After childbirth
3	19.2% (448)	0.0% (354)
6	32.8%	2.5%
9	43.5%	8.5%
12	50.0%	16.9%
15	60.0%	26.3%

The Woman's Health Is Not A Justification For Abortion.

The experience of nearly every area where comprehensive statistics have been kept indicates that abortion is far more likely to cause death, emotional harm, mental harm, and physical harm to the woman than continuation of the pregnancy.[16] Willke lists Sweden's abortion death rate at 40 per hundred thousand, England's at 75 per hundred thousand, and points out that Maryland's initial rate the first year was 77 per hundred thousand and New York's is low because of the women who go home to die. They also point out why the low abortion death rates from Communist nations are "worse than useless"(p. 64).

The reasons why abortion causes mental harm to the mother have been stated by Conrad W. Baars, M.D.[17], who stated that a woman who is pregnant and has an abortion is going to be deprived of the most important psychological help, namely, the love of her child; they frequently think it will help, but it is actually pushing them back into loneliness; the essence of love is the affirmation of another, nothing is less affirming than the denial of the child by abortion which kills another human; the strong disaffirming of another, who is closer to her at that time than anyone else, can have strong adverse effects.

Hilgers has stated:[18] "In Colorado, 71.5% of all abortions are being done for psychiatric reasons. The similar figures for California (1969) and Oregon are 90% and 97% respectively." (Note: In 1970 in California the rate went to 98%. See infra.) Hilgers continues:

"One would get the impression that mental illness in the pregnant woman is extremely common and very serious when present. However, in fact, in all of these states, the 'mental helath' clause has distinctly been abused. This abuse, Doctor Cavanaugh says, has led to a decline in the quality of patient care and a gross dishonesty in medical practice–particularly psychiatry. We must, therefore, look carefully at the psychiatric problems associated with pregnancy.

"Noyes and Kolbe's textbook of psychiatry states that 'experience does not show that pregnancy and the birth of the child influence adversely the course of schizophrenia, manic depressive illness or the majority of psychoneuroses.' On the other hand, those psychoses which are initiated by pregnancy rarely persist. Patients tend to recover after a comparatively short period of time and in some cases may recover spontaneously before full term is reached. Women who show permanent impairment of mentality following childbirth belong to the class of potentially psychotic for whom pregnancy is merely an ancillary factor in the pathogenesis of the psychosis. In such women, an induced abortion cannot be curative and it may have unresolved conflicts with guilt and added depression which is more harmful than the continuation of the pregnancy–(see section on complications–psychiatric sequelae).

"There is evidence to suggest that serious mental disorders arise following abortion more often in women with real psychiatric problems and that paradoxically, the very

women for whom legal abortion may seem justifiable are also the ones for whom the risk is highest for post-abortion psychic insufficiency.

"It should be pointed out that suicide in the pregnant woman is extremely rare. In fact, it is about 1/6th the rate seen in nonpregnant women of the same age. Furthermore, as Asche pointed out, it is virtually impossible to ascertain accurately whether a woman is suicidal. In the State of Minnesota, the Minnesota Maternal Mortality Committee, reported only 14 suicides associated with pregnancy in well over 1.5 million live births between 1950-1966. (The Minnesota Maternal Mortality Committee studies in detail all deaths in women which occur during pregnancy or within a period 90 days following delivery). Ten of these 14 had delivered before the suicide, and all 14 were married. In retrospect, these deaths probably could have been prevented if adequate psychiatric care had been obtained and utilized. The explanation of why so few pregnant women commit suicide appears to be that women–including the unwed–receive a good deal more attention from society when pregnant than when not pregnant. Also, there may be certain physiologic and instinctive factors which manifest themselves in greater maternal protectiveness.

"Eminent psychiatrists from throughout the world agree that, if all the evidence is taken into careful consideration, few neurotic or psychotic women are ever benefited by termination of pregnancy and that the few that would be are extremely difficult to select.

"When abortion is substituted for adequate psychiatric care (and there is much evidence to suggest that this is happening), then there is a distinct danger of minimizing established

psychotherapeutic principles. Unfortunately, it is the distressed woman who ultimately faces the full impact of this minimization. She is the one who cries out for help and she is also the one who is turned away."

Even assuming arguendo that abortion helped some types of illness, and abortions for mental health reasons were limited to the mentally ill instead of being used as a vehicle for abortion on demand, difficulties might arise from establishing the principle that the life of one person should depend on the judgment of another person who is mentally ill, because that person is mentally ill.

A Negative Feeling In Early Pregnancy Is Common But Temporary.

Hilgers states:[19] "Based on the knowledge that the majority of women who have a negative or ambivalent reaction to their pregnancy during its early stages do, in fact, as the pregnancy advances, develop a more positive acceptance of the pregnancy, supportive care of the pregnant woman becomes all the more reasonable. Much has been said of the unwanted child, yet the majority of women who expressed ambivalent or rejecting attitudes toward the pregnancy in the early months, now, in the third trimester, express positive, or at least more accepting, attitudes toward the baby.

"Indeed this phenomenon of early rejection and later acceptance has been spelled out by Gardiner in Williams Obstetrics, 13th edition, 1966:

[19] Ibid. pp. 36, 37.

" 'The initial acceptance and adaptation to the pregnancy by the particular patient will depend upon the implications regarding future responsibilities and future personal and intrapersonal relationships engendered by the pregnancy. At that stage (the first three months), the pregnancy exists only as an abstraction and can be accepted or rejected depending upon the character and personal significance of future implications . . . .

" 'So real and life-threatening are these emotional reactions to these women that they not only reject the existence of the pregnancy before they, themselves, are engulfed and destroyed. Under the spell of this distorted thinking and reasoning, the medical hazards of instrumental abortion fade into insignificance.

" 'It is not unusual (however) for women who will become good mothers, or those who have already demonstrated their excellent maternal qualities with their older children, to react initially to the diagnosis of pregnancy with resentment, frustration and depression, only to express strong, genuine, positive feelings of acceptance as the pregnancy advances and fetal movements appear.'

"Considering this, it seems fair to ask what happens if their fearful request for abortion is denied. Hook reported that of 249 women refused an abortion in Sweden, 86% gave birth, 11% had induced abortions (22% had threatened to do so), and 3% had spontaneous abortion. Of this group 12% had threatened suicide but no suicides or suicide attempts occurred. Kolstad reported that of 113 women refused abortion in Norway and who carried the pregnancy to term 84% were glad that the pregnancy was not terminated, 9% were uncertain as to their feelings, and only 7% were discontented. Furthermore, Murdock showed that by supporting pregnant women throughout their pregnancy, the pressures for abortion were significantly decreased. He suggested that the pregnancy carried to term may have been a positive factor in the mother's return to normalcy."

Medical Complications Of Induced Abortion.

Hilgers states:[20] "The American College of Obstetricians -- Gynecologists has stated: 'The inherent risk of a therapeutic abortion are serious and may be life-threatening, this fact should be fully appreciated by both the medical profession and the public. In nations where abortion may be obtained on demand, a considerable morbidity and mortality has been reported.'

"This is suppored by a statement issued by the Royal College of Obstetrician-Gynecologists (Great Britain): 'Those without specialists' knowledge, and these include members of the medical profession, are influenced in adopting what they regard as a humanitarian attitude to the induction of abortion by a failure to appreciate what is involved. They tend to regard induction of abortion as a trivial operation, free from risk. In fact, even to the expert working in the best conditions, the removal of an early pregnancy after dilating the cervic can be difficult, and is not infrequently accompanied by serious complications. This is particularly true in the case of the woman pregnant for the first time. For women who have a serious medical indication for termination of pregnancy, induction of abortion is extremely hazardous and its risks need to be weighed carefully against those involved in leaving the pregnancy undisturbed. Even for the relatively healthy woman, however, the dangers are considerable."

Under the heading "Mortality Rates" Hilgers states:

"Obviously, the worst complication resulting from a legal abortion is death itself. In Table I you will see listed the legal abortion mortality rates for several countries which have eliminated the legal safeguards to abortion. Included also are the 10 maternal deaths which New York City had during the first 3 months following enactment of their law.

"In the majority of countries, including New York State, a woman is more likely to die from legal abortion than she is if she were to carry the pregnancy to term (this is in contradiction to what proponents of abortion would have us believe). It must be emphasized that these figures are for legal abortion, done by licensed physicians in fully accredited medical facilities. The tragedy is that these deaths are preventable simply by having a strong abortion law. In Minnesota, this tragedy is compounded by the fact that there is probably no safer place in the world for a woman to have her baby."

Legal Abortion Mortality Rates

Country/State	Deaths/100,000 legal abortions
Finland	66
Denmark	41.4
New York City	greater than 40
Sweden	39.2
Great Britain	30
Yugoslavia	10
Japan	7
Hungary	7
Czechoslovakia	2.5

"(Those countries with extremely low death rates have laws which generally do not allow abortion after 3 months and, as such, are not comparable to present changes in United States abortion laws.)

"Addendum: Minnesota Maternal Mortality Rate = 14/100,000 live births."

(Note: Willke criticizes the accuracy of the low rates in Communist nations and points out maternal mortality rate includes abortion deaths as well as others which may have happened if the woman were not pregnant, while abortion excludes those who die elsewhere and some of those whose death is caused only indirectly by abortion, such as by hepatitis.)

Hilgers continues: "There are a whole host of major complications resulting from legal abortion which at their worst cause death, but much more frequently result in either temporary or permanent damage to the woman or her offspring. Again, using the world's medical literature as documentation, these complications will be presented in some detail. They will, however, be limited to the 4 main methods through which abortion is procured in the United States: dilation and curettage, suction curettage, saline instillation and hysterotomy.

"Infection--Pelvic infection is a common sequel to legal abortion. While the incidence varies slightly from country to country, consensus reveals an astonishing high rate. (See Table II)."

The Incidence Of Pelvic Infection Following Legal Abortion

% EARLY INFECTION	% LATE INFECTION	METHOD	COUNTRY
5.0	-	D & C	Germany

Hilgers further states: "The incidence appears to be highest 2 - 3 weeks after the abortion at a time when the patient has been lost to follow-up. There is also good evidence to suggest that the young woman pregnant for the first time stands a much greater risk of infection (15.8%).

"These infections are the direct result of the instrumentation involved in the abortive technique and are manifest as salpingitis (infection in the fallopian tubes) or endometritis (infection in the lining of the womb). When out of control, these infections can cause septic shock with rapid death or pelvic thrombophlebitis (inflammation and blood clot formation in the pelvic veins) with sudden death by pulmonary embolus (blood clot from the pelvic veins which dislodges and is carried to the lungs). These infections can also result in sterility because they scar the tubes to a point where they no longer function properly.

"Hemorrhage–Major hemorrhage is another complication and can result in death by exsanguination. Again, the incidence is much too high to be acceptable from a medical standpoint. (See Table III)."

Table III, referred to above, is as follows:

8.0	All methods	Colorado
3-7.8	Saline	Sweden
15.4	Saline	Great Britain
3.6	Saline	Japan
2.0	Saline	Denmark
3.8	Suction	Great Britain

Hilgers continues: "To think that this won't happen in America is naive. During the first year of Colorado's new abortion law, 8% of patients needed one or more blood transfusions (most of these abortions were done by dilation and curettage, or suction curettage). It should be mentioned that every time a blood transfusion is given, there are certain inherent risks, e.g., allergic reactions and serum hepatitis.

"Uterine Perforation--Perforation of the uterus can occur as a sequel to dilation and curettage. This occurs primarily because the surgeon operates by 'touch' alone and not under direct vision. Secondarily, the pregnant uterus is much softer than the non-pregnant uterus, lending itself to easier perforation. The incidence of perforation throughout the world is presented in Table IV."

The Incidence Of Uterine Perforation As A Result Of Legal Abortion

% PERFORATION	COUNTRY/STATE
0.11-0.28	Germany
0.14-0.80	Poland
0.10-0.18	Rumania
0.45	Czechoslovakia
0.20	Poland
1.2	USSR
0.4	Bulgaria
1.2	Great Britain
1.2	New York City
1.2	Colorado

Hilgers then states: "It is sad to note that New York City and Colorado are both experiencing relatively high rates of uterine perforation (1.2%). If in the process of perforation, the bowel or a blood vessel is torn, overwhelming infection and/or hemorrhage may occur which require an exploratory abdominal operation (30-65% with a perforation will need this operation). Subsequent pregnancy following a perforation is put in jeopardy because the perforation scar may rupture as the uterus expands.

"Menstrual Disturbances–Menstrual disturbances following abortion are not infrequent. (See Table V). This usually means gross irregularity in the appearance of the menstrual period, heavy bleeding with the menses or complete absence of menstruation. These disturbances may persist for many years. They are mostly the result of endouterine adherences or infection. This may lead to a number of more technical problems which need not be detailed here."

The Incidence Of Menstrual Disturbance Following Legal Abortion

% MENSTRUAL DISTURBANCES	COUNTRY/STATE
3.1	Hungary
2.0	Czechoslovakia
1.0	Czechoslovakia
11-12 (5 year follow-up)	USSR
2.2	USSR
5.2	Poland

Under the heading "Subsequent Pathologic Pregnancies" Hilgers states: "Subsequent pregnancies are more often pathologic following abortion and this without question represents one of the most serious complications of induced abortion. The prematurity rate in Czechoslovakia prior to abortion on demand was 5% (not much different from the United States). Several years later, this had increased to 14%. Hungary and Japan have reported similar trends. The incidence in any one individual seems to be well correlated with the number of abortions a woman has; Hungarian studies reveal that the likelihood of premature delivery after one abortion increased to 12%; after two abortions–15%; and after three abortions –24%. It should be pointed out that prematurity is the leading cause of infant death in the United States, and one of the major contributors to mental and motor retardation. The authors are not aware of any studies which have been done regarding psychiatric sequelae following premature birth as the result of a previous abortion, but would suspect a high correlation.

"A number of countries have reported a significant increase in incidence of ectopic pregnancies (pregnancies which occur someplace other than in the womb). In fact, Japan sees ectopic pregnancies in 3.9% of women, which is 4 to 8 times more frequent than in the United States. Ectopic pregnancies are not infrequently life threatening because of rupture and hemorrhage. Again, tubal malfunction secondary to infection seems to be the prime cause.

"Spontaneous abortions and fetal death before the onset of labor are reported to be significantly more common following legal abortion in those countries with weak abortion laws. Complicated labors (prolonged labor, placenta previa, adherent placenta) and excessive bleeding at the time of delivery are also more common when compared to women who have not had legal abortions. These all result in increased obstetrical intervention.

"Transplacental Hemorrhage–It has long been known that a woman who is Rh-negative is very susceptible to a special kind of problem if her consort is Rh-postive. Any given pregnancy may be a stimulus for the mother to develop antibodies against the baby's red blood cells (i.e., she becomes sensitized) so that in a subsequent pregnancy, these antibodies may destroy the baby's red blood cells resulting in an anemia in the unborn child which may be life-threatening. This sensitization occurs through the leakage of the baby's red blood cells into the mother's circulation (transplacental hemorrhage) usually at the time of delivery. Therefore, first born children are rarely affected. In spontaneous abortion, this sensitization rarely occurs.

However, with all methods of induced abortion sensitization has been reported to occur in 3 - 10% of Rh-negative women. Recent advances have allowed us to prevent this complication in 100% of women treated. However, because tests on the fetus cannot be performed to rule out sensitization of the mother, a number of women, who have not become sensitized, will be needlessly subjected to this expensive treatment.

"Sterility—There are a number of complications which do not appear immediately following the abortion. Poland has reported that 6.9% of women were sterile 4 to 5 years after abortion. Japan has reported 9.7% with subsequent sterility on 3 year follow-up and other countries have had similar experience. This appears to be the result of inadequate regeneration of the lining of the womb following dilation and curettage and/or infection as previously mentioned. There is evidence also to suggest that the sterility may have an adverse psychological effect on the woman. As Jeffcoat stated, 'If this happens when a first pregnancy is interrupted for non-recurrent indication, such as rubella or fleeting psychological upset, the situation is tragic.'

"Miscellaneous—A number of miscellaneous complications occur which deserve mention. (1) The Czech's have reported that 33% of patients had decreased sexual libido 9 months after the abortion. Similarly, a study from Poland showed 14% to have decreased libido 4 to 5 years after the abortion. This is theoretically related to the psychotraumatic experience of the interruption and emotional weakness that follows. (2) Changes in the coagulability of the blood following legal abortion, although rare, have been reported. (3) Most pregnancies following hysterotomy will need delivery by Caesarean section to eliminate the possibility of rupture of the hysterotomy scar. (4) Endometreosis is a common sequel to hysterotomy. (5) A particular problem associated with suction curettage appears to be perforation of the bladder.

"Psychiatric Sequelae–The psychiatric sequelae of induced abortion are most difficult to elucidate. Reports on the incidence of emotional difficulties following abortion vary from 0 - 85%. The true figure lies someplace in between. The difficulties appear to be more common in mature and motherly women than in the more immature, psychopathic and unmotherly. This may be because the husband is most often the prime mover to an abortion in the married woman and in the unmarried, parents and friends are prime movers. As previously mentioned, the woman with real psychiatric illness prior to an abortion is at greater risk to develop significant problems post-abortion than is the psychiatrically 'stable' woman.

"Martin Ekblad interviewed 479 women prior to abortion and again 2-1/2 to 3 years later. At follow-up, he found 10% felt the operation unpleasant; 14% had mild self reproach; and 11% had serious self reproach and self regret. This is perhaps the best single study which has been conducted in this area.

"Seigfried, in 1951, studied 61 women, 2 years after abortion, and found 13% to have serious self reproach. Beck, in 1964, studied 50 women 4 months after legal abortion and 9 had suppressed remorse which was expressed as various psychosomatic symptoms such as abdominal discomfort, vomiting, pruritis vulvae, dysmenorrhea, frigidity, headache, insomnia, fatigue, etc. Niswander and Patter-so in 1967 studied 17 women, 8 months post-abortion for rubella. Eleven of the 17 reacted unfavorably and 8 had long term negative experience.

"It would appear that 15 - 25% of all women undergoing legal abortion will have some long term psychologic reaction. According to Helene Deutsch, the pregnant woman can initially deny the unborn child, but once she admits she is pregnant, she feels an unconscious attachment to him. The longer she stays pregnant, the more the child becomes a part of her. As a result, after abortion, many women feel that part of them is gone."

Techniques Of Induced Abortion.

Abortion can best be appreciated by seeing one from over the doctor's shoulder; nevertheless, some of the potential for damage can be understood by reading the following by Hilgers.[21]

"Potts has reported on the many ways of producing an abortion in a pregnant woman, many of them of only theoretical utility. He has described certain medical methods, including agents that destroy the fetus or placenta such as X rays, antimitotics and antimetabolites, together with agents that interfere with the maternal reaction to pregnancy such as monoamine oxidase inhibitors, non-steroidal estrogens, and immunological methods. Recent reports by Karim and Roth-Brandel and others reveal their use of a new abortifacient agent, prostaglandin, which when administered by continuous intravenous drip usually induces premature labor and results in abortion. Its side effects are presently being studied.

"Surgical techniques of abortion are of three general types: (1) scraping out or sucking out the fetus and its membranes from the uterus through the cervix and vagina after the cervix has been dilated with an instrument; (2) stimulation of premature labor and delivery, with or without ensuring the death of the fetus before delivery; and (3) hysterotomy, or direct surgical incision into the uterus with removal of the fetus, membranes and placenta.

"Presently available tests for pregnancy are usually unreliable until at least two weeks after a missed menstrual period, meaning that the human embryo is at least four weeks old when its existence is first discernible. One factor which frequently tends to delay the diagnosis of pregnancy is the slight vaginal bleeding often seen in early pregnancy and which the pregnant woman may mistake for a menstrual period. Another such delaying factor is the more or less constitutional menstrual irregularity which may lead a woman to accept the absence of menstrual period for a month or more.

"During the first twelve weeks of pregnancy, corresponding in practice, therefore, to an embryonic-fetal age of four to twelve weeks, abortionists rely upon dilation of the cervix and sharp curettage alone or suction curettage, which is usually followed by sharp curettage to ensure that no remnants of the fetus are left behind. In this procedure the woman is placed on her back on the operating table, her knees apart and hips and knees bent. She may be given general anesthesia, local anesthesia—by injections alongside the cervix (usually the only pain-sensitive structure involved) or no anesthesia, depending on the size of the uterus and cervix, the ease with which it dilates, the age of the fetus (and therefore its size), and the preference of the operating doctor.

"The vagina is then cleansed with an antiseptic solution. A toothed instrument is clamped onto the cervix which is pulled toward the operator. The canal through the cervix is found with a long thin instrument called a sound, and then widened, usually by passing a series of progressively larger probes or dilators through it until it can admit the sharp curved curette or the tubular suction curette. Curettes for abortion range in size from 3.5 mm to 15 mm or about 1/8 inch to 5/8 inch, the larger sizes being necessary to tear through and scrape or suck out the tissues of the fetus, placenta, and membranes in the later stages of this first twelve week period of gestation. During the period from the fourth through the twelfth week of pregnancy the fetus has grown from 1/5 inch to 3-1/2 inches, has differentiated its organ systems, has arms and legs, has fingers and toes each provided with nails. Centers for bony development have appeared and begun to deposit bone in the skeleton which has been cartilage up to now. It may be of interest to the reader to read from the respected Williams Obstetrics, thirteenth edition, 1966, page 192: 'A fetus born at this time may make spontaneous movements if still within the amniotic sac or if immersed in warm saline.'

"If sharp curettage has been done, the pieces of the fetus with its membranes are placed on a sponge or in a pan and sent to the pathologist for identification. In suction curette equipment there is usually a glass jar placed in line with the suction apparatus so that fetal parts will be trapped and not interfere with the machinery. In this case the glass bottle is simply unscrewed and sent to the pathologist.

"Stimulation of premature delivery, by a variety of means, is the method of choice by those who abort women pregnant for more than twelve weeks. Dilation and curettage is not used after about twelve weeks' gestation because it become prohibitively dangerous due to the larger size of the fetus and uterus, each now with larger blood vessels. The uterine wall is becoming progressively softer and thinner, the more likely to be perforated by a hard instrument. The fetal skeleton is becoming harder and the fetus more difficult to remove.

"Stimulation of effective uterine contractions, essentially the stimulation of premature labor, may be accomplished by injecting a variety of substances into the uterine cavity, either inside of or outside of the fetal membranes themselves. Most commonly used are concentrated salt (abandoned by the Japanese as unsafe after 1950), sugar, and formaldehyde solutions, irritant soaps, pastes, and rivanol (a mild antiseptic widely used in Japan).

"Schiffer has reported on the technic used in 28 abortions ranging from 14 to 24 weeks' gestation. The woman's abdomen was washed and prepared with antiseptic. Then, under local anesthesia a long needle was inserted through the abdominal wall, through the uterine wall and into the amniotic sac surrounding the fetus. As much of the fluid in this sac as possible was withdrawn through the needle, and, when possible, an equal amount of sterile salt solution was then injected and the needle withdrawn. Labor pains began, on the average, 27.5 hours after injection and the fetus was delivered an average of 11 hours later. Some of Schiffer's patients received intravenous oxytocin, a drug used to strengthen uterine contractions, during the abortion. It is noteworthy that the reason that these substances stimulate labor is not yet known.

"During the period from twelve to twenty-four weeks' gestation the fetus grows to be about 13 inches long, weighing 1-1/4 pounds, with hair on its head, wrinkles on its skin and obvious sex organs. Survival of this 24-week size baby, though rare, has been reported.

"The Japanese often use a mechanical means to stimulate the pregnant uterus to start labor in performing mid-trimester abortions. Manabe reported on the use of the metreurynter–a balloon on the end of a flexible tube which is placed through the cervix between the uterine wall and the fetal membranes. The balloon is then filled with 3 to 10 ounces of sterile saline, causing it to become lodged in the uterus. The flexible tube is then hooked up to a pulley system between the woman's legs and a weight of 1 to 2 pounds is attached, exerting downward traction on the cervix. The Japanese feel that this force both dilates the cervix and stimulates the uterus to contract in an effort to expel the balloon and with it the unborn child. The average time from metreurynter inflation to delivery of the fetus–usually alive–varies widely but one report gives this figure to be about 26 hours.

"Manabe states that 'the ultimate aim in abortion is always the most physiologic delivery of the fetus, to ensure the safety of the mother.' He has found that the metreurynter method or the intrauterine instillation of 0.1% rivanol offer many advantages over other methods for mid-trimester abortions because 'they result in a far more physiologic labor, evidenced by the fact that the fetus is normally delivered alive.' He points out that 'most fetuses, however, die shortly after delivery if fetal age is less than the middle of the seventh month. Survival of the fetus even several hours after delivery would pose serious moral and ethical dilemmas.'

"The least frequently used means of producing an abortion is the hysterotomy, which entails incision into the uterus and removal of the fetus. This method is used in pregnancies generally over 14 weeks. It is a major surgical procedure usually done through an abdominal incision. Up to about 16 weeks of pregnancy, it may be done through the vagina. After 16 weeks it is thought to be unsafe vaginally."

Even during early abortions, pieces come out which are obviously parts of what had been a small baby. This fact, and the fact that the purpose of abortion is to kill a human being, have led Dr. Andrew Ivy (Chicago Tribune, May 2, 1970) to point out that he was the expert medical witness at the Nurnberg War Crime Trials; that we are, in many ways, near the stage of respect for human life that Germany was in the mid 1930's; and that abortion may lead us to repeat the German crimes. Dr. Leo Alexander, in the July 14, 1969 New England Journal of Medicine, also pointed out the importance in Nazi Germany of the first small wedged-in lever through the right to life and how this made the following steps logical.

Permissive Abortion Laws Do Not Decrease The Criminal Abortion Rate.

As Table VI, Hilgers has set forth the following information:[22]

COUNTRY/STATE	EFFECT OF CRIMINAL ABORTION RATE
German Democratic Republic	Increased with liberal abortion law
	Decreased with strict abortion law
Japan	No effect
Great Britain	No effect
Yugoslavia	Increased
Hungary	No effect
Czechoslovakia	No effect
Switzerland	No effect
Bulgaria	No effect
Poland	No effect
Colorado	No effect
USSR	No effect

(Note: Similar results have been found for Sweden[23], Denmark[24], and California at least in the initial years[25].)

Hilgers continues: "Not one country has seen a decrease in the criminal abortion rate as the result of adopting weak legislation. On the other hand, some countries have actually seen an increase. The German Democratic Republic is a good example. They saw an increase in the criminal abortion rate during the years 1947-1950, a time when they had a relaxed abortion law. In 1950, they adopted a law allowing abortion only for strict medical indications. This was followed by a precipitous fall in the number of criminal abortions.

"There are a number of reasons given for this paradox. It seems that the law plays an inherent educative role in forming the social ethic of any given society. When this social ethic is changed by eliminating all the legal safeguards to abortion, a whole new class of women, dependent upon that social ethic, find themselves asking for abortion. It also seems clear that women desire privacy when they are aborted and the legal framework, no matter how loose, does not allow for this."

Willke states:[26] "The prestigious British Medical Journal Lancet, in 1968 in a report entitled 'On the Outcome of Pregnancy When Legal Abortion is Readily Available' stated: 'Sweden's law, in its present form, has not sufficed to subdue criminal abortion.'

"Dr. Christopher Tietze, certainly one of the world's outstanding biostaticians, and a man who incidentally favors legalization of abortion, has written in his report, 'Abortion In Europe:' 'One of the major goals of the liberalization laws in Scandinavia was to reduce illegal abortion. This was not realized. Rather, as we know from a variety of sources, both criminal and total abortions increased. It survives because of the relative lack of privacy of the official procedures. (U.S. Journal of Public Health, Nov. 1967.)

"Was this also true of Japan? Even more so in Japan. Of the 50,000,000 unborn children that have been killed by abortions in the last 22 years in Japan, and where abortions are very inexpensive, a full one-third of the procedures continue to be done illegally.

"What of the United States? What has been our experience to date? There hasn't been too much published because legalized abortion laws are new in our country. Dr. W. Droegemuller in the American Journal of Obstetrics and Gynecology, March 1969, reporting on 'One Year Experience With a Liberalized Abortion Law,' says that, 'This has not reduced the admissions for septic abortions.' Sepsis (infection) is one of the most common complications of criminal abortion, and the number of septic cases admitted post-abortive to a hospital is a fairly good indication in a community of the number of criminal abortions being done.

"But perhaps their laws are too restrictive. What if abortion is completely available at the request of the mother? Wouldn't that eliminate illegal abortion? It didn't in Japan. It hasn't in England nor in any other major country to date.

"What is the reason why illegal abortions are not reduced? Here are some examples:

1) Suppose you are the wife of a man who wants another child. You do not. You become pregnant. If you go through official procedures in a hospital, your husband may find out. You don't want him to know, but you want to get rid of this baby, so you have an illegal abortion.

2) Suppose you are a married woman, and you become pregnant by another man. Your husband has been away, and he knows this would not be his child. Again, he must never know that you've become pregnant, so you have it done illegally.

3) Suppose you are a prominent citizen, and your teenage daughter becomes pregnant. You wish to avoid scandal. Hospital procedures are available to her. You cannot, however, take the risk of disclosure. You have it done in the privacy of an illegal situation.

4) Suppose you are poor. Perhaps your man has left you. There is a long waiting list at the public hospital, and much red tape you don't understand. You are frantic to 'get rid of it.' A friend tells you of someone who will. You go there.

"What of England? Hasn't the number of illegal abortions dropped there? The most authoritative report on this was published in the British Medical Journal, May 1970, by the Royal College of Obstetrics and Gynecology, and constituted a summary of the opinions of the consultant obstetricians of England. It said:

'The original protagonists for abortion law reform often argued that a large proportion of

*cases of spontaneous abortions hitherto treated in hospitals and nearly all the associated deaths were the result of criminal interference. Legalization of abortion would, they postulated, eliminate these. They brushed aside contrary arguments and evidence. Our figures show * * * that despite a sharp rise in the number of therapeutic ("legal") abortions from 1968 to 1969, there was not, unfortunately, a significant change in the number of cases of spontaneous abortion requiring admission to hospital.*

'The fact that legalization of abortion has not so far materially reduced the numbers of spontaneous abortions or of deaths from abortions of all kinds is not surprising. It confirms the experience of most countries and was forecast by the College's 1966 statement.' "

Incest And Rape Cause Few Pregnancies.

Willke states:[27] "If a girl is raped or subjected to incestuous intercourse and reports the fact promptly, she is usually taken immediately for medical attention. This consists of a douche, commonly a scraping of the uterus, and at times doses of medication, one or all of which, while done partially to prevent venereal disease, will also almost invariably prevent her from getting pregnant. If the rape victim would report her assault promptly, there would be, for all practical purposes, no pregnancies from rape. . . .

[27] Ibid. pp. 32-36.

"Are there any statistics to support the fact that pregnancy is rare? There have been few good statistical studies in this country. In Czechoslovakia, however, out of 86,000 consecutive induced abortions, only twenty-two were done for rape. This figures out to one in 4,000. At a recent obstetric meeting at a major midwest hospital, a poll taken of those physicians present (who had delivered over 19,000 babies) revealed that not one had delivered a bona fide rape pregnancy. . . .

"Unquestionably, many would want her to destroy the growing baby within her. But before making this decision, remember that most of the trauma has already occurred. She has been raped. That trauma will live with her all of her life. Furthermore, this girl did not report for help but kept this to herself. For several weeks she thought of little else as the panic built up. Now she has finally asked for help, has shared her upset, and should be in a supportive situation.

"The utilitarian question from the mother's standpoint is whether or not it would now be better to kill the developing baby within her. But will abortion now be best for her, or will it bring her more harm yet? What has happened and its damage has already occurred. She's old enough to know and have an opinion as to whether she carries a 'baby' or a 'blob of protoplasm.'

"Will she be able to live comfortably with the memory that she killed her developing baby? Or would she ultimately be more mature and more at peace with herself if she could remember that, even though she was unwillingly pregnant, she nevertheless gave her child life and a good home (perhaps through adoption).

"Even from only the mother's standpoint, the choice is one which deserves the most serious deliberation, and no answer is easy or automatically right."

And, finally, isn't it a twisted logic that would kill an innocent unborn baby for the crime of his father!

Abortion On Demand Does Not Fulfill The Requirements For A Good Law Dealing With A Complex Social, Biological, Economic, And Moral Issue.

Congressman Lawrence Hogan has defined requirements of a good abortion law.[29]

"First, it should reflect the best medical and scientific judgment available. We deal with human life at its beginning. If the physicians and scientists tell us–as they do–that the fetus, at say, 15 weeks, is definitely a human person, how can we kill that human person without guilt? . . .

"Second, a good law does not help solve one social problem by creating others. Besides the problem of the unborn, unwanted child, we have the problem of 'back-alley' abortions and the problem of death or injury to the aborting mother through improper surgical techniques. The New York experience since last July indicates that a so-called 'liberalized' abortion bill does not solve these: it creates an 'abortion mentality' which fosters thousands of unnecessary abortions and it appears there have been more deaths than before, rather than fewer. We should not go down New York's road until we have time to study and see where that road leads. . . .

"Third, a good law should harmonize the rights of all interested parties. Here the proposed bill completely overlooks the uncontroverted fact that the child in the womb is not just a growth in someone's body, like tonsils or an appendix, but is a real human being who, in my opinion, has the right to life. . . . .

"Fourth, a good law should not foster crimes or put honest people into impossible crises of conscience. Under similar laws in other states and in England, frequently an intended abortion results in the birth of a living child. Nurses are told to put him into a bucket and toss him into the incinerator. Thus the public policy of the given jurisdiction actually promotes what its laws define as manslaughter—and requires conscientious hospital personnel to witness or even help in the killing of a living human being, contrary to all their training, instincts, and moral convictions.

"Fifth, a good law respects the common morality of a pluralistic community. We are not talking about contraception here; we are talking about killing . . . ."

Even the pro-abortion California Medical Association (supra) admits that the idea of killing is presently socially abhorrent and that "semantic gymnastics are required to rationalize abortion."[30]

A High Abortion Rate Correlates With A High Suicide Rate.

Both in European and non-European nations, those countries having the largest numbers of abortions have the highest numbers of suicides. Among the non-European nations, Japan appears to have the largest number and rate of abortions. Ceylon appears to have the highest average death rate from abortions of those countries publishing rates.[31] Among the approximately 40 non-European nations publishing suicide rates, Japan and Ceylon have the highest two suicide rates.[31] Statistics are not complete enough to draw further conclusions for non-European nations.

Among those European nations listing their suicide rates,[31] eight–Bulgaria, Czechoslovakia, Denmark, Finland, Hungary, Norway, Poland and Sweden–have relatively permissive abortion laws.[32]

The eight permissive abortion European nations have suicide rates about 80% higher than the other European nations. While suicide correlates very closely with abortions in European nations, it correlates slightly or not at all with climate, longitude, latitude, economic development, mountains or Communism. (While the four Communist nations have high suicide rates, all four are permissive abortion nations and their suicide rates are comparable to those of non-Communist permissive abortion nations.)

Here in the United States there is some basis for the belief that a low value on life—caused in part by young people believing that they themselves are unwanted, because of an abortion mentality creeping into society—is increasing our suicide rate and our drug-use rate.[33]

Permissive Abortion Laws Might Increase Venereal Disease Damage.

1967 United States Vital Statistics[34] indicate that syphilis and related diseases kill far more Americans annually than pregnancy and abortion combined. If a permissive abortion law causes even a slight percentage increase in venereal disease annually, it may cause far more physical harm and misery than that presently caused by the non-termination of unwanted pregnancies.

Dr. Geoffrey Simmons, an originator of the campaign sponsored by the Los Angeles County Health Department, Citizens for Eradication of Syphilis and Council of Free Clinics, has said[35] that even with the most effective preventive means, the condom, there is a ten per cent chance of infection from relations with partners having syphilis, but that most people use birth prevention means such as the pill which are not effective in preventing VD. "About half a million men and women have syphilis in the United States and don't know it . . . . The tragedy is that VD already is out of control and indications are that the current epidemic will get worse. . . . [D]rugs now being used are beginning to fail." He predicts that by 1975 instead of 2 million venereal disease cases in the country there will be 5 million, "barring some scientific discovery or strong preventive measures assumed on an individual basis by the population at large. . . . More than 100,000 persons who have syphilis will either have severe heart disease, be insane, paralyzed or dead from this disease."

The Abortionists Have Interpreted United States v. Vuitch, 91 S.Ct. 1294, 28 L.Ed.2d 601 (1971), As Permitting Abortion On Demand.[36]

A close reading of the Washington, D. C. newspapers or contact with the abortion referral agencies and abortionists in Washington, D. C., since the Vuitch decision was made public in April 1971, should be sufficient to convince the Court that the practical effect of the Court's Vuitch decision has been abortion on demand, which has stripped the unborn of all protection in Washington, D. C.

The Abortionists Interpret "Abortion For Mental Health Reasons" To Mean Abortion On Demand.

In California, for example, the ratio of abortions performed to applications in 1970 was 99%[37]–not a bad percentage considering that 1% of the women might change their minds. Ninety-eight per cent of the 1970 abortions were based on preserving the mental health of the woman. In California, "mental health" should mean "mental illness to the extent that the woman is dangerous to herself or to the person or property of others or is in need of supervision or restraint."[38]

[36] Life In America, May 1971, p. 2.

The number of abortions in California in 1970 was nearly 70,000. It is unreasonable to assume that all of these women in California think they have mental health problems sufficient to fall within the definition of California Health & Safety Code section 25954, and that 99% of these women are accurate in their analysis. If that were true, a significant number of women would be receiving mental health care after their abortion. In fact, there are no records indicating post-abortion mental-health care for any significant number of women receiving abortions in California or elsewhere. The mental health provision is an example of form over substance. The women say the magic words, "mental health," and pay their money and the doctor performs the abortion. KABC-TV[39] indicated the lack of respect the abortionists have for the limitations in the California abortion law as follows, "Yet doctors will tell you that any woman who wants an abortion can now secure one legally and safely in this state." Since doctors can earn hundreds of dollars each few minutes by performing abortions if they have a sufficient number of applicants for abortion, and a relatively small number of doctors can do a large number of abortions, it is not surprising that doctors in California have approved 99% of abortion applications for mental health reasons.

Amicus submits that if the Court wishes to give the unborn any significant protection, the Court must close the loophole the abortionists have read in to Vuitch. Amicus further submits that it is poor public policy to permit lawbreakers to force a change in the law by continually breaking the law.

CONCLUSION

In other nations and in other areas of United States law, the Right to Life is not extinguished by someone else's Right to Privacy. There are strong forces working to further diminish the Right to Life, so that if the Court takes this first step, nobody may be able to stop additional steps which may destroy the Right to Live of everyone. A 10-ounce child has survived premature birth, while 60-ounce children are being deliberately killed. Abortion causes far more harm to the mothers than continuation of the pregnancy would have caused, on the average. Abortion has not been made desirable by a change in people's beliefs. Abortion is unlikely to reduce the number of battered children. Rejection of the child is common early in pregnancy, when the woman must decide whether to abort, but nearly always disappears before birth of the formerly unwanted child. The first step of abortion has in the recent past logically led to catastrophic erosion of the Right to Life. Permissive abortion laws do not decrease the criminal abortion rate. Rape and incest cause few pregnancies, and pregnancy from rape and incest can easily be prevented without abortion. Abortion on demand does not fulfill the general requirements for good law. European nations having permissive abortion laws have nearly twice the suicide rate of nations having strict abortion laws. Permissive abortion laws may cause far more damage from venereal disease than is caused by unwanted pregnancies. Abortionists have interpreted Vuitch so as to destroy all protection for the unborn. Abortionists interpret "abortion for mental health reasons" as abortion on demand.

MOTION FOR LEAVE TO FILE A BRIEF AS AMICUS CURIAE

Robert L. Sassone hereby respectfully moves for leave to file a brief amicus curiae in this case. The consent of the attorneys for the parties has not been obtained. This brief is identical to that filed by Robert L. Sassone in Roe v. Wade, No. 70-18.

The interest of Robert L. Sassone in this case arises from the fact that he is the President of LIFE (League for Infants, Fetuses, and the Elderly, an organization of over a thousand individuals, including many clergymen, doctors and attorneys). The members of LIFE fear that declaring abortion control laws unconstitutional may lead to lessened respect for the value of human life.

Certain of the individual members of LIFE have examined certain of the recent lower court decisions and briefs relating to the constitutionality of abortion control laws. These examinations have indicated that certain statistical, medical and sociological arguments by defendants have not been answered, or that the answers have omitted important data. In addition, arguments in favor of the right to live of the unborn have omitted important data. The rights of the unborn are relevant in determining the constitutionality of the abortion control law in question, because abortion involves a balancing of rights, not a mere consideration of only the rights of the mother.

The present brief sets forth data in short sections which may be read separately if the Court feels that the data in any of the individual sections is relevant and not adequately set forth elsewhere.

Respectfully submitted,

ROBERT E. DUNNE,

Attorney for Amicus Curiae.

BRIEF OF AMICUS CURIAE ROBERT L. SASSONE IN SUPPORT OF RESPONDENT

The Powers Of A Sovereign State Include The Power To Limit The Reasons For Abortion.

Nearly every nation at some time or other has forbidden or strictly limited the power of a woman to obtain an abortion. The Tenth Amendment states: "The powers not delegated to the United States by the Constitution, nor prohibited by it to the states, are reserved to the states respectively, or to the people." Accordingly, unless it is shown that the Constitution prohibits states from limiting the reasons for abortion, the states have that power. Those nations, such as England, which respect rights not enumerated in a formal constitution afford a precedent for the scope of protection which should be afforded women seeking an abortion because of a right to privacy guaranteed by the Ninth Amendment, since the Ninth Amendment reserves to the people those rights of the people not enumerated in the Constitution. A search of the laws of other nations has not indicated any other nation which has defined the inherent rights of the people to include a right to privacy in women sufficiently broad to prevent the state from regulating the reasons for obtaining an abortion.

In Areas Other Than Abortion The Right To Privacy Is A Relative Right, Not An Absolute Right.

Numerous examples in Tort and Criminal Law indicate that the right to privacy is a relative right.[1] A woman cannot in privacy, even though she harm no other person, legally utilize or even possess certain forbidden drugs such as LSD or heroin. The right to privacy was considered a mere relative right by the framers of the Constitution. Had they not considered the right to privacy a mere relative right, they would not have carefully defined additional protection for the small portion of the right to privacy protected by the guarantee against unreasonable search and seizure.

The Right To Life Is The Most Nearly Absolute Right.

The right to life forms the foundation for nearly all other rights. Remove the right to life and the other rights become valueless. The preciousness of this right to the unborn may be surmised from the following:

"We hold these truths to be self-evident; that all men are created equal, that they are endowed by their Creator with certain inalienable rights, that among these rights are life . . . that to secure these rights, governments are instituted among men . . . . " Declaration of Independence.

"Nor shall any state deprive any person of life, liberty, or property without due process of law, nor deny to any person within its jurisdiction that equal protection of the laws." Fourteenth Amendment, Constitution of the United States.

"The child, by reason of his physical and mental immaturity, needs special safeguards and care, including appropriate legal protection, before as well as after birth." Declaration of the Rights of a Child, General Assembly of the United Nations, November 20, 1959.

In Areas Other Than Abortion The Right To Privacy Is Insufficient Reason To Take The Life Of Another Human Being.

In areas other than abortion the right to privacy does not give the right to take the life of another human, even an invading inferior human being. There is a dispute as to the seriousness of the imposition on the woman by her unborn baby. The extent of the woman's right to privacy should be determined in part by the seriousness of the invasion of that right to privacy. Analogous in some ways to the invasion of a mother's body by an unwanted unborn baby is the invasion of a building by a trespasser or a petty thief, where the thief's right to live is protected. "But spring guns and other man-killing devices are not justifiable against a trespasser or even a petty thief."[2]

When we apply the well-tested common law policy relating to traps to abortion, we find that the case for the preservation of life is stronger in many ways in the case of abortion, where the baby is invited in by actions by the woman.

In the case of the traps, the person whose right to privacy is being invaded is entirely powerless to prevent the invasion in many cases, since the measures necessary to make property thief-proof cost more than most persons can afford. In the case of abortion, the mother not only has the power to prevent the pregnancy, she had to actively participate in a sexual act before the conception could occur. In addition, after participating, she had to refrain from taking steps, such as a morning-after pill or D & C, to prevent implantation. In the case of traps, the protected invader of privacy may well be guilty of a criminal act, yet he still is protected. In the case of abortion, the victim is personally entirely innocent, regardless of the acts of his parents.

Burden And Degree Of Proof.

Whenever a human being is faced with the legal loss of his life, the burden of proof that that person should lose his life lies with those who are attempting to take his life, and the burden of proof is not a mere preponderance of the evidence. The Court should not do less in the case of innocent unborn humans than it does for more mature humans who are accused of serious crimes. Before defining the law to permit the killing of millions of unborn children, the Court should require the pro-abortionists to prove their case beyond a reasonable doubt.

The Scope Of The Right To Privacy In The Area Of Abortion Should Be Determined In Part By Comparing The Conflicting Rights And By Determing The Results Likely To Follow If Various Alternatives Are Adopted.

The issue of abortion is more than a question of the freedom of a woman to control the reproduction functions of her body. It is also a question of those circumstances under which a human being may be permitted to take the life of another. Granting an absolute right to aborton because of the right to privacy will cause abortion on demand to exist, the advantages and disadvantages of abortion on demand may be analyzed in part by analyzing the experience of the large nations which have had sufficiently large volume of abortions over a sufficiently long period of time under carefully monitored conditions.

Loosening Abortion Laws May Have Significant Unforeseen Future Effects.

In Ballard v. Anderson, 4 Cal.3d 873, 484 P.2d 1345, 95 Cal.Rptr. 1 (1971), the California Supreme Court ruled that the 1967 California Abortion Law permits a minor of any age to get an abortion without parental knowledge or consent, a result not mentioned during debate in 1967. A New York court has held that New York cannot limit medicaid for abortions to abortions for medical reasons.[3] Neither of these events were foreseen or discussed at the time the respective abortion laws were being discussed. Declaring abortion laws unconstitutional may cause unforeseen, possibly unwanted, future events. Will a 12 or 13 year old girl then have the right to become pregnant and to get an abortion without parental knowledge and consent, such as happened in California? If the minor is permitted to get an abortion, does not her right to privacy give her a right to be sterilized without parental knowledge or consent? Will not more unborn Americans be executed in a relatively few years than the number of Jews by the Nazis? Will not a woman, have a right to deliberately conceive a child, then kill that child by means of abortion, for purposes such as toxicity tests? It is probable that the unforeseen results from giving a woman an absolute right to privacy in the area of abortion will be far more imaginative than the few possibilities suggested herein. If the Court permits abortion for no reason, where will it logically be able to draw a line when the same anti-life arguments are extended?

Abortion Is Only The Opening Wedge Of A Broad Based Attack On The Right To Live.

The scope and severity of the attacks on the right to live are such that if the right to live is destroyed in a particular small area, it may be impossible to prevent the right to live from being destroyed in other areas. HB 3184, prefiled October, 1969, by Representative Sackett in Florida, and introduced annually since, would permit three doctors and one judge to order the execution of persons they felt deserving of execution. SB 1421-70, introduced by Nadao Yoshinaga, February 4, 1970, in Hawaii, the week after Hawaii passed its aborton-on-demand law, provides that every woman giving birth to her second child must be sterilized regardless of her opinions or belief or those of her doctor. These two bills, if passed, would make legal in America a large percentage of the actions of the Nazis which were labeled atrocities in the 1940's. There is sufficient pressure, however, to go far beyond these two bills in America today. The California Medical Association has stated in an an editorial: "The traditional western ethic has always placed great emphasis on the intrinsic worth and equal value of every human life regardless of its stage or condition . . . . This traditional ethic is still clearly dominant, but there is much to suggest that it is being eroded at its core and may eventually even be abandoned . . . . It will become necessary and acceptable to place relative rather than absolute values on such things as human lives . . . . The process of eroding the old ethic and substituting the new has already begun. It may be seen most clearly in changing attitudes toward human abortion. In defiance of the long held Western ethic of intrinsic and equal value for every human life regardless of its stage, condition or status, abortion is becoming accepted by society as moral, right and even necessary . . . . Since the old ethic has not yet been fully displaced it has been necessary to separate the idea of abortion from the idea of killing, which continues to be socially abhorrent. The result has been a curious avoidance of the scientific fact, which everyone really knows, that human life begins at conception and is continuous whether intra- or extra-uterine until death. The very considerable semantic gymnastics which are required to rationalize abortion as anything but taking a human life would be ludicrous if they were not often put forth under socially impeccable auspices. It is suggested that this schizophrenic sort of subterfuge is necessary because while a new ethic is being accepted the old one has not yet been rejected. . . . Medicine's role with respect to changing attitudes toward abortion may well be a prototype of what is to occur . . . . One may anticipate further development of these roles as the problems of birth control and birth selection are extended inevitably to death selection and death control whether by the individual or by society."[4]

[4]California Medicine, September 1970, pp. 67, 68.

Whether it be best sellers such as "Population Bomb," which likens human beings to a cancer which must be removed–even though the operation will require many cruel and apparent heartless decisions, TV talk shows, magazine articles[5], or talks at schools, etc., general principles are being proposed for America today which are broad enough to encompass most of the worst acts of the Nazis. It is very possible that today in America the right to live may be whittled away by a series of small steps, each justified for varying reasons, so that the sum result of all those steps will be undesirable. The first and most difficult step is to establish in the law, as the Court is being asked to do in this case, that a certain class of human beings are subhumans whose lives may be taken with no more justification than needed to step on an ant. Once that first large step is taken, and the right to privacy becomes a license to kill, the subsequent small steps may come easily, rapidly and inevitably.

The Protection Of The Right To Life Should Be Based On Current Medical Knowledge (Which Indicates That A 10-Ounce Child Can Survive), Not Medical Knowledge Hundreds Of Years Old.

All would agree that "shooting or otherwise damaging a corpse is not homicide."[6] An apparently drowned child would have been pronounced dead in years past, and a court in those days would exonerate from homicide one who cut off the child's head a moment after the heart stopped. Would this be just today, when we have modified the definition of a corpse because of advances in techniques for life revival, restoration and resuscitation, such as artificial respiration, open heart massage, transfusions, transplants, and a variety of life-restoring stimulants, drugs and new surgical methods.

The "quickening" barrier for fetus survival was long ago broken. In the 1930's, a ten-ounce premature infant survived its early birth to grow to become a normal size adult.[7] This Court should not disregard the medicine of the 1930's and hold that a woman's right to privacy gives her a license to kill her unquickened unborn child because that child would have been too small to have survived in 1600. Nor should this Court rule that a nine-ounce child can be killed by its mother, because the "nine-ounce barrier" for premature infants is no more sacred than the "four-minute mile barrier" was for runners.

Experiments going back into the early 1960's[8] have indicated that artificial wombs for unborn humans are only a matter of time. It is expected that before the present decade ends,[9] that is, sometime before 1980, any unborn human being, perhaps even those weighing less than one ounce, old enough to have developed a placenta, may be removed from its mother, placed in an artificial liquid environment, fed food and oxygen from a heart-lung machine through its placenta, and enabled to develop until it can breathe and eat like a normal newborn child. This year, in Sydney, Australia, Richard Brodrick, a child only six inches long, nearly survived.[10] In a matter of a few short years, any woman wishing to terminate an early pregnancy will be able to terminate the pregnancy without the death of the child. The doctor will be able to carefully remove the placenta and child and give the child a chance to live, if the law protects the child.

" 'Responsible' physicians would hope not to abort a mother whose baby would be over one pound. But - - one of our colleagues recently witnessed a four pound baby killed by the salt method and delivered stillborn. Another practice is that of some so-called physicians in New York City and elsewhere of injecting salt solution and immediately sending the mother home. Within two weeks in Cincinnati two babies weighing three-and-a-fourth and three-and-three-fourths pounds were delivered dead from mothers who had had this procedure."[11]

Unless it sustains strong abortion laws, the Court will, in effect, make a new legal definition–the subhuman who can be killed with impunity. It will then be much easier to increase the scope and variety of those innocents falling within the "subhuman class" than it was to establish the first class of innocent, legal subhumans.

[11] "Handbook On Abortion," Dr. & Mrs. J. C. Willke, Hiltz Publishing Co., 1971, p. 29.

Abortion Has Caused Emotional Disturbance In Non-Christian Japan Among About 80% Of Aborton Patients.[12]

"The average of six surveys in Japan indicates that most women with abortion experience do not approve of it without reserve. The 1963 survey by the Aichi Committee on the Eugenic Protection Law indicates that 73.1% of the women who experienced abortion felt 'anguish' about what they did. In the 1964 survey of Dr. Kaseki, 59% responded that they felt abortion was something 'very evil' and only 8% said they don't think it should be called something bad. In the Gamagori City survey, 65% had some reason to be sorry. In the 1968 survey of the Nagoya City area, 67% of the women responded that they felt the fetus is an individual human being from the beginning, not a part of the mother. 42% of the women in the survey responded that abortion is not good. In addition another 57% that it is not good but it couldn't be helped; and only 1% didn't know whether to call it bad or good. In the 1969 survey by the Prime Minister's Office, 88% answered that abortion is bad, or it is not good but cannot be helped.

"In the 1965 Mainichi survey, only 18% responded that they 'did not feel anything in particular' when they experienced abortion for the first time; 35.3% felt 'sorry about the fetus'; 28.1% felt they did something wrong; 4.3% worried about fecundity impairments; 6.5% had other answers, and 7.9% did not answer." Ibid.

12. "Japan's 22 Year Experience With A Liberal Abortion Law," Dr. Yokichi Hayasaka, et al., p. 4.

In Japan, The Physical Abnormality Rate Following Abortion Has Been About 29%.

"All public opinion surveys taken indicate that several million women in Japan believe that their health has been harmed by abortion; that is, legal abortion. The surveys cover a total of 16-17 million married women, not counting the unmarried, among whom many have also experienced abortion. If roughly half of them have experienced at least one abortion (which is a conservative estimate); and if 30% of them have adverse health effects as a result, the number of women affected is already above 2.5 million; there are more if we also count the unmarried, and those who have moved into the higher age categories.

"This appears to be the picture which emerges from the public opinion surveys. In the 1959 Mainichi survey, 28.4% of those who had abortion reported 'some kind of bad effect'; in the 1963 Aichi survey, 13% indicated damage from the operation; in the 1964 Welfare Ministry survey, 24.1% indicated that they were physically unwell since the operation; in the 1965 Mainichi survey, 18.5% indicated (after only one abortion) that they were physically unwell after the operation; in the 1968 Nagoya survey by Women's Associations, 59% indicated that they were severely troubled with adverse after-effects, or in less good health; and in the 1969 survey of the Office of the Prime Minister, 31% indicated that some kind of physical abnormality came about as a result of abortion; this averages to 29% in the six surveys; not counting those who did not reply to this question.

ed: 18.5% indicate that they were physically unwell after one operation; 22.7% after two; 40.4% after three; 51.7% after four operations. . . .

"The 1969 survey of the Office of the Prime Minister indicates the following list of complaints: 9.17% sterility (after 3 years); 14.8% habitual spontaneous abortion; 3.9% extra-uterine pregnancies; 17.4% menstrual irregularities; 20% abdominal pains; 19.7% dizziness; 27.2% headache; 3.5% frigidity; 13.5% exhaustion; 3.6% neurosis.

"Even though the operating physician performs everything normally the woman experiences a sudden change from the pregnant state to the non-pregnant state. Her body has been functioning at high capacity to provide nourishment for the developing fetus and to dispose of wastes. When the fetus is wrenched out of her body, the reason for this prodigious physical activity is suddenly removed. Dr. Y. Moriguchi compares it to slamming emergency brakes on a train which is going at full speed (Katorikku Shingaku, Jochi University, II, II, 4, pp. 353-362). As a result the syndrome of the unbalanced sympathetic nervous system may appear (see Dr. Nakatsu "Mistakes in Abortion and Prognosis" in OBSTETRICS AND GYNECOLOGY, Sept. 1960, pp. 53-59)."[13] states: "And from what they answered, it appears the 1970's woman is as straitlaced as ladies of Victoria's day . . . . 65% of the women interviewed think premarital sex is immoral. More astounding, 54% of the men think so, too.

"Also shot down as socially unacceptable: trial marriages (77% of the women oppose and 69% of the men) and bearing children out of wedlock (85% of the women, 82% of the men oppose). In fact, 89% of the women and 87% of the men think society would fall apart without the institution of marriage."

Permissive Abortion Laws Are Unlikely To Reduce The Numbers Of Battered Children.

". . . Dr. Edward Lenoski, Professor of Pediatrics at the University of Southern California, did a four-and-a half year study of 400 battered children. He determined that 90% of the battered children in his study were planned pregnancies. Ninety per cent is far above average for planned pregnancies. Most of our readers undoubtably deeply cherish and love the children that they have been given. How many of you, however, actually planned the conception of 90% of them? We could apparently kill all 'unwanted' babies in the early stages of pregnancy, but still not significantly reduce the numbers of battered children.

"Dr. Lenoski has also determined that since the advent of the contraceptive pill (which has certainly reduced unwanted pregnancies), child beating is up threefold."[15]

Deaths From Pregnancy Are Not Sufficient Reason To Forbid Abortion Limitation Laws.

United States Vital Statistics indicate a death rate per pregnancy caused by deliveries and complications of pregnancy, childbirth and the pur perium of 28 per hundred thousand in 1967. Some mothers, however, have less than adequate medical care during pregnancy. The true risk of pregnancy, given mediocre medical care, is probably closer to 10 deaths per hundred thousand births. United States Vital Statistics indicate that the death rate per hundred thousand live births among white New England women during 1965-67 was 10.8 per hundred thousand live births. The death rate among women receiving inadequate medical care is probably 5 to 10 times as high or perhaps even higher, as can be seen by the nationwide non-white death rate of 69.5 per hundred thousand live births in 1967. Those white women in New England who did not receive adequate medical care probably had a death rate far higher than 10 per hundred thousand live births, although no such statistics are available in the United States Vital Statistics. Accordingly, the death rate per hundred thousand live births for women receiving adequate medical care was probably less than 10 per hundred thousand live births in the period 1965-67. In addition, the long term trend in death rates from pregnancy since the 1920's has been a reduction by more than 50% in the death rate from pregnancy each 10 years. There is some evidence that the long term trend is slowing down, but if it holds, the death rate for women receiving adequate medical care in the years 1973-75 will be about 5 per 100,000 live births.

In comparing the death rates caused by abortion and pregnancy, it should be noted that in the case of legal abortions, the woman is generally given what is considered to be adequate medical care. Accordingly, no improvement in medical care based on today's knowledge is likely to significantly reduce the death rate from abortion.

While United States Vital Statistics list nearly 1,000 deaths from pregnancy and related causes in 1967 and 1968, with only 130 deaths from abortion in 1968 and 160 in 1967, abortion is not thereby shown to be safer. The pregnancy death quantities are deceivingly high because all abortion deaths are included in maternal mortality figures, as well as a number of women who die during or after pregnancy of kidney disease, high blood pressure, and stroke conditions that might have claimed them whether they were pregnant or not. In addition, the risk from one pregnancy is spread over about 12 months. If aborted, the woman may become pregnant again soon, as indicated by the following table by KOYA, MURAMATSU, Bulletin of the Institute of Public Health, (Japan) IV, No. 1-2, Sept. 1954, for women not using contraceptives.

Months	Percentage Pregnant
	After abortion	After childbirth
3	19.2% (448)	0.0% (354)
6	32.8%	2.5%
9	43.5%	8.5%
12	50.0%	16.9%
15	60.0%	26.3%

The Woman's Health Is Not A Justification For Abortion.

The experience of nearly every area where comprehensive statistics have been kept indicates that abortion is far more likely to cause death, emotional harm, mental harm, and physical harm to the woman than continuation of the pregnancy.[16] Willke lists Sweden's abortion death rate at 40 per hundred thousand, England's at 75 per hundred thousand, and points out that Maryland's initial rate the first year was 77 per hundred thousand and New York's is low because of the women who go home to die. They also point out why the low abortion death rates from Communist nations are "worse than useless"(p. 64).

The reasons why abortion causes mental harm to the mother have been stated by Conrad W. Baars, M.D.[17], who stated that a woman who is pregnant and has an abortion is going to be deprived of the most important psychological help, namely, the love of her child; they frequently think it will help, but it is actually pushing them back into loneliness; the essence of love is the affirmation of another, nothing is less affirming than the denial of the child by abortion which kills another human; the strong disaffirming of another, who is closer to her at that time than anyone else, can have strong adverse effects.

Hilgers has stated:[18] "In Colorado, 71.5% of all abortions are being done for psychiatric reasons. The similar figures for California (1969) and Oregon are 90% and 97% respectively." (Note: In 1970 in California the rate went to 98%. See infra.) Hilgers continues:

"One would get the impression that mental illness in the pregnant woman is extremely common and very serious when present. However, in fact, in all of these states, the 'mental helath' clause has distinctly been abused. This abuse, Doctor Cavanaugh says, has led to a decline in the quality of patient care and a gross dishonesty in medical practice–particularly psychiatry. We must, therefore, look carefully at the psychiatric problems associated with pregnancy.

"Noyes and Kolbe's textbook of psychiatry states that 'experience does not show that pregnancy and the birth of the child influence adversely the course of schizophrenia, manic depressive illness or the majority of psychoneuroses.' On the other hand, those psychoses which are initiated by pregnancy rarely persist. Patients tend to recover after a comparatively short period of time and in some cases may recover spontaneously before full term is reached. Women who show permanent impairment of mentality following childbirth belong to the class of potentially psychotic for whom pregnancy is merely an ancillary factor in the pathogenesis of the psychosis. In such women, an induced abortion cannot be curative and it may have unresolved conflicts with guilt and added depression which is more harmful than the continuation of the pregnancy–(see section on complications–psychiatric sequelae).

"There is evidence to suggest that serious mental disorders arise following abortion more often in women with real psychiatric problems and that paradoxically, the very

women for whom legal abortion may seem justifiable are also the ones for whom the risk is highest for post-abortion psychic insufficiency.

"It should be pointed out that suicide in the pregnant woman is extremely rare. In fact, it is about 1/6th the rate seen in nonpregnant women of the same age. Furthermore, as Asche pointed out, it is virtually impossible to ascertain accurately whether a woman is suicidal. In the State of Minnesota, the Minnesota Maternal Mortality Committee, reported only 14 suicides associated with pregnancy in well over 1.5 million live births between 1950-1966. (The Minnesota Maternal Mortality Committee studies in detail all deaths in women which occur during pregnancy or within a period 90 days following delivery). Ten of these 14 had delivered before the suicide, and all 14 were married. In retrospect, these deaths probably could have been prevented if adequate psychiatric care had been obtained and utilized. The explanation of why so few pregnant women commit suicide appears to be that women–including the unwed–receive a good deal more attention from society when pregnant than when not pregnant. Also, there may be certain physiologic and instinctive factors which manifest themselves in greater maternal protectiveness.

"Eminent psychiatrists from throughout the world agree that, if all the evidence is taken into careful consideration, few neurotic or psychotic women are ever benefited by termination of pregnancy and that the few that would be are extremely difficult to select.

psychotherapeutic principles. Unfortunately, it is the distressed woman who ultimately faces the full impact of this minimization. She is the one who cries out for help and she is also the one who is turned away."

Even assuming arguendo that abortion helped some types of illness, and abortions for mental health reasons were limited to the mentally ill instead of being used as a vehicle for abortion on demand, difficulties might arise from establishing the principle that the life of one person should depend on the judgment of another person who is mentally ill, because that person is mentally ill.

A Negative Feeling In Early Pregnancy Is Common But Temporary.

Hilgers states:[19] "Based on the knowledge that the majority of women who have a negative or ambivalent reaction to their pregnancy during its early stages do, in fact, as the pregnancy advances, develop a more positive acceptance of the pregnancy, supportive care of the pregnant woman becomes all the more reasonable. Much has been said of the unwanted child, yet the majority of women who expressed ambivalent or rejecting attitudes toward the pregnancy in the early months, now, in the third trimester, express positive, or at least more accepting, attitudes toward the baby.

"Indeed this phenomenon of early rejection and later acceptance has been spelled out by Gardiner in Williams Obstetrics, 13th edition, 1966:

[19] Ibid. pp. 36, 37.

" 'The initial acceptance and adaptation to the pregnancy by the particular patient will depend upon the implications regarding future responsibilities and future personal and intrapersonal relationships engendered by the pregnancy. At that stage (the first three months), the pregnancy exists only as an abstraction and can be accepted or rejected depending upon the character and personal significance of future implications . . . .

" 'So real and life-threatening are these emotional reactions to these women that they not only reject the existence of the pregnancy before they, themselves, are engulfed and destroyed. Under the spell of this distorted thinking and reasoning, the medical hazards of instrumental abortion fade into insignificance.

" 'It is not unusual (however) for women who will become good mothers, or those who have already demonstrated their excellent maternal qualities with their older children, to react initially to the diagnosis of pregnancy with resentment, frustration and depression, only to express strong, genuine, positive feelings of acceptance as the pregnancy advances and fetal movements appear.'

"Considering this, it seems fair to ask what happens if their fearful request for abortion is denied. Hook reported that of 249 women refused an abortion in Sweden, 86% gave birth, 11% had induced abortions (22% had threatened to do so), and 3% had spontaneous abortion. Of this group 12% had threatened suicide but no suicides or suicide attempts occurred. Kolstad reported that of 113 women refused abortion in Norway and who carried the pregnancy to term 84% were glad that the pregnancy was not terminated, 9% were uncertain as to their feelings, and only 7% were discontented. Furthermore, Murdock showed that by supporting pregnant women throughout their pregnancy, the pressures for abortion were significantly decreased. He suggested that the pregnancy carried to term may have been a positive factor in the mother's return to normalcy."

Medical Complications Of Induced Abortion.

Hilgers states:[20] "The American College of Obstetricians - - Gynecologists has stated: 'The inherent risk of a therapeutic abortion are serious and may be life-threatening, this fact should be fully appreciated by both the medical profession and the public. In nations where abortion may be obtained on demand, a considerable morbidity and mortality has been reported.'

"This is suppored by a statement issued by the Royal College of Obstetrician-Gynecologists (Great Britain): 'Those without specialists' knowledge, and these include members of the medical profession, are influenced in adopting what they regard as a humanitarian attitude to the induction of abortion by a failure to appreciate what is involved. They tend to regard induction of abortion as a trivial operation, free from risk. In fact, even to the expert working in the best conditions, the removal of an early pregnancy after dilating the cervic can be difficult, and is not infrequently accompanied by serious complications. This is particularly true in the case of the woman pregnant for the first time. For women who have a serious medical indication for termination of pregnancy, induction of abortion is extremely hazardous and its risks need to be weighed carefully against those involved in leaving the pregnancy undisturbed. Even for the relatively healthy woman, however, the dangers are considerable."

Under the heading "Mortality Rates" Hilgers states:

"Obviously, the worst complication resulting from a legal abortion is death itself. In Table I you will see listed the legal abortion mortality rates for several countries which have eliminated the legal safeguards to abortion. Included also are the 10 maternal deaths which New York City had during the first 3 months following enactment of their law.

"In the majority of countries, including New York State, a woman is more likely to die from legal abortion than she is if she were to carry the pregnancy to term (this is in contradiction to what proponents of abortion would have us believe). It must be emphasized that these figures are for legal abortion, done by licensed physicians in fully accredited medical facilities. The tragedy is that these deaths are preventable simply by having a strong abortion law. In Minnesota, this tragedy is compounded by the fact that there is probably no safer place in the world for a woman to have her baby."

Legal Abortion Mortality Rates

Country/State	Deaths/100,000 legal abortions
Finland	66
Denmark	41.4
New York City	greater than 40
Sweden	39.2
Great Britain	30
Yugoslavia	10
Japan	7
Hungary	7
Czechoslovakia	2.5

"(Those countries with extremely low death rates have laws which generally do not allow abortion after 3 months and, as such, are not comparable to present changes in United States abortion laws.)

"Addendum: Minnesota Maternal Mortality Rate = 14/100,000 live births."

(Note: Willke criticizes the accuracy of the low rates in Communist nations and points out maternal mortality rate includes abortion deaths as well as others which may have happened if the woman were not pregnant, while abortion excludes those who die elsewhere and some of those whose death is caused only indirectly by abortion, such as by hepatitis.)

Hilgers continues: "There are a whole host of major complications resulting from legal abortion which at their worst cause death, but much more frequently result in either temporary or permanent damage to the woman or her offspring. Again, using the world's medical literature as documentation, these complications will be presented in some detail. They will, however, be limited to the 4 main methods through which abortion is procured in the United States: dilation and curettage, suction curettage, saline instillation and hysterotomy.

"Infection–Pelvic infection is a common sequel to legal abortion. While the incidence varies slightly from country to country, consensus reveals an astonishing high rate. (See Table II)."

The Incidence Of Pelvic Infection Following Legal Abortion

% EARLY INFECTION	% LATE INFECTION	METHOD	COUNTRY
5.0	-	D & C	Germany
5.0	15.0	D & C	Czechoslovakia
4.9	-	D & C	Czechoslovakia
4.0-5.0	12-15	D & C	Czechoslovakia
5.0	-	D & C	Rumania
7.0	-	D & C	USSR
2.6	9.7	D & C	Poland
	28.2	D & C	USSR
	12.0	D & C	USSR
2.0	-	D & C	Bulgaria
1.6-2.3	-	Saline	Sweden
15.4	-	Saline	Great Britain
10.4	-	Saline	Japan
1.0	-	Saline	Denmark
2.0	-	Suction	Great Britain
3.9	-	Suction	Czechoslovakia
5.0	-	Suction	Germany
10.0	-	All methods	Great Britain

Hilgers further states: "The incidence appears to be highest 2 - 3 weeks after the abortion at a time when the patient has been lost to follow-up. There is also good evidence to suggest that the young woman pregnant for the first time stands a much greater risk of infection (15.8%).

"These infections are the direct result of the instrumentation involved in the abortive technique and are manifest as salpingitis (infection in the fallopian tubes) or endometritis (infection in the lining of the womb). When out of control, these infections can cause septic shock with rapid death or pelvic thrombophlebitis (inflammation and blood clot formation in the pelvic veins) with sudden death by pulmonary embolus (blood clot from the pelvic veins which dislodges and is carried to the lungs). These infections can also result in sterility because they scar the tubes to a point where they no longer function properly.

"Hemorrhage–Major hemorrhage is another complication and can result in death by exsanguination. Again, the incidence is much too high to be acceptable from a medical standpoint. (See Table III)."

Table III, referred to above, is as follows:

Incidence Of Major Hemorrhage Following Legal Abortion

% MAJOR HEMORRHAGE	METHOD	COUNTRY/STATE
2.3	D & C	Germany
5.0	D & C	Czechoslovakia
8.6	D & C	Rumania
2.6	D & C	Poland
14.2	D & C	USSR
5.9	D & C	Bulgaria
21.0	All methods	Great Britain
8.0	All methods	Colorado
3-7.8	Saline	Sweden
15.4	Saline	Great Britain
3.6	Saline	Japan
2.0	Saline	Denmark
3.8	Suction	Great Britain

Hilgers continues: "To think that this won't happen in Amer'-a is naive. During the first year of Colorado's new abortion law, 8% of patients needed one or more blood transfusions (most of these abortions were done by dilation and curettage, or suction curettage). It should be mentioned that every time a blood transfusion is given, there are certain inherent risks, e.g., allergic reactions and serum hepatitis.

"Uterine Perforation--Perforation of the uterus can occur as a sequel to dilation and curettage. This occurs primarily because the surgeon operates by 'touch' alone and not under direct vision. Secondarily, the pregnant uterus is much softer than the non-pregnant uterus, lending itself to easier perforation. The incidence of perforation throughout the world is presented in Table IV."

The Incidence Of Uterine Perforation As A Result Of Legal Abortion

% PERFORATION	COUNTRY/STATE
0.11-0.28	Germany
0.14-0.80	Poland
0.10-0.18	Rumania
0.45	Czechoslovakia
0.20	Poland
1.2	USSR
0.4	Bulgaria
1.2	Great Britain
1.2	New York City
1.2	Colorado

Hilgers then states: "It is sad to note that New York City and Colorado are both experiencing relatively high rates of uterine perforation (1.2%). If in the process of perforation, the bowel or a blood vessel is torn, overwhelming infection and/or hemorrhage may occur which require an exploratory abdominal operation (30-65% with a perforation will need this operation). Subsequent pregnancy following a perforation is put in jeopardy because the perforation scar may rupture as the uterus expands.

"Menstrual Disturbances–Menstrual disturbances following abortion are not infrequent. (See Table V). This usually means gross irregularity in the appearance of the menstrual period, heavy bleeding with the menses or complete absence of menstruation. These disturbances may persist for many years. They are mostly the result of endouterine adherences or infection. This may lead to a number of more technical problems which need not be detailed here."

The Incidence Of Menstrual Disturbance Following Legal Abortion

% MENSTRUAL DISTURBANCES	COUNTRY/STATE
3.1	Hungary
2.0	Czechoslovakia
1.0	Czechoslovakia
11-12 (5 year follow-up)	USSR
2.2	USSR
5.2	Poland

Under the heading "Subsequent Pathologic Pregnancies" Hilgers states: "Subsequent pregnancies are more often pathologic following abortion and this without question represents one of the most serious complications of induced abortion. The prematurity rate in Czechoslovakia prior to abortion on demand was 5% (not much different from the United States). Several years later, this had increased to 14%. Hungary and Japan have reported similar trends. The incidence in any one individual seems to be well correlated with the number of abortions a woman has; Hungarian studies reveal that the likelihood of premature delivery after one abortion increased to 12%; after two abortions–15%; and after three abortions –24%. It should be pointed out that prematurity is the leading cause of infant death in the United States, and one of the major contributors to mental and motor retardation. The authors are not aware of any studies which have been done regarding psychiatric sequelae following premature birth as the result of a previous abortion, but would suspect a high correlation.

"A number of countries have reported a significant increase in incidence of ectopic pregnancies (pregnancies which occur someplace other than in the womb). In fact, Japan sees ectopic pregnancies in 3.9% of women, which is 4 to 8 times more frequent than in the United States. Ectopic pregnancies are not infrequently life threatening because of rupture and hemorrhage. Again, tubal malfunction secondary to infection seems to be the prime cause.

"Spontaneous abortions and fetal death before the onset of labor are reported to be significantly more common following legal abortion in those countries with weak abortion laws. Complicated labors (prolonged labor, placenta previa, adherent placenta) and excessive bleeding at the time of delivery are also more common when compared to women who have not had legal abortions. These all result in increased obstetrical intervention.

"Transplacental Hemorrhage–It has long been known that a woman who is Rh-negative is very susceptible to a special kind of problem if her consort is Rh-postive. Any given pregnancy may be a stimulus for the mother to develop antibodies against the baby's red blood cells (i.e., she becomes sensitized) so that in a subsequent pregnancy, these antibodies may destroy the baby's red blood cells resulting in an anemia in the unborn child which may be life-threatening. This sensitization occurs through the leakage of the baby's red blood cells into the mother's circulation (transplacental hemorrhage) usually at the time of delivery. Therefore, first born children are rarely affected. In spontaneous abortion, this sensitization rarely occurs.

However, with all methods of induced abortion sensitization has been reported to occur in 3 - 10% of Rh-negative women. Recent advances have allowed us to prevent this complication in 100% of women treated. However, because tests on the fetus cannot be performed to rule out sensitization of the mother, a number of women, who have not become sensitized, will be needlessly subjected to this expensive treatment.

"Sterility–There are a number of complications which do not appear immediately following the abortion. Poland has reported that 6.9% of women were sterile 4 to 5 years after abortion. Japan has reported 9.7% with subsequent sterility on 3 year follow-up and other countries have had similar experience. This appears to be the result of inadequate regeneration of the lining of the womb following dilation and curettage and/or infection as previously mentioned. There is evidence also to suggest that the sterility may have an adverse psychological effect on the woman. As Jeffcoat stated, 'If this happens when a first pregnancy is interrupted for non-recurrent indication, such as rubella or fleeting psychological upset, the situation is tragic.'

"Miscellaneous–A number of miscellaneous complications occur which deserve mention. (1) The Czech's have reported that 33% of patients had decreased sexual libido 9 months after the abortion. Similarly, a study from Poland showed 14% to have decreased libido 4 to 5 years after the abortion. This is theoretically related to the psychotraumatic experience of the interruption and emotional weakness that follows. (2) Changes in the coagulability of the blood following legal abortion, although rare, have been reported. (3) Most pregnancies following hysterotomy will need delivery by Caesarean section to eliminate the possibility of rupture of the hysterotomy scar. (4) Endometreosis is a common sequel to hysterotomy. (5) A particular problem associated with suction curettage appears to be perforation of the bladder.

"Psychiatric Sequelae—The psychiatric sequelae of induced abortion are most difficult to elucidate. Reports on the incidence of emotional difficulties following abortion vary from 0 - 85%. The true figure lies someplace in between. The difficulties appear to be more common in mature and motherly women than in the more immature, psychopathic and unmotherly. This may be because the husband is most often the prime mover to an abortion in the married woman and in the unmarried, parents and friends are prime movers. As previously mentioned, the woman with real psychiatric illness prior to an abortion is at greater risk to develop significant problems post-abortion than is the psychiatrically 'stable' woman.

"Martin Ekblad interviewed 479 women prior to abortion and again 2-1/2 to 3 years later. At follow-up, he found 10% felt the operation unpleasant; 14% had mild self reproach; and 11% had serious self reproach and self regret. This is perhaps the best single study which has been conducted in this area.

"Seigfried, in 1951, studied 61 women, 2 years after abortion, and found 13% to have serious self reproach. Beck, in 1964, studied 50 women 4 months after legal abortion and 9 had suppressed remorse which was expressed as various psychosomatic symptoms such as abdominal discomfort, vomiting, pruritis vulvae, dysmenorrhea, frigidity, headache, insomnia, fatigue, etc. Niswander and Patter-so in 1967 studied 17 women, 8 months post-abortion for rubella. Eleven of the 17 reacted unfavorably and 8 had long term negative experience.

"It would appear that 15 - 25% of all women undergoing legal abortion will have some long term psychologic reaction. According to Helene Deutsch, the pregnant woman can initially deny the unborn child, but once she admits she is pregnant, she feels an unconscious attachment to him. The longer she stays pregnant, the more the child becomes a part of her. As a result, after abortion, many women feel that part of them is gone."

Techniques Of Induced Abortion.

Abortion can best be appreciated by seeing one from over the doctor's shoulder; nevertheless, some of the potential for damage can be understood by reading the following by Hilgers.[21]

"Potts has reported on the many ways of producing an abortion in a pregnant woman, many of them of only theoretical utility. He has described certain medical methods, including agents that destroy the fetus or placenta such as X rays, antimitotics and antimetabolites, together with agents that interfere with the maternal reaction to pregnancy such as monoamine oxidase inhibitors, non-steroidal estrogens, and immunological methods. Recent reports by Karim and Roth-Brandel and others reveal their use of a new abortifacient agent, prostaglandin, which when administered by continuous intravenous drip usually induces premature labor and results in abortion. Its side effects are presently being studied.

"Surgical techniques of abortion are of three general types: (1) scraping out or sucking out the fetus and its membranes from the uterus through the cervix and vagina after the cervix has been dilated with an instrument; (2) stimulation of premature labor and delivery, with or without ensuring the death of the fetus before delivery; and (3) hysterotomy, or direct surgical incision into the uterus with removal of the fetus, membranes and placenta.

"Presently available tests for pregnancy are usually unreliable until at least two weeks after a missed menstrual period, meaning that the human embryo is at least four weeks old when its existence is first discernible. One factor which frequently tends to delay the diagnosis of pregnancy is the slight vaginal bleeding often seen in early pregnancy and which the pregnant woman may mistake for a menstrual period. Another such delaying factor is the more or less constitutional menstrual irregularity which may lead a woman to accept the absence of menstrual period for a month or more.

"During the first twelve weeks of pregnancy, corresponding in practice, therefore, to an embryonic-fetal age of four to twelve weeks, abortionists rely upon dilation of the cervix and sharp curettage alone or suction curettage, which is usually followed by sharp curettage to ensure that no remnants of the fetus are left behind. In this procedure the woman is placed on her back on the operating table, her knees apart and hips and knees bent. She may be given general anesthesia, local anesthesia—by injections alongside the cervix (usually the only pain-sensitive structure involved) or no anesthesia, depending on the size of the uterus and cervix, the ease with which it dilates, the age of the fetus (and therefore its size), and the preference of the operating doctor.

"The vagina is then cleansed with an antiseptic solution. A toothed instrument is clamped onto the cervix which is pulled toward the operator. The canal through the cervix is found with a long thin instrument called a sound, and then widened, usually by passing a series of progressively larger probes or dilators through it until it can admit the sharp curved curette or the tubular suction curette. Curettes for abortion range in size from 3.5 mm to 15 mm or about 1/8 inch to 5/8 inch, the larger sizes being necessary to tear through and scrape or suck out the tissues of the fetus, placenta, and membranes in the later stages of this first twelve week period of gestation. During the period from the fourth through the twelfth week of pregnancy the fetus has grown from 1/5 inch to 3-1/2 inches, has differentiated its organ systems, has arms and legs, has fingers and toes each provided with nails. Centers for bony development have appeared and begun to deposit bone in the skeleton which has been cartilage up to now. It may be of interest to the reader to read from the respected Williams Obstetrics, thirteenth edition, 1966, page 192: 'A fetus born at this time may make spontaneous movements if still within the amniotic sac or if immersed in warm saline.'

"If sharp curettage has been done, the pieces of the fetus with its membranes are placed on a sponge or in a pan and sent to the pathologist for identification. In suction curette equipment there is usually a glass jar placed in line with the suction apparatus so that fetal parts will be trapped and not interfere with the machinery. In this case the glass bottle is simply unscrewed and sent to the pathologist.

"Stimulation of premature delivery, by a variety of means, is the method of choice by those who abort women pregnant for more than twelve weeks. Dilation and curettage is not used after about twelve weeks' gestation because it become prohibitively dangerous due to the larger size of the fetus and uterus, each now with larger blood vessels. The uterine wall is becoming progressively softer and thinner, the more likely to be perforated by a hard instrument. The fetal skeleton is becoming harder and the fetus more difficult to remove.

"Stimulation of effective uterine contractions, essentially the stimulation of premature labor, may be accomplished by injecting a variety of substances into the uterine cavity, either inside of or outside of the fetal membranes themselves. Most commonly used are concentrated salt (abandoned by the Japanese as unsafe after 1950), sugar, and formaldehyde solutions, irritant soaps, pastes, and rivanol (a mild antiseptic widely used in Japan).

"Schiffer has reported on the technic used in 28 abortions ranging from 14 to 24 weeks' gestation. The woman's abdomen was washed and prepared with antiseptic. Then, under local anesthesia a long needle was inserted through the abdominal wall, through the uterine wall and into the amniotic sac surrounding the fetus. As much of the fluid in this sac as possible was withdrawn through the needle, and, when possible, an equal amount of sterile salt solution was then injected and the needle withdrawn. Labor pains began, on the average, 27.5 hours after injection and the fetus was delivered an average of 11 hours later. Some of Schiffer's patients received intravenous oxytocin, a drug used to strengthen uterine contractions, during the abortion. It is noteworthy that the reason that these substances stimulate labor is not yet known.

"During the period from twelve to twenty-four weeks' gestation the fetus grows to be about 13 inches long, weighing 1-1/4 pounds, with hair on its head, wrinkles on its skin and obvious sex organs. Survival of this 24-week size baby, though rare, has been reported.

"The Japanese often use a mechanical means to stimulate the pregnant uterus to start labor in performing mid-trimester abortions. Manabe reported on the use of the metreurynter–a balloon on the end of a flexible tube which is placed through the cervix between the uterine wall and the fetal membranes. The balloon is then filled with 3 to 10 ounces of sterile saline, causing it to become lodged in the uterus. The flexible tube is then hooked up to a pulley system between the woman's legs and a weight of 1 to 2 pounds is attached, exerting downward traction on the cervix. The Japanese feel that this force both dilates the cervix and stimulates the uterus to contract in an effort to expel the balloon and with it the unborn child. The average time from metreurynter inflation to delivery of the fetus–usually alive–varies widely but one report gives this figure to be about 26 hours.

"Manabe states that 'the ultimate aim in abortion is always the most physiologic delivery of the fetus, to ensure the safety of the mother.' He has found that the metreurynter method or the intrauterine instillation of 0.1% rivanol offer many advantages over other methods for mid-trimester abortions because 'they result in a far more physiologic labor, evidenced by the fact that the fetus is normally delivered alive.' He points out that 'most fetuses, however, die shortly after delivery if fetal age is less than the middle of the seventh month. Survival of the fetus even several hours after delivery would pose serious moral and ethical dilemmas.'

"The least frequently used means of producing an abortion is the hysterotomy, which entails incision into the uterus and removal of the fetus. This method is used in pregnancies generally over 14 weeks. It is a major surgical procedure usually done through an abdominal incision. Up to about 16 weeks of pregnancy, it may be done through the vagina. After 16 weeks it is thought to be unsafe vaginally."

Even during early abortions, pieces come out which are obviously parts of what had been a small baby. This fact, and the fact that the purpose of abortion is to kill a human being, have led Dr. Andrew Ivy (Chicago Tribune, May 2, 1970) to point out that he was the expert medical witness at the Nurnberg War Crime Trials; that we are, in many ways, near the stage of respect for human life that Germany was in the mid 1930's; and that abortion may lead us to repeat the German crimes. Dr. Leo Alexander, in the July 14, 1969 New England Journal of Medicine, also pointed out the importance in Nazi Germany of the first small wedged-in lever through the right to life and how this made the following steps logical.

Permissive Abortion Laws Do Not Decrease The Criminal Abortion Rate.

As Table VI, Hilgers has set forth the following information:[22]

COUNTRY/STATE	EFFECT OF CRIMINAL ABORTION RATE
German Democratic Republic	Increased with liberal abortion law
	Decreased with strict abortion law
Japan	No effect
Great Britain	No effect
Yugoslavia	Increased
Hungary	No effect
Czechoslovakia	No effect
Switzerland	No effect
Bulgaria	No effect
Poland	No effect
Colorado	No effect
USSR	No effect

(Note: Similar results have been found for Sweden[23], Denmark[24], and California at least in the initial years[25].)

[24] Shaw, "Abortion On Trial," p. 144.

[25] Dr. Lewis Saylor, State Director of Public Health.

Hilgers continues: "Not one country has seen a decrease in the criminal abortion rate as the result of adopting weak legislation. On the other hand, some countries have actually seen an increase. The German Democratic Republic is a good example. They saw an increase in the criminal abortion rate during the years 1947-1950, a time when they had a relaxed abortion law. In 1950, they adopted a law allowing abortion only for strict medical indications. This was followed by a precipitous fall in the number of criminal abortions.

Willke states:[26] "The prestigious British Medical Journal Lancet, in 1968 in a report entitled 'On the Outcome of Pregnancy When Legal Abortion is Readily Available' stated: 'Sweden's law, in its present form, has not sufficed to subdue criminal abortion.'

"Dr. Christopher Tietze, certainly one of the world's outstanding biostaticians, and a man who incidentally favors legalization of abortion, has written in his report, 'Abortion In Europe:' 'One of the major goals of the liberalization laws in Scandinavia was to reduce illegal abortion. This was not realized. Rather, as we know from a variety of sources, both criminal and total abortions increased. It survives because of the relative lack of privacy of the official procedures. (U.S. Journal of Public Health, Nov. 1967.)

"Was this also true of Japan? Even more so in Japan. Of the 50,000,000 unborn children that have been killed by abortions in the last 22 years in Japan, and where abortions are very inexpensive, a full one-third of the procedures continue to be done illegally.

"What of the United States? What has been our experience to date? There hasn't been too much published because legalized abortion laws are new in our country. Dr. W. Droegemuller in the American Journal of Obstetrics and Gynecology, March 1969, reporting on 'One Year Experience With a Liberalized Abortion Law,' says that, 'This has not reduced the admissions for septic abortions.' Sepsis (infection) is one of the most common complications of criminal abortion, and the number of septic cases admitted post-abortive to a hospital is a fairly good indication in a community of the number of criminal abortions being done.

"But perhaps their laws are too restrictive. What if abortion is completely available at the request of the mother? Wouldn't that eliminate illegal abortion? It didn't in Japan. It hasn't in England nor in any other major country to date.

"What is the reason why illegal abortions are not reduced? Here are some examples:

1) Suppose you are the wife of a man who wants another child. You do not. You become pregnant. If you go through official procedures in a hospital, your husband may find out. You don't want him to know, but you want to get rid of this baby, so you have an illegal abortion.

2) Suppose you are a married woman, and you become pregnant by another man. Your husband has been away, and he knows this would not be his child. Again, he must never know that you've become pregnant, so you have it done illegally.

3) Suppose you are a prominent citizen, and your teenage daughter becomes pregnant. You wish to avoid scandal. Hospital procedures are available to her. You cannot, however, take the risk of disclosure. You have it done in the privacy of an illegal situation.

4) Suppose you are poor. Perhaps your man has left you. There is a long waiting list at the public hospital, and much red tape you don't understand. You are frantic to 'get rid of it.' A friend tells you of someone who will. You go there.

"What of England? Hasn't the number of illegal abortions dropped there? The most authoritative report on this was published in the British Medical Journal, May 1970, by the Royal College of Obstetrics and Gynecology, and constituted a summary of the opinions of the consultant obstetricians of England. It said:

'The original protagonists for abortion law reform often argued that a large proportion of

*cases of spontaneous abortions hitherto treated in hospitals and nearly all the associated deaths were the result of criminal interference. Legalization of abortion would, they postulated, eliminate these. They brushed aside contrary arguments and evidence. Our figures show * * * that despite a sharp rise in the number of therapeutic ("legal") abortions from 1968 to 1969, there was not, unfortunately, a significant change in the number of cases of spontaneous abortion requiring admission to hospital.*

'The fact that legalization of abortion has not so far materially reduced the numbers of spontaneous abortions or of deaths from abortions of all kinds is not surprising. It confirms the experience of most countries and was forecast by the College's 1966 statement.'"

Incest And Rape Cause Few Pregnancies.

Willke states:[27] "If a girl is raped or subjected to incestuous intercourse and reports the fact promptly, she is usually taken immediately for medical attention. This consists of a douche, commonly a scraping of the uterus, and at times doses of medication, one or all of which, while done partially to prevent venereal disease, will also almost invariably prevent her from getting pregnant. If the rape victim would report her assault promptly, there would be, for all practical purposes, no pregnancies from rape. . . .

[27] Ibid. pp. 32-36.

"Are there any statistics to support the fact that pregnancy is rare? There have been few good statistical studies in this country. In Czechoslovakia, however, out of 86,000 consecutive induced abortions, only twenty-two were done for rape. This figures out to one in 4,000. At a recent obstetric meeting at a major midwest hospital, a poll taken of those physicians present (who had delivered over 19,000 babies) revealed that not one had delivered a bona fide rape pregnancy. . . .

"Unquestionably, many would want her to destroy the growing baby within her. But before making this decision, remember that most of the trauma has already occurred. She has been raped. That trauma will live with her all of her life. Furthermore, this girl did not report for help but kept this to herself. For several weeks she thought of little else as the panic built up. Now she has finally asked for help, has shared her upset, and should be in a supportive situation.

"The utilitarian question from the mother's standpoint is whether or not it would now be better to kill the developing baby within her. But will abortion now be best for her, or will it bring her more harm yet? What has happened and its damage has already occurred. She's old enough to know and have an opinion as to whether she carries a 'baby' or a 'blob of protoplasm.'

"Will she be able to live comfortably with the memory that she killed her developing baby? Or would she ultimately be more mature and more at peace with herself if she could remember that, even though she was unwillingly pregnant, she nevertheless gave her child life and a good home (perhaps through adoption).

"Even from only the mother's standpoint, the choice is one which deserves the most serious deliberation, and no answer is easy or automatically right."

And, finally, isn't it a twisted logic that would kill an innocent unborn baby for the crime of his father!

Abortion On Demand Does Not Fulfill The Requirements For A Good Law Dealing With A Complex Social, Biological, Economic, And Moral Issue.

Congressman Lawrence Hogan has defined requirements of a good abortion law.[29]

"First, it should reflect the best medical and scientific judgment available. We deal with human life at its beginning. If the physicians and scientists tell us—as they do—that the fetus, at say, 15 weeks, is definitely a human person, how can we kill that human person without guilt? . . .

"Second, a good law does not help solve one social problem by creating others. Besides the problem of the unborn, unwanted child, we have the problem of 'back-alley' abortions and the problem of death or injury to the aborting mother through improper surgical techniques. The New York experience since last July indicates that a so-called 'liberalized' abortion bill does not solve these: it creates an 'abortion mentality' which fosters thousands of unnecessary abortions and it appears there have been more deaths than before, rather than fewer. We should not go down New York's road until we have time to study and see where that road leads. . . .

[29]Congressional Record, January 29, 1971.

"Third, a good law should harmonize the rights of all interested parties. Here the proposed bill completely overlooks the uncontroverted fact that the child in the womb is not just a growth in someone's body, like tonsils or an appendix, but is a real human being who, in my opinion, has the right to life. . . . .

"Fourth, a good law should not foster crimes or put honest people into impossible crises of conscience. Under similar laws in other states and in England, frequently an intended abortion results in the birth of a living child. Nurses are told to put him into a bucket and toss him into the incinerator. Thus the public policy of the given jurisdiction actually promotes what its laws define as manslaughter–and requires conscientious hospital personnel to witness or even help in the killing of a living human being, contrary to all their training, instincts, and moral convictions.

"Fifth, a good law respects the common morality of a pluralistic community. We are not talking about contraception here; we are talking about killing . . . ."

Even the pro-abortion California Medical Association (supra) admits that the idea of killing is presently socially abhorrent and that "semantic gymnastics are required to rationalize abortion."[30]

A High Abortion Rate Correlates With A High Suicide Rate.

Both in European and non-European nations, those countries having the largest numbers of abortions have the highest numbers of suicides. Among the non-European nations, Japan appears to have the largest number and rate of abortions. Ceylon appears to have the highest average death rate from abortions of those countries publishing rates.[31] Among the approximately 40 non-European nations publishing suicide rates, Japan and Ceylon have the highest two suicide rates.[31] Statistics are not complete enough to draw further conclusions for non-European nations.

Among those European nations listing their suicide rates,[31] eight—Bulgaria, Czechoslovakia, Denmark, Finland, Hungary, Norway, Poland and Sweden—have relatively permissive abortion laws.[32]

The eight permissive abortion European nations have suicide rates about 80% higher than the other European nations. While suicide correlates very closely with abortions in European nations, it correlates slightly or not at all with climate, longitude, latitude, economic development, mountains or Communism. (While the four Communist nations have high suicide rates, all four are permissive abortion nations and their suicide rates are comparable to those of non-Communist permissive abortion nations.)

Here in the United States there is some basis for the belief that a low value on life--caused in part by young people believing that they themselves are unwanted, because of an abortion mentality creeping into society--is increasing our suicide rate and our drug-use rate.[33]

Permissive Abortion Laws Might Increase Venereal Disease Damage.

1967 United States Vital Statistics[34] indicate that syphilis and related diseases kill far more Americans annually than pregnancy and abortion combined. If a permissive abortion law causes even a slight percentage increase in venereal disease annually, it may cause far more physical harm and misery than that presently caused by the non-termination of unwanted pregnancies.

Dr. Geoffrey Simmons, an originator of the campaign sponsored by the Los Angeles County Health Department, Citizens for Eradication of Syphilis and Council of Free Clinics, has said[35] that even with the most effective preventive means, the condom, there is a ten per cent chance of infection from relations with partners having syphilis, but that most people use birth prevention means such as the pill which are not effective in preventing VD. "About half a million men and women have syphilis in the United States and don't know it . . . . The tragedy is that VD already is out of control and indications are that the current epidemic will get worse. . . . [D]rugs now being used are beginning to fail." He predicts that by 1975 instead of 2 million venereal disease cases in the country there will be 5 million, "barring some scientific discovery or strong preventive measures assumed on an individual basis by the population at large. . . . More than 100,000 persons who have syphilis will either have severe heart disease, be insane, paralyzed or dead from this disease."

The Abortionists Have Interpreted United States v. Vuitch, 91 S.Ct. 1294, 28 L.Ed.2d 601 (1971), As Permitting Abortion On Demand.[36]

A close reading of the Washington, D. C. newspapers or contact with the abortion referral agencies and abortionists in Washington, D. C., since the Vuitch decision was made public in April 1971, should be sufficient to convince the Court that the practical effect of the Court's Vuitch decision has been abortion on demand, which has stripped the unborn of all protection in Washington, D. C.

The Abortionists Interpret "Abortion For Mental Health Reasons" To Mean Abortion On Demand.

In California, for example, the ratio of abortions performed to applications in 1970 was 99%[37]–not a bad percentage considering that 1% of the women might change their minds. Ninety-eight per cent of the 1970 abortions were based on preserving the mental health of the woman. In California, "mental health" should mean "mental illness to the extent that the woman is dangerous to herself or to the person or property of others or is in need of supervision or restraint."[38]

[36]Life In America, May 1971, p. 2.

[37]"American Medical News," March 29, 1971, p. 6.

The number of abortions in California in 1970 was nearly 70,000. It is unreasonable to assume that all of these women in California think they have mental health problems sufficient to fall within the definition of California Health & Safety Code section 25954, and that [redacted]% of these women are accurate in their analysis. If that were true, a significant number of women would be receiving mental health care after their abortion. In fact, there are no records indicating post-abortion mental-health care for any significant number of women receiving abortions in California or elsewhere. The mental health provision is an example of form over substance. The women say the magic words, "mental health," and pay their money and the doctor performs the abortion. KABC-TV[39] indicated the lack of respect the abortionists have for the limitations in the California abortion law as follows, "Yet doctors will tell you that any woman who wants an abortion can now secure one legally and safely in this state." Since doctors can earn hundreds of dollars each few minutes by performing abortions if they have a sufficient number of applicants for abortion, and a relatively small number of doctors can do a large number of abortions, it is not surprising that doctors in California have approved 99% of abortion applications for mental health reasons.

[38]California Health & Safety Code section 25954.

[39]In an ad in the weekly TV magazine of the Los Angeles Times, November 8, 1970, p. 17.

Amicus submits that if the Court wishes to give the unborn any significant protection, the Court must close the loophole the abortionists have read in to Vuitch. Amicus further submits that it is poor public policy to permit lawbreakers to force a change in the law by continually breaking the law.

CONCLUSION

In other nations and in other areas of United States law, the Right to Life is not extinguished by someone else's Right to Privacy. There are strong forces working to further diminish the Right to Life, so that if the Court takes this first step, nobody may be able to stop additional steps which may destroy the Right to Live of everyone. A 10-ounce child has survived premature birth, while 60-ounce children are being deliberately killed. Abortion causes far more harm to the mothers than continuation of the pregnancy would have caused, on the average. Abortion has not been made desirable by a change in people's beliefs. Abortion is unlikely to reduce the number of battered children. Rejection of the child is common early in pregnancy, when the woman must decide whether to abort, but nearly always disappears before birth of the formerly unwanted child. The first step of abortion has in the recent past logically led to catastrophic erosion of the Right to Life. Permissive abortion laws do not decrease the criminal abortion rate. Rape and incest cause few pregnancies, and pregnancy from rape and incest can easily be prevented without abortion. Abortion on demand does not fulfill the general requirements for good law. European nations having permissive abortion laws have nearly twice the suicide rate of nations having strict abortion laws. Permissive abortion laws may cause far more damage from venereal disease than is caused by unwanted pregnancies. Abortionists have interpreted Vuitch so as to destroy all protection for the unborn. Abortionists interpret "abortion for mental health reasons" as abortion on demand.

Motion for Leave to File Brief Amici Curiae on Behalf of Women's Organizations and Named Women in Support of Appellants in Each Case.

The individuals and organizations whose names are appended hereto respectfully move for leave to file a brief amici curiae in these cases. Appellants' attorneys in these cases have consented to the filing of this brief. The respective attorneys for each of the appellees and for appellant-intervenor have not so consented.

All the associations listed represent women's groups, which, although they have otherwise diverse activities and aims, share a continuing interest in social problems as they affect women.

The American Association of University Women is an organization of more than 170,000 members, all graduates of accredited colleges and universities. The Association has a long-standing concern with the rights and the advancement of women.

The National Board of the Young Women's Christian Association of the United States of America is entrusted with the continuing work of the National Association, which has been organized "to advance the physical, social, intellectual, moral and spiritual interests of young women." The Association itself is a membership organization wth more than 2½ million members and participants.

The National Organization for Women is a civil rights organization founded in 1966 and with approximately 15,000 members throughout the United States. It is working actively to bring women into the mainstream of American society and in line with that policy, has affirmed its belief that there is a basic human right to limit one's own reproduction.

The National Women's Conference of the American Ethical Union is composed of member delegates (as well as members at large) of the various local Women's Conference organizations, representing approximately 500 women.

The Professional Women's Caucus is an organization of professional women bound together to use their professional skills to advance the status and welfare of all women.

The Unitarian Universalist Women's Federation is an organization of 17,000 church women in the United States and Canada. Its program is broadly concerned with denominational concerns, the rights of women, service projects for children, concern for the aging, peace, and other issues. It has been carrying on an educational program for the abolition of abortion laws for several years.

The Women's Alliance of the First Unitarian Church of Dallas is an organization affiliated with the First Unitarian Church of Dallas which has a general interest in social matters and has been active in conducting studies in the field of abortion.

The individuals whose names are appended hereto are citizens of the United States, and all are women who have achieved recogntion in their respective fields of endeavor, including such diverse areas as literature, anthropology, the creative arts, social research, law, and civic activities.

Each of the individuals and organizations urges upon the Court the position contended for in this brief because of a firm conviction that it is a woman's right, as part of the most elementary concepts of human freedom, dignity and equality, to determine the time when and the circumstances under which she will bear a child. Each of the Amici believes that the full development of an individual woman's potential as a complete human has been and can be thwarted by an inability to make this most fundamental decision for herself, without the imposition of unnecessary state controls—controls which are based on outmoded medical and social theories and which were formulated in periods when women were regarded legally, economically and socially as having a subordinate role in society.

Amici's concern arises from the fact that the assertion by a woman of her fundamental rights conflicts with the laws of nearly all the states which, almost totally in most instances, and in varying degrees of latitude in the others, restrict the grounds upon which a woman can determine the number and spacing of her children, by limiting the circumstances in which a lawful abortion can be performed.

Amici believe that this Court should have before it all expressions concerning the overwhelming importance of the question. Amici urge that this personal right be recognized as constitutionally protected. Having widely observed the effects of existing restrictive laws upon women who have submitted themselves to illegal and unsafe abortions simply because there existed no lawful way in which they can make the choice of when to bear a child, and having widely observed the effects on the persons directly involved, their families and society as a whole where unwanted children are born, Amici are impelled to urge their position on the Court. Amici would not be understood as advocating abortions as being a necessarily desirable solution to particular personal or social problems. We do contend, however, that each woman has the right to make the decision for herself, unimpeded by restrictive laws, except as they demonstrably seek to regulate a matter of legitimate state concern such as the practice of medicine.

We believe that this brief, which reviews the constitutional basis for the conclusion that each woman possesses such a fundamental right in the light of current community standards, will be of assistance to the Court.

For these reasons we respectfully request leave to file the within brief Amici Curiae.

Respectfully submitted,

NORMA G. ZARKY,
Attorney for Movants.

Amici Curiae Brief on Behalf of Women's Organizations and Named Women in Support of Appellants in Each Case.

Opinions Below.

The opinion of the United States District Court for the Northern District of Texas (Roe v. Wade) is reported at 314 Fed. Sup. 1217.

The United States District Court for the Northern District of Texas ruled that the Texas anti-abortion statutes were unconstitutional on their face, being excessively vague and overbroad, but denied any injunctive relief.

The opinion of the United States District Court for the Northern District of Georgia (Doe v. Bolton) is reported at 319 Fed. Sup. 1048.

The United States District Court for the Northern District of Georgia held that the portions of the Georgia abortion laws, which imposed substantive qualifying requirements, were unconstitutional, but the court refused to enjoin future enforcement of those code sections. The remainder of the Georgia abortion statute was held to be valid exercise of state authority and both declaratory and injunctive relief were denied.

Jurisdiction.

By separate orders, both dated April 26, 1971, the question of jurisdiction in each case was postponed to the hearing of the cases on their merits. Jurisdiction of this Court in both cases is founded on 28 USC §1253.

Interest of Amici Curiae.

The interest of Amici Curiae has been set forth in the accompanying motion to file this brief and need not be reiterated here.

Summary of Argument.

Despite the numerous issues (including the question of the jurisdiction of this Court, postponed to the hearing on the merits) involved in these cases, this brief will address itself only to one, so as to avoid repetition of the arguments presented by appellants and by other briefs of amicus curiae. We believe that the time is ripe for this Court to announce that the right of a woman to determine the number and spacing of her children is a fundamental constitutional right of a personal nature deserving of special protection, which can be impinged upon by a state only where (which is not the situation here) a most urgent and compelling contrary interest exists. Recognition of this right now exists within the community and in judicial decisions; full recognition is essential to the emergence of women as equal members of society.

The attempted denial of this right by the anti-abortion laws of most of the states, including those of Georgia and Texas, involved in the cases here, is a direct deprivation of the rights of women, imposing, as it does, restrictions on personal freedom; a necessary concomitant of that deprivation is to burden women, their families and society in general with vast numbers of unwanted children.

Although the Texas abortion laws permit abortion only in the single instance where the mother's life would be saved and the Georgia laws permit abortion in certain additional categories, both, in the view of Amici involve such impingement upon what may be called the right of reproductive autonomy that it is appropriate to treat the particular issue, to which this brief addresses itself, as being the same in both cases.

ARGUMENT.

A. The Nature of the Woman's Right.

The personal, constitutional right of a woman to determine the number and spacing of her children, and thus to determine whether to bear a particular child (which many refer to as a right of "reproductive autonomy") evolves inevitably from the recognition afforded by this Court to the deep and inviolate nature of those human interests which relate to marriage, sex, the family and the raising of children. They are some of the most fundamental aspects of living, which every member of society must possess, free of all restraint, except where society as a whole has a clear and demonstrably compelling interest to protect. In a series of decisions, spread over half a century, this Court has had several occasions to enunciate the constitutionally protected interests that exist in each of these areas.

Meyer v. Nebraska, 262 U.S. 390 (1923), chronologically the first of the decisions, upheld the right of parents to be free of unreasonable restraints in the education of their children. In so holding, the Court emphasized the broad, not narrow, concept of those human liberties which are protected by the Constitution. It stated at page 399:

> "While this court has not attempted to define with exactness the liberty thus guaranteed, the term has received much consideration, and some of the included things have been definitely stated. Without doubt, it denotes not merely freedom from bodily restraint, but also the right of the individual to contract, to engage in any of the common occupations of life, to acquire useful knowledge, to marry, establish a home and bring up children, to worship God according to the dictates of his own conscience, and, generally, to enjoy those privileges long recognized at common law as essential to the orderly pursuit of happiness by free men."

Carrying the concept forward, Pierce v. Society of Sisters of Holy Names of Jesus and Mary, 268 U.S. 510 (1925) struck down, as an unreasonable interference with a fundamental liberty, an attempt to require attendance only at public schools. Again the Court stressed the broad base on which these personal constitutional liberties rests, saying (pp. 534-535):

> "Under the doctrine of Meyer v. Nebraska, 262 U. S. 390, we think it entirely plain that the Act of 1922 unreasonably interferes with the liberty of parents and guardians to direct the upbringing and education of children under their control. As often heretofore pointed out, rights guaranteed by the Constitution may not be abridged by legislation which has no reasonable relation to some purpose within the competency of the state. The fundamental theory of liberty upon which all goverments in this Union repose excludes any general power of the state to standardize its children by forcing them to accept instruction from public teachers only. The child is not the mere creature of the state; those who nurture him and direct his destiny have the right, coupled with the high duty, to recognize and prepare him for additional obligations."

Important as is the right of parents to have the utmost possible freedom in the rearing and education of their children, we believe that it is even more fundamental that an individual have free choice in the matter of becoming a parent. If bearing an additional child or children in an already large family will deprive the parents of the economic means of properly educating their existing children, the freedoms safeguarded by Meyer and Pierce become nugatory.

Subsequently, the statute of Oklahoma permitting involuntary sterilization was held invalid. In language which now has particular pertinence relative to laws which require an unwilling woman to carry an unwanted pregnancy to term, the Court said in Skinner v. State of Oklahoma, 316 U.S. 535 (1942) at p. 541:

> "There is no redemption for the individual whom the law touches. Any experiment which the State conducts is to his irreparable injury. He is forever deprived of a basic liberty. We mention these matters not to reexamine the scope of the police power of the States. We advert to them merely in emphasis of our view that strict scrutiny of the classification which a State makes in a sterilization law is essential. lest unwittingly or otherwise, invidious discriminations are made against groups or types of individuals in violation of the constitutional guaranty of fair and equal laws. (Emphasis supplied)."

There is likewise "no redemption" for the woman who has been compelled by the state, against her will, to give birth to a child. Because the point deserves separate emphasis, the lifelong onerous effects, equal in seriousness to those described in Skinner, of the present restrictive abortion laws are discussed in Part C, infra, of this brief.

Skinner was the first case to deal with the inviolate personal freedoms of an individual relating to matters of sex and procreation. Griswold v. Connecticut, 381 U.S. 479 (1965), invalidating the Connecticut statute prohibiting the use of contraceptives, was next. In a series of opinions by members of the Court, varying views were expressed of the precise constitutional source from which arises this area of deepest personal freedom. Speaking for the Court, Justice Douglas, noting that (p. 484) "Various guaranties create zones of privacy" and reviewing the relevant constitutional provisions and authorities, concluded that (p. 485) "These cases bear witness that the right of privacy which presses for recognition here is a legitimate one." and (p. 486) "We deal with a right of privacy older than the Bill of Rights—older than our political parties, older than our school system."

The decision in Griswold furnishes a solid foundation for the express recognition of a woman's right to reproductive autonomy. While Griswold was concerned with the right to control child bearing through the use of contraceptives, it is hard to believe that that right could have a constitutional basis without there existing a cognate right of a woman who has become involuntarily pregnant, either through the unavailability or failure of contraceptives or for other reasons, to procure a legal abortion in safe and antiseptic surroundings. A woman's choice in bearing children is only freely made if her decision can be made "after" as well as "before" the beginning of pregnancy.

In the next case involving family relationships, the Court held that there is also a basic personal right to choose one's marriage partner and that it was infringed by the long-existing miscegenation statute of Virginia. Loving v. Virginia, 388 U.S. 1, 12 (1967).

These decisions, and others, led the Supreme Court of California to conclude in People v. Belous, 71 Cal. 2d 954, 458 P. 2d 194 (1969) cert. denied, 397 U.S. 915 (1970) that (p. 963):

> "The fundamental right of the woman to choose whether to bear children follows from the Supreme Court's and this court's repeated acknowledgment of a 'right of privacy' or 'liberty' in matters related to marriage, family, and sex."

Belous was the first of the modern day cases dealing with the validity of state anti-abortion statutes and expressly declaring the right of reproductive autonomy. It has sparked widespread litigation in other jurisdictions.

Subsequent to Belous and Loving, this Court has had another occasion to afford protection to still another facet of the civil rights arising out of the intimate relationships of man and woman. Because of "the basic position of the marriage relationship in this society's hierarchy of values," the state's requirement that fees be paid as a condition to bringing a divorce action was held invalid when applied to indigent parties wishing to dissolve that relationship. Boddie v. Connecticut, 401 U.S. 371 (1971).

Again, it can be observed that, serious as may be the effects on adults who are required to continue the legal (not the physical) relationship of marriage against their will, it is as nothing compared to the effects on a woman who is compelled to continue a physical state of pregnancy against her will and to undertake the care of a child for a minimum period of its immature years.

Griswold and the right of privacy there upheld, was heavily relied on in Stanley v. Georgia, 394 U.S. 557 (1969), holding that the state could not punish "private" possession of obscene materials. In response to an argument that the state had the right to protect the individual's mind from the effects of obscenity (similar to the agument often heard in connection with abortion laws that they are required to prevent promiscuity), the opinion declared (p. 566) that the state cannot constitutionally premise legislation on the desirability of controlling a person's private thoughts. On balance, we believe that the right of a woman to the integrity of her own body, free of interference by the state, must surely be more precious than the right to the private possession of sexually stimulating material.

The right of reproductive autonomy—the right to decide when and where to have children—is at least equal to, and in most instances, even more deserving of recognition than those "fundamental" and "basic" civil rights discussed above, to which the Court has already given protection. Without derogating from the importance of those areas of human relationships already protected, it cannot be over-emphasized that the woman's right asserted here is of such basic importance to her and to her family, and to society as a whole, as to overshadow in any scale of values most of the rights already specifically embraced in the protected constitutional areas.[1]

The concept of a woman's constitutionally protected right to reproductive autonomy, which has only during the past decade become the subject of open and public discussion, has been adopted by a majority of the lower courts which have decided that issue. In the short period between the decision in Belous in September 1969 and the present time, both state courts and federal district courts have held that a woman does have a constitutionally protected right to determine when and where to bear children.[2] Just prior to the filing of this brief, the Court of Appeal, First Appellate District (Division 1) of the State of California, in People v. Barksdale, Crim. No. 9526 reiterated the right recognized in Belous and held that the 1967 Therapeutic Abortion Act of California (similar in essentials to the Georgia statutes challenged here) was invalid in part in imposing qualifying restrictions upon a woman's ability to procure an abortion. And, of course, in both the present cases, the courts below determined that such a right existed.

In this same period since the Belous decision, the fundamental right to decide whether to have a child has been recognized by courts in considering legal issues other than the validity of state abortion laws.

BLEED

Thus, in determining whether New York State had the right to limit reimbursment for abortions under the Medicaid program to those abortions which were described as "medically indicated," the Supreme Court of New York County,[3] holding that the state did not have that right, based its decision on the effect such a limitation would have on the fundamental right to determine either to have the child or terminate the pregnancy.

> "In view of the fundamental nature of the right to terminate a pregnancy, and the fact that the State has determined that an abortion may be performed only by a duly licensed physician (Penal Law Section 125.05), the Constitution similarly prohibits the State from denying to indigent women access to physicians in order to exercise this right.
> Accordingly, if Section 365-a does not permit Medicaid-reimbursement for all lawful abortions, it denies indigent women the fundamental right to decide whether to have a child, and violates the Ninth and Fourteenth Amendments to the United States Constitution."

And in a decision holding that the State of New York could enjoin the activities of an abortion referral agency,[4] the court described abortion laws as those which force women into "servitude as unwilling breeders."

[4] In re Abortion Information Agency, Inc., reported in the New York Times, May 14, 1971.

We respectfully submit, as Belous concluded, that the prior decisions of this Court inescapably require a holding that one of the individual rights protected by the United States Constitution is the woman's right to determine the spacing of her children and to decide whether to carry a particular pregnancy to term.

B. State Anti-Abortion Statutes, Despite Their Long-Standing Duration, Are Subject to Examination for Constitutional Validity in the Light of Contemporary Community Standards.

The Texas statute challenged in Roe v. Wade has been in effect without substantial changes insofar as concerns the issue here since 1907; abortion laws of other states using substantially the same standards as that of Texas were for the most part adopted during the latter half of the nineteenth century. The Georgia statute in its present form is a modification of a more ancient statute. No significance can be given to the fact that, for these many years, the constitutionality of these laws went unchallenged. As we have said, it has been only during the past decade that the general public has articulated its present thinking on the need for women to make this decision for themselves. It is undoubtedly for that reason that, both on the judicial and legislative front, reexamination of abortion laws is taking place, a reexamination which is based on an evident growing desire to cast off the shackles of the past.

Neither the failure of society nor of the law to recognize the existence of these non-enumerated rights until recent years impairs their constitutionally protected status nor precludes this Court from recognizing them. As this Court said in Harper v. Virginia State Board of Elections, 383 U.S. 663 (1966) at 669, et seq.:

> "We agree, of course, with Mr. Justice Holmes that the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment 'does not enact Mr. Herbert Spencer's Social Statics'. . . . Likewise, the Equal Protection Clause is not shackled to the political theory of a particular era. In determining what lines are unconstitutionally discriminatory, we have never been confined to historic notions of equality, any more than we have restricted due process to a fixed catalogue of what was at a given time deemed to be the limits of fundamental rights. See Malloy v. Hogan, 378 US 1, 5-6. . . ." (Emphasis supplied.)

To the same effect see also People v. Belous, supra, at page 967. This Court has not hesitated to strike down an invidious classification "even though it had history and tradition on its side." Levy v. Louisiana, 391 U.S. 69, 71 (1968).

On the contrary, the evidence of present community opinion discussed here and the effect of restrictive abortion laws on all concerned, discussed in Part C, are relevant considerations. In the segregation case, Brown v. Board of Education of Topeka, 347 U.S. 483 (1954), this Court, in overturning the long standing constitutional doctrine enunciated in Plessy v. Ferguson, 163 U.S. 537 (1896), was at pains to make this clear, stating, at p. 492 "In approaching this problem, we cannot turn the clock back to 1868 when the Amendment was adopted, or even to 1896 when Plessy v. Ferguson was written. We must consider public education in the light of its full development and its present place in American life throughout the Nation." (Emphasis supplied.)

With this principle in mind, this Court will properly weigh the woman's right to determine whether and when to bear a child in the context of contemporary considerations.

1. Both prior to and concurrent with developing judicial protection of rights connected with procreation, marriage and the family, nearly every important and representative segment of society has indicated its recognition of a personal right on the part of women to make decisions regarding the bearing of children. In the forefront, a Task Force of the Citizens Advisory Council on the Status of Women, appointed by the President of the United States, whose Chairman was Senator Maureen Neuberger, stated that it was "convinced that the right of a woman to determine her own reproductive life is a basic human right."[8] Many important wom-

[8]Task Force Report on Family Law and Policy, Recommendations of the Citizens Advisory Council on the Status of Women, p. 31 (1968). Subsequently, Senator Neuberger commented on the emergence of the community view as follows—"A few years earlier, I had served on the Status of Women Commission, which was appointed by President Kennedy. Its Chairman was Eleanor Roosevelt, and the Assistant Chairman was Esther Peterson. Mrs. Roosevelt died before we finished our report, and Esther Peterson took over. Our studies of the laws that affect women led us to believe that it was time to talk about abortion laws, but we couldn't get our own Commission to consider such a discussion. It was said that the word "abortion" was verboten; that we couldn't get anything printed about it in government publications. Believing all this, when the task force report came to my desk, I anticipated all sorts of trouble. I expected delays and hours of debate. But not so. What had happened in that interval of a few years? Well, en's groups have also expressed concurrence in that view.[6] These organizations represent all shades and diversity of opinion. For example, the American Association of University Women has officially declared its belief that abortion should be legal for all those who wish it after medical consultation. Similarly, the National Conference of the Young Women's Christian Associations of the United States, another of the Amici herein, included in its action program emphasis on repeal of all laws restricting or prohibiting abortions performed by a duly licensed physician. The list of goals adopted by the National Organization of Women at the First National Conference in Washington, D.C. included implementation of "The right of women to control their own reproductive lives by removing from the penal code laws eliminating access to contraceptive information and devices and by repealing penal laws governing abortion."[7] an educational process had been going on, organizations had been at work, and there had been a complete change in the emotional climate. The greatest dissension came, as we studied the task force report, over the proposal to amend the maximum hours law to permit women to work overtime. Very little—there was one minority report—on the abortion report." Neuberger, Abortion, A Political View, in ABORTION AND THE UNWANTED CHILD (1971) at p. 108.

Many years ago a famous representative of her sex expressed the position that has now become current.

[6]In addition to the women's groups listed as Amici Curiae, see list of organizations, Note 12, infra.

[7]The need for recognition of this fundamental human right in the eyes of the law has been dramatically expressed by groups of prominent French and German women who have sacrificed their personal privacy by signing statements admitting to illegal abortions, thus emphasizing the prison-like effect of the current laws in those countries. Articles in Los Angeles Times, 343 French Women Talk of Abortions, April 6, 1971; 24 Celebrities Admit to Abortions, June 3, 1971.

Harriot Stanton Blatch, in Voluntary Motherhood, pungently summarized the difference between wanted and unwanted reproduction.[8]

> "Poets sing and philosophers reason about the holiness of the mother's sphere, but men in laws and customs have degraded the woman in her maternity. Motherhood is sacred,—that is, voluntary motherhood; but the woman who bears unwelcome children is outraging every duty she owes the race. (Emphasis supplied.)"

From other groups in the community has come support for the woman's view.

The American Public Health Association, concerned with the invidious effects upon public health of large numbers of illegal abortions and unwanted pregnancies, formally expressed the view that there was an "accepted" personal right to determine the number of and spacing of children; to implement that right, it advocated that safe, legal abortion should be available to all women. It specifically noted that the "provision of abortion within the usual channels of medical care will reduce the well known adverse health effects of illegal abortion."[9]

Both medical and psychiatric groups have publicly taken the same position. It is noteworthy that the American College of Obstetricians and Gynecologists has recently liberalized its position so as to approve abortion on the joint decision of the patient and her physician, without additional medical consultation.[10]

An eminent group of psychiatrists, joining in the recognition of a "woman's right to control her own reproductive life," observed the destructive effects of an unwanted pregnancy upon both mother and the child,[11] destructive effects which are discussed in detail below in Part C of this brief.

Almost all of the important religious groups (except the Roman Catholic Church) have recognized this right of free choice on the part of women by calling for abortion law reform. Among others, the American Friends' Service Committee and the Unitarian Universalist Association have each expressly announced the belief that the right of a woman to decide whether she will bear a child should not be interfered with by government. In its resolution adopted in 1968, the Unitarian Universalist Association stated "A child has a right to a mother who cherishes him . . .".

The roll call increases with almost every meeting of any national group having an interest in religion, health, the family, medicine or effective law enforcement.[12] From the legal profession, the section of Family Law of the American Bar Association has stated its conclusion that:

> "The changes in our decisional and statuory law expresses a general recognition that the right to limit family size is a basic human right—that the individual has a right to free choice and self-determination in regard to procreation."[13]

When the American Law Institute first adopted what was then considered a liberal and realistic standard for abortions in its 1959 draft of the Model Penal Code,[14] the Institute proposed that abortions be available to women only when the pregnancy would gravely impair her physical or mental health, when the pregnancy resulted from rape or incest, or where there was danger of a child being born with grave mental or physical defects. missioners on Uniform State Laws issued a Second Tentative Draft of a Uniform Abortion Act which would authorize abortion within twenty weeks after commencement of the pregnancy, without any further qualification. The proposed Uniform Act, by imposing no substantive restrictions, thus recognized the essentially personal nature of the determination to terminate a pregnancy. The difference in approach between the 1959 Penal Code draft and the 1970 Uniform Act parallels the developing community thinking that took place in the same period of time.

In light of the hundreds of years of silence in which abortion was discussed only in hushed tones, in which the word was never used by any of the mass media and was referred to by newspapers under the euphemism of "illegal operation," the rapidity with which, in recent years, the community has expressed its adherence to the proposition that free choice in areas of procreation is fundamental to the dignity of women and to the best interests of society is virtually astounding.

2. We turn now to a brief mention of the present place of women in the American scene. There has been a basic change in the legal status of women in our society[15] from the period when they were, under the law, unable to control their property, their children or their family life in any fashion, to the present day when disabilities with respect to property, divorce, child custody, voting, jury service and others have been largely removed.[15] The woman suffrage amendment (U.S. Const.; Amendment XIX), the provisions prohibiting discrimination under the Equal Employment Opportunities Law (1964) (Civil Rights Act, Title 7, 42 U.S.C. 2000e et seq.), and the various Married Women's Property Acts, are all manifestations of a judgment by society that women are no longer to be in a subordinate status.

However, the value of the present right to vote, to equal pay, to equal job opportunities, to choose one's marriage partner, to joint custody of children—which did not, in a legal sense, exist for most women at the time of the passage of state anti-abortion laws—can be sharply decreased by an unwanted pregnancy. To fully implement those rights, this Court should recognize the paramount right of reproductive autonomy which is sought here.

C. The Effects of Abortion Laws Upon a Woman's Life, Dignity and Personal Freedom Are So Serious as to Require the State to Show an Urgent and Compelling Interest to Support Any Restrictions.

Interference with fundamental constitutional rights of the individual must be minimal and must be supported by a compelling state interest. Bates v. Little Rock, 361 U.S. 516, 524 (1960); Sherbert v. Verner, 374 [15]Kanowitz, Leo, WOMEN AND THE LAW, summarizes these changes.

U.S. 398, 406 (1963); McLaughlin v. Florida, 379 U.S. 184, 196 (1965); NAACP v. Button, 371 U.S. 415, 438 (1963). Even when there is a compelling state interest,[17] the fundamental rights of the individual can, consistent with their constitutionally protected status, be restricted only to the limited extent required by that state interest, and not to any greater extent. NAACP v. Alabama, 377 U.S. 288 (1964) and cases cited therein at pages 307-308.[18]

Because the right to choose not to bear a child is a "personal" rather than a purely economic right, there should be a strict scrutiny of the anti-abortion laws which impinge upon the free exercise of that right. See e.g. Aptheker v. Secretary of State, 378 U.S. 500, 516 (1964). For a recent reiteration of this distinction see Dandridge v. Williams, 397 U.S. 471 at 484 (1970).

A woman whom the law would force to carry an unwanted pregnancy to term is, quite plainly, restricted and imposed upon to a greater degree than by any other action which the state could take, save execution of a sentence of death or possibly long term imprisonment. Such a woman is harmed, not only directly in her person, but in her capacity as the protector of her other children and in her interest in assuring the health and well being of the child she is compelled to bring forth. Not only is the woman injured, so too is the unwanted child, her family and society as a whole.

[17]Abortion laws had their genesis in the nineteenth century and represented an application of then prevalent concepts of population growth and sexual morality and some concern for the health of the woman, based on the then current surgical and antiseptic standards. People v. Belous, supra, at 964-965.

[18]The state, in its traditional concern for public health and safety in regulating aspects of medical practice may well be able to specify the qualifications of persons authorized to perform abortions or prescribe the period of pregnancy beyond which an abortion cannot be performed. But, in prohibiting abortions altogether except for a limited number of reasons, the state goes beyond the scope of its power.

1. The harm to the woman falls into many categories. Consider, first, the horrendous number of women who, rather than face the fact of bringing an unwanted pregnancy to term, are forced into seeking illegal abortions. They are willing to risk violations of the criminal laws or, worse, they risk their very health and lives.

While the realities of law enforcement, social, and public health problems posed by abortion laws have been openly discussed in books, conferences and the press only within a period of not more than the last ten years, one fact appears undeniable, although unverifiable statistically. There are at least one million illegal abortions in the United States each year.[19] Indeed, studies indicate that, if the local law still has qualifying requirements, the relaxation in the law has not diminished to any substantial extent the numbers in which women procure illegal abortions.[20]

The overall effect of illegal abortions has been summarized by the President's Commission on Law Enforcement and Administration of Justice, through the Report of its Task Force on Administration of Justice, (1967) at page 105, et seq. as follows:

[19]The President's Commission on Law Enforcement and Administration of Justice, Report of Task Force on Administration of Justice (1967), p. 105; Rossi, Alice, Public Views on Abortion, in Guttmacher, THE CASE FOR LEGALIZED ABORTION NOW, p. 27 (1967); LADER, ABORTION, pp. 2-3 (1966).

[20]Abernathy and Horvitz, Estimates of Induced Abortion in Urban North Carolina, DEMOGRAPHY, Vol. 7, Number 1 (1970), p. 19 et seq.; Report to the 1970 Legislature, Third Annual Report on the Implementation of the California Therapeutic Abortion Act.

"Abortion laws are another instance in which the criminal law, by its failure to define prohibited conduct carefully, has created high costs for society and has placed obstacles in the path of effective enforcement. The demand for abortions, both by married and unmarried women, is widespread. It is often produced by motives and inclinations that manifest no serious dangerousness or deviation from the normal on the part of the people who seek it. These factors produce the spectacle of pervasive violations but few prosecutions."

"It has been estimated that as many as a million abortions are performed each year in this country, while the arrest rate is not more than one per thousand abortions performed. Two-thirds of all abortions are reportedly performed on married women. Available indications are that only 8,000 to 10,000 of these are legal abortions conducted in a hospital setting."

"The reasons for seeking abortions vary; they include direct danger to the physical health of the mother; the likelihood that the fetus, if born, will be deformed or non-viable; the circumstances of conception, particularly rape, incest, extreme immaturity of the mother, or her unmarried state; the mother's mental health; the low income of the family and its inability to support more children; or simply that the family does not want any more children . . ."

"The present state of the law presents particularly acute problems for conscientious parents and physicians faced with weighty reasons for terminating pregnancy in a jurisdiction where the law is restrictive or its standards are vague and uncertain. Since some highly reputable physicians regard the law as an injustice and want to protect their patients against incompetent abortions available on the black market, large numbers of reputable citizens find themselves in the position of law violators. This tends to contribute to antagonism and resentment toward those who enforce the law."

Since illegal abortions are not likely to be performed in safe facilities or by the most modern antiseptic techniques, they have created a severe public health problem. Investigators have estimated that in the United States five thousand women die each year from criminal abortions and that illegal abortions induced out of hospitals by persons without medical training are at the rate of 100 deaths per 1000 abortions.[21] By contrast, where legal abortions are performed in hospitals by medical practitioners, there are only 3 deaths per 100,000 abortions.[22] The incidence of severe infection from criminal abortion is, as would be expected, very much greater than the incidence of death.[23]

Second, for the woman who is too fearful of breaking the criminal laws or of risking the unsafe procedures of the illegal abortionists, there is no alternative, except bringing forth the unwanted child—a development in her life which can never be reversed.

Third, for the unmarried woman, this forced bearing of a child can have additional obvious and undesirable effects on the remainder of her entire life, including the rearing of a future, legitimate family. And, it is no answer to think that adoption of the child will solve her problems, for there may be serious psychological reprecussions for the woman in parting with a child already born, even when the birth was not planned or desired.

For the woman, whether married or unmarried, what has been called compulsory pregnancy[24] may force the abandonment of educational plans, unwilling renunciation of a career, a further demand upon physical energies, which may already be fully drained by repeated child bearing and child care. Her mental health may suffer or be seriously impaired. Direct economic deprivation for both the female concerned and the remainder of her family can be an immediate result. At the present time 41.6% of all women are in the labor force, and 63.9% of the total female labor force is married.[25] Of this total female labor force approximately 60% is within child bearing age.[26] Thus, in our society, curtailment of the woman's wage-earning capaci-

[24]Professor Hardin has suggested that the appropriate term for the condition of life to which the abortion laws give rise is "compulsory pregnancy." Hardin, Garrett, Abortion—or Compulsory Pregnancy?, JOURNAL OF MARRIAGE AND THE FAMILY, Vol. XXX, No. 2, (1968) at p. 249.

ties by enforced child bearing can substantially cut the family income. Particularly in the disadvantaged minority groups, the woman may be the main wage earner of the family and her plight and that of the remainder of her family becomes crucial.[37] From the viewpoint of society, the additional pregnancy may force the economically marginal family over the line, so that it thereafter requires public assistance.

2. The woman can be adversely affected in her relationship with her family—her husband and her other children.

The insistence upon compulsory pregnancy too often thwarts the right of both a woman and her husband to a meaningful and happy spousal relationship. A pregnancy unwanted by the woman is normally equally unwanted by the husband. The consequent family tension and bickering, with increased calls upon the husband's economic responsibilities, affect the marriage. Indeed, an unwanted pregnancy has been known to precipitate separation or desertion by the husband.

The mother's unwanted pregnancy may severely handicap her in discharging her duties to her existing children. She who has the primary sociological as well as biological responsibility for rearing children in our society, may be forced to divide her energy in so many directions that even those children she has born willingly, subsequently become, in a sense, unwanted children. No one can deny that the harassed mother can scarcely give her time, attention, and manifestations of affection, to the full extent necessary for the development of her children into sound and whole human beings.

3. It is not unimportant to the consideration of these cases that a child born as the result of an unwanted pregnancy can suffer serious adverse effects, frequently of lifetime duration. The physical, psychological and emotional damage to those having the unhappy status of being an unwanted child is most movingly documented in four case studies of unwanted children reported by a Professor of Pediatrics at the Yale University Child Study Center, New Haven, Connecticut.[28]

Two summaries serve as examples of what, unfortunately, are not rare and isolated instances, but typical of the histories of thousands of children.[29]

> "Tommy, age seven, is in a residential treatment center for emotionally disturbed children after passing through five foster homes. I first saw him when he was three. He had been admitted to our hospital because of malnutrition and delayed physical and mental development. The story we have heard is not uncommon. He was the fourth child born within five years to an immature woman of twenty-two. At the time of his hospitalization, she told us how unhappy she had felt about this, her fourth pregnancy; that having one more child was just too much for her. Childlike, and in precarious physical health, she was unable to cope with the many responsibilities of caring for, four young children, and her burden was increased by an alcoholic husband who worked only intermittently. Although he was interested in her and the children at times, he was frequently neglectful or abusive.

Tommy improved during hospitalization and his parents asked for foster care for him, Tragically, no placement could be sustained for very long—twice because of illness of the foster mother; twice because foster parents, at first motivated to help him, became exhausted with his difficult behavior and his limited responsiveness to their efforts. The residential treatment staff will work with Tommy, trying to rehabilitate him so that he can adjust to family life—an objective of great importance in giving him some hope for the future. Physically, he is now in good condition. Intellectually, he functions at a dull normal level. In his ability to learn, to establish controls over his behavior, and to love others, he is crippled. Experience with similar cases has shown that the chances that he will become an adult who can maintain himself and assume appropriate adult responsibilities are not favorable.

Laurie, four years old, was brought to our clinic at sixteen months by her well-to-do parents who feared she was mentally defective. Two older siblings were doing well. In her first year, Laurie had had two caretakers besides the mother, each of whom was devoted to her for a short time. Laurie's mother was a competent, articulate, conscientious person, who devoted much time and effort to community activities and to her two older children. The father was a responsible man, a hardworking partner in a successful business, and devoted to his wife and the two older children.

Laurie, we found, was an unwanted child of an unwanted pregnancy—a pregnancy during which her mother felt unloved and unlovely. She endured the pregnancy as a sentence to be served before she could again return to the world. In Laurie's infancy her mother was unable to feel close to her, to nurture her in the ways that are crucial to an infant's development. She dressed her in beautiful clothing, but gave little of herself. While she was concerned and guilty, she put other things first. The child had no biological defect; her intellectual, emotional, and motor development were delayed and distorted by the deficits in her care. With casework assistance, the parents have been able to modify some of their behavior so that Laurie is more a part of the family and more time is devoted to her. The parents have provided her with a good nursery school and other social and educational experiences. They have made a conscientious effort to understand her needs. Laurie no longer looks like a mentally retarded child, but her learning is erratic and her interactions with others lack richness and depth. She is attached to her parents and siblings, but not closely. Emotionally starved and isolated by intelligent parents in the midst of economic affluence, she is, sadly, a four-year-old shadow of a person. I fear she can be expected to be an inadequate mother to her own children twenty years from now."

The long term consequences for the community were demonstrated by a innovative study of one hundred and twenty children born in Sweden after their mothers' request for a therapeutic abortion was refused. The findings of that review have been summarized as follows:

> "A study made of Swedish children born when their mothers were refused the abortions they had requested showed that unwanted children, as compared with their controls, as they grew up were more often picked up for drunkenness, or anti-social or criminal behavior; they received less education; they received more psychiatric care; and they were more often exempted from military service by reason of defect. Moreover the females in the group married earlier and had children earlier, thus no doubt tending to create a vicious circle of poorly tended children who in their turn would produce more poorly tended children."[30]

As noted in the foregoing comment, in addition to the effect of the unwanted pregnancy upon the mother and upon the unwanted children, those unwanted children who are economically or emotionally harmed, transmit their psychosocial pathology to succeeding generations. Women forced to bear unwanted children have often themselves been raised in households in which they were unwanted, and they in turn may be forced by restrictive abortion laws to raise their children in the same circumstances.[31] The long term effects upon society are quite literally incalculable but our society also suffers most directly. Observation in the United States demonstrates, and the Swedish study of the parallel problems in Sweden gives concrete evidence of, the direct cost in alcoholism, drunkenness, crime and welfare costs with which society is faced.

Particularly acute is the problem of the unwanted child who is also illegitimate; and illegitimate births are frequent. The proportion of live births which occur to unmarried women has risen startlingly; since 1940 the percentage of live births which are illegitimate has increased from 3.5% to 9.7% of all births.[32] The number of illegitimate births to mothers of minorities is far out of proportion to the ratio of such minorities in the whole population.[33]

The foregoing effects of bringing to term an unwanted pregnancy have undoubtedly contributed to the deep felt need of women to determine for themselves, without outside restrictions, whether to bear a child. That need shows quite plainly in the increase in legal abortions. Since there has been a lessening of the restrictions on legal abortions it has been possible to compile reliable statistics, and to see that there is a direct relationship between the availability of legal abortions in any jurisdiction and the proportion of women who have elected to procure such legal abortions.

[32]Table #58, Illegitimate Live Births By Age and Race of Mother: 1940-1968, STATISTICAL ABSTRACT OF THE UNITED STATES (1970).

[33]For example, in 1968 (the last year for which reports have been published), 54.2% or 183,900 illegitimate births occurred to "negro and other mothers" while 155,200 illegitimate births occurred to "white" mothers. Table #58, supra.

This sharp (but not unexpected) rise in the number of legal abortions in jurisdictions where laws have been reformed or medical practice basically modified has an obvious implication: when women have received complete or partial recognition of their right of reproductive autonomy, they have exercised the right to an extent directly correlated with the degree of permissiveness of the law and medical practice.[34]

S. DEPARTMENT OF HEALTH, EDUCATION AND WELFARE, PUBLIC HEALTH SERVICE, Health Services and Mental Health Administration Center for Disease Control, attached as Exhibit A. In California more than 62,000 legal abortions were performed in 1970, rising from 5,030 abortions in 1968 and 15,339 in 1969.

Conclusion.

This Court, we respectfully submit, should recognize the existence of a fundamental, constitutional right on the part of a woman, to determine, along with her personal physician, the number and spacing of her children. This right is of a personal nature, and attempts to restrict its exercise are, therefore, subject to strict scrutiny and can be justified only by reason of a most compelling state interest.

In Georgia, listed as 27 in order of ratio of legal abortions to live births, the number of legal abortions was apparently severely limited by the procedural requirements of the statute, upheld by the District Court.

MOTION FOR PERMISSION TO FILE BRIEF AMICUS CURIAE AND TO PARTICIPATE IN ORAL ARGUMENT ON BEHALF OF NEW WOMEN LAWYERS, WOMEN'S HEALTH AND ABORTION PROJECT, INC., and WOMEN'S NATIONAL ABORTION ACTION COALITION

MOTION FOR PERMISSION TO FILE BRIEF AMICUS CURIAE AND TO PARTICIPATE IN ORAL ARGUMENT.

Amici, the New Women Lawyers, the Women's Health and Abortion Project, Inc. and the Women's National Abortion Action Coalition, by their undersigned counsel hereby move this Court for permission to file the annexed Brief Amicus Curiae in the above-captioned cases and to participate in oral argument.

Amici have requested permission of the attorneys for the parties to file the annexed brief but have not yet received responses from all of them.

Amici have set forth the reasons why they seek to file a brief amicus curiae and why they feel their brief would be of special assistance to the Court in the statement of interest, accompanying their motion. Amici believe they have raised aspects of the constitutional issues before this court hitherto unexplored by the parties.

Any decision by this Court in the two cases before it will deeply affect the lives of more than half the citizens of this country. Amici are aware that this Court has treated limited aspects of the question of abortion before and recognize the competence of the counsel in the above-captioned cases. Nonetheless, given the gravity of the question of a woman's right to abortion, aspects of which are being raised de novo before this Court, and given the fact that some decisions of this Court have turned on arguments raised by an amicus curiae, amici believe their participation in oral argument would be of assistance to this Court in determining the sensitive and complex issues before it.

Therefore amici respectfully urge this Court to grant their motion and permit them to file the requested brief amicus and participate in the oral argument of the cases of Roe v. Wade and Doe v. Bolton.

STATEMENT OF INTEREST

During the past two years the question of the onstitutionality of abortion laws - of the right of woman to control her own body and life - has become ne of the most burning issues for women throughout he country. As women have become aware of the myriad evels of unconstitutional discrimination they face aily, they have become most acutely aware of the pri- ary role which restrictions on abortions plays in hat discrimination. As a result, women throughout he country have become determined to free themselves f the crippling and unconstitutional restrictions on heir lives. As a major part of their efforts, thou- ands of women have sought and continue to seek the id of federal and state courts in their challenges o abortion statutes. In New York State, more than hree hundred persons, primarily women sued to have heir state laws declared unconstituional. Abramo- icz v. Lefkowitz, 69 Civ. 4469 (S.D.N.Y.), dismissed s moot on July 1, 1970 when the New York State Sta- ute went into effect permitting the performance of bortions up to twenty-four weeks of pregnancy. In ew Jersey more than one thousand women sought the aid f the federal courts. Abromowitz v. Kugler, 431-1970 .N.J, argued in December, 1970, and awaiting de- ision. In Pennsylvania again well over one thousand ersons, most of whom were women, similarly sought the id of the court in Ryan v. Spector, 70-2527, E.D.Pa. ee also Connecticut, where 858 women sued in Aberle . Markel, Civ. Action #14291 D.Conn. (May 14, 1971), ismissed, presently on appeal; and Rhode Island, here over one hundred took similar action in Women of hode Island v. Israel, Civ. Action #4605 (D.R.I.) in hich a three judge court has been convened.*

These actions by women are only a portion of the weeping challenges on the abortion laws of this coun- ry which have taken place in the last two years. The ollowing is a partial list of such challenges. Cali- ornia v. Belous, 80 Cal. Rptr. 354 (1969), cert.

Similar efforts to challenge the abortion laws of their states are being developed by women in other states throughout the country. These women have sought the assistance of the federal courts because of the degree to which restrictions on the availability of abortion have crippled and even destroyed their own lives and lives of many other women.

The organizations listed below share the concern of these thousands of women who have sought the assistance of the courts. Each of the groups has a particular concern to see that these unconstitutional burdens and restrictions on a woman's life be removed.

The issues raised by the Texas and Georgia cases presently before this Court are not local but national issues. The problems raised by restrictive abortion laws are problems of millions of pregnant women.*

Therefore, Amici have drawn on cases and statutes throughout the country in order to aid this Court in deeply and fully understanding the problem before it.

The New Women Lawyers is an unincorporated membership association of women lawyers and law students in the New York City area.

Amongst its purposes is to work through the courts to redress the discrimination and oppression which women face under the law.

As women lawyers and law students amici are both members of the class whose interests are before this Court and advocates for that class. Therefore, amici have special insight into the problems and issues presented in the two abortion cases which may be of assistance to the Court.

The Women's Health and Abortion Project, Inc., is a non-profit corporation in the State of New York which grew out of the challenge to the constitutionality of the former New York abortion statute. Amongst the purposes of the Project is to counsel, and provide information to women concerning family planning and abortion without fee. Since the liberalized New York abortion law went into effect on July 1,

* There are three basic types of laws used throughout the United States to prevent the performance of abortion, laws permitting the performance of abortion, a) only when necessary to save the life of the woman, b) when necessary to preserve her life and health and c) the "reform type law which permits abortion for reasons of life and health, as well as when the fetus resulted from rape, incest or when

1970, the Project has counselled thousands of desperate women from across the country who came to New York seeking abortions. The women's Health and Abortion Project therefore has particular concern for and understanding of the problems of women in need of abortion and is particularly concerned with the infringement of women's rights by laws such as those of Georgia and Texas restricting the availability of abortion to women.

The Women's National Abortion Action Coalition is a coalition of women's groups and individual women throughout the country who have united in efforts to eliminate all abortion laws. Many of the individual women within the Coalition are plaintiffs in class action litigation challenging the constitutionality of the abortion laws of their own states. Many others work with pregnancy counseling groups and are members of women's groups whose prime concern is the elimination of discriminatory laws such as abortion laws.

Therefore, the Coalition is particularly concerned about the issues presented in the two cases before this Court and well suited to understand and present to this Court, to the fullest extent, the tolls which these laws take on the lives of women.

Amici believe that their special perspective on the constitutional issues before this Court will be of assistance to this Court in its deliberations on one of today's most sensitive issues -- an issue of overwhelming importance to more than 50% of the nation's population. Amici have sought to present aspects of the issue involving the constitutional rights of women which they believe have not been treated by the parties to this litigation or by other amici such as the manner in which the challenged Texas and Georgia statutes deprive women of their rights to life, liberty and the equal protection of the laws guaranteed by the Fourteenth Amendment and the degree to which they constitute cruel and usual punishment in violation of the Eighth Amendment to the Constitution.

Amici therefore, urge this Court to accept their Brief Amicus in the hope that it will be of assistance in unravelling the crucial constitutional issues before this Court.

SUMMARY OF ARGUMENT

This is a brief Amicus in support of actions challenging the constitutionality of the abortion statutes of Georgia, Georgia Code Annotated § 26-1201 et seq. (1969); and Texas, Texas Penal Code Articles 1191, 1192, 1193, 1194 and 1196. The Texas statute permits abortion only when necessary to preserve the life of the pregnant woman. Under the Georgia statute a woman may obtain an abortion only with the approval of a committee of doctors where the abortion is necessary to preserve her life or health, or when the pregnancy resulted from rape, or would result in a deformed child.

Amici have argued that both statutes are void in that they violate the most basic constitutional rights of women.

First, the Texas and Georgia statutes and other statutes which restrict the availability of abortion, deny to women their right to control and direct their lives and bodies as protected by the Fourteenth Amendment's guarantees of life and liberty. Amici have attempted to set forth for this Court the manner in which the status of pregnancy and motherhood severely restricts the life of a woman the way in which an unwanted pregnancy can unalterably change and even destroy her life.

Amici have next shown that despite the fact that both man and woman are responsible for any pregnancy, it is the woman who bears the disproportionate share of the de jure and de facto burdens and penalties of pregnancy, child birth and child rearing. Thus, any statute which denies a woman the right to determine whether she will bear those burdens denies her the equal protection of the law.

Carrying, giving birth to, and raising an unwanted child can be one of the most painful and longlasting punishments that a person can endure. Amici have argued that statutes which condemn women to share their bodies with another organism against their will, to be child breeders and rearers against their will, violate the Eighth Amendment's proscription against cruel and unusual punishment.

Finally, amici contend there is no compelling state interest in forcing a woman to these deprivations of her constitutional rights. For, it is no longer possible to justify a ban on abortions to protect a woman's health and such a ban is a consitutionally unacceptable method to use to establish a particular moral standard. Furthermore, the argument that the state must protect the life of the fetus when examined closely is in reality a codification of a particular religious doctrine and therefore constitutionally insufficient.

In closing, amici have urged that the doctrine of Younger v. Harris does not bar the Court from deciding this matter before it for in fact Mary Doe in Doe v. Bolton and Jane Roe in Roe v. Wade may not challenge the abortion statutes of Georgia and Texas in state criminal proceedings as envisioned in Younger and must turn to the Federal Courts to safeguard their constitutional rights.

I. THE GEORGIA AND TEXAS STATUTES RESTRICTING THE AVAILABILITY OF ABORTION VIOLATE THE MOST BASIC RIGHTS OF WOMEN TO LIFE, LIBERTY AND PROPERTY GUARANTEED BY THE FOURTEENTH AMENDMENT TO THE CONSTITUTION.

Under the Fourteenth Amendment to the Constitution, no state shall "...deprive any person of life liberty, or property without due process of law." The courts have not yet, however, begun to come to grips with the fact that approximately one half of our citizenry is systematically being denied those guarantees of the Fourteenth Amendment. That is exactly the effect of the abortion laws of Texas and Georgia, and nearly every other state in the United States. Amici urge this Court not to shrink from redressing the constitutional wrongs perpetrated on women.

For the first time, this Court has the opportunity to give serious and full consideration to the degree to which laws such as those challenged herein, in denying women the control of their reproductive lif violate their most basic constitutional rights.

In the past two years, the Supreme Court of the State of California, the United States District Court for the District of Columbia below, and the Municipal Court of Central Orange County, California, recognized that it is "the fundamental right of the woman to choose whether to bear children...." California v. Belous, 80 Cal. Rptr. 354, 359 (1969), Cert. Denied 397 U.S. 915 (1970). See also, United States v. Vuit 305 F.Supp. 1032 (D.D.C., 1969) reversed on other grounds, 91 S.Ct. 1294(1971); Roe v. Wade, 314 F.Supp. 1217 (N.D. Tex.,1970) jurisdiction noted, 91 S.Ct.161 (1971); Babbitz v. McCann, 310 F.Supp. 293 (E.D.Wisc. 1970) remanded 400 U.S. 1 (1971); South Dakota v. Munson, 7th Jud'l District, Pennington Co., S.Dak. (1970); Doe v. Scott, #70 C 395 (N.D.Ill.) Jan 29, 1971; California v. Robb, #140,005 Mun. Ct., Orange Co., Cal., Jan 9, 1970, and most recently, Walsingha

rturned convictions of three men convicted of con-ring to commit abortion and cast severe doubt on the stitutionality of the Florida statute, and City of York v. Wyman, reported in full, New York Law Jour-May 19, 1971, invalidating state restrictions on icade reimbursement for abortions. In Wyman, Justice egel spoke of "... the fundamental nature of the ht to terminate pregnancy" and stated that "a woman a Constitutional right pursuant to the United States stitution Amendments IX and XIV to terminate an uned pregnancy."

The decision by a woman of whether and when will bear children may be the most fundamental deion of her life because of its far-reaching signince, affecting almost every aspect of her life from earliest days of her pregnancy.

A. The Right to Life.

Persons seeking to uphold restrictive abo laws argue that the State has a compelling interes protecting human life. Amici could not agree more. But, we argue that the responsibility of the State to persons who are living and that the State may n maintain laws which effect the most serious invasi of the constitutional rights of its citizens.

From the very fact, as noted by the Calif Supreme Court in Belous, that "childbirth involves risk of death", California v. Belous, supra at 359, should be most obvious that laws which force wome bear every child she happens to conceive raises th severe constitutional questions under the Fourteen Amendment.

Nearly ten years ago a medical expert rep that "the risk to life from an abortion, performed an experienced physician in a hospital on a health woman in the first trimester of pregnancy is far smaller than the risk ordinarily associated with p nancy and childbirth. (Dr. Christopher Tietze, Leg Abortion in Eastern Europe J.A.M.A. 175:1149 (1961 April). A recent study of the death rate from chi birth in the United States revealed that there are still 20 deaths per 100,000 pregnancies among Amer women. Studies in Family Planning, 34:6-8 Septem 1969, Population Council, New York. The same study ported that the death rate due to legalized aborti performed in hospitals in Eastern Europe is 3 per 000 pregnancies. And so, in the United States tod giving birth is nearly 7 times more dangerous than therapeutic abortion.

Furthermore, if a woman truly believes sh should not continue an unwanted pregnancy and give birth to and raise an unwanted child, she will not be deterred by the fact that an abortion in her ci curmstances would be illegal. She will do this de spite the great hazards to her physical and mental health -- and the great financial expense involved will do this even though she knows that under lo- law she is performing a criminal act.

The very fact that legal abortion is unavail- e for most women forces them into an additional ha- d to their health and life. Aware of the failure e of most contraceptives* and afraid of an acciden- pregnancy which they will be unable to terminate, llions of women daily expose themselves to the known as yet unknown dangers of the pill even though y would prefer not to.

*There is no such thing as a contraceptive device ch is both 100% safe and 100% effective. Oral traceptives, which have the highest degree of ef- tiveness are the least safe. However, for a va- ty of reasons, 15-28% of the women who use the pill p taking it after two years. The interuterine de- e (I.U.D.) is not 100% effective though its fail- rate has not yet been fully determined. However, date, 50% of the women who use the I.U.D. have it oved within two years. Segal, PhD, ulation Council, and Christopher Tietze, M.D. Pop- tion Council, "Contraceptive Technology, Current Perfected Methods, Reports of Population Family nning," issued by the Population Council and the ernational Institute for the Study of Human Re- duction, Columbia University, October 1969, pp. 9 7.

The failure rate for the diaphragm is 12% (that is, 100 women using the diaphragm in a year, twelve en will become pregnant). The failure rate for the dom is 14%. Ernest Havamann, Ed., Time-Life, Inc. pecial Report: Birth Control, New York, 1967, p. 159.

January 1970, and continued in February and March. See "Competitive Problems in the Drug Industry," Subcommittee on Monopoly of Senate Select Committee on Small Business, 91st Cong. 2nd Sess. Although there has been a conflict of medical and scientific opinion expressed at the hearings, the response of the government to the question seems to be markedly casual in contrast with its swift action on a somewhat related matter -- cyclamates. It certainly leads women to believe that their government is less concerned with their health and safety than with curbing population or with health matters which also affect men. This concern on the part of women was not eased when they observed the action of the Food and Drug Administration with respect to warnings about possible dangers of birth control pills. Following the first part of the Senate hearings the F.D.A. ordered that a leaflet listing in detail the dangers of oral contraceptives be enclosed in each package of pills. New York Times, "Warning on Pill Drafted by F.D.A.", March 1970. Only one month later the Department of Health Education and Welfare announced that a "compromise" warning would be used. A warning "far shorter and less emphatic about dangers than [the] earlier version." The compromise version not only eliminated nearly the entire list of potential hazards, merely noting there might be side effects and further stated, without any basis in fact, "'These points were discussed with you when you chose this method of contraception.'" New York Times, "Compromise Warning on Birth Pill Announced" April 8, 1970.

Thus while governments profess their overelming concern for human life, they force their male citizens into the intolerable dilemma of oosing between what in many instances would be a tally irresponsible act of bearing and casting f, or even "raising" an unwanted child or jeoardizing their life and health, both physical d mental, by obtaining an illegal abortion or ttempting to self-abort. What is more, this prossed concern for life in fact results in hazards women's lives, often forcing them into the hands unskilled and unscrupulous persons directly in e face of the guarantees of the Fourteenth endment.

* It may be reassuring to note that a high use of bortion is generally coupled with a high use of ontraception. That is, women who use contraceptives have "a higher motivation toward fertility ontrol. They are likely to resort to abortion when ontraceptive efforts fail. The greater the expectation of avoiding pregnancy through contraception he greater the likelihood of an induced abortion nce pregnancy occurs..." "What is more, liberalization of abortion laws tends to accompany an increase in the use of contraceptives." B. The Right to Liberty

are to have any real meaning for women, they must no be read to protect only women's physical survival.
Fourteenth Amendment speaks not merely of life, but life and liberty. For the framers of our constituti recognized well that it is not life alone which must protected, but also personal liberty and freedom. B cause of that fact, the Constitution has established quirements that neither life nor liberty may be denie a person without the guarantees of due process.
As the Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit state in Madera v. Board of Education of the City of New Y 386 F.2d 778, 783-4(2nd Cir., 1967), invoking a long standing constitutional principle:

> '...The 'liberty' mentioned in [the Fourteenth] > Amendment means, not only the right of the > citizen to be free from the mere physical re> straint of his person by incarceration, but > the term is deemed to embrace the right of th > citizen to be free in the enjoyment of all hi > faculties; to live and work where he will; to > earn his livelihood by any lawful calling; to > pursue any livelihood or avocation....' Allgey
> v. State of Louisiana, 165 U.S. 578, 589, 17
> S.Ct. 427, 37 L.Ed. 832 (1897).

The right of liberty is one which is complex closely related to other rights protected by the Con tution. As stated by this Court in Smith v. Texas,
U.S. 630, 636 (1914),

> Liberty means more than freedom from servitu > and the constitutional guaranty is an assura > that the citizen shall be protected in the > to use [her] powers of mind or body in any l > ful calling.

The right of liberty has long been seen by thi Court as one which is basic to matters of family and ildren. In Meyer v. Nebraska, 262 U.S. 390, 399 (1823) is Court stated

> Without doubt 'liberty' denotes not merely freedom from bodily restraint but also the right of the individual to contract, to engage in any of the common occupations of life, and acquire undue knowledge, to marry, establish and home and bring up children, to worship God according to the dictates of his own conscience, and generally to enjoy those privileges long recognized at common law as essential to the orderly pursuit of happiness by free men.

should go without saying that the liberty to establish home and bring up children is nearly meaningless if it es not include the liberty to decide when and whether have those children. Of course, this right to control e timing of one's family is now express in Griswold v. nnecticut, 381 U.S. 479 (1965).

Even this does not circumscribe the limits of berty, however. As Justice Douglas expressed in his ssent in Poe v. Ulman, 367 U.S. 497, 516 (1961):

> Though I believe that 'due process' as used in the Fourteenth Amendment includes all of the first eight Amendments, I do not think it is restricted and confined to them.... The right 'to marry, establish a home and bring up children' was said in Meyer v. Nebraska ... to come within the 'liberty' of the person protected by the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment.... 'Liberty' is a conception that sometimes gains content from the examinations of other specific guarantees... or from experience with the requirements of a free society.

st recently the understanding of personal liberty has me to include such matters as physical appearance -- e way in which a person presents himself or herself to the world. In Breen v. Kahl, 296 F.Supp. 702, [illegible] (W.D.Wisc., 1969), aff'd 419 F.2d 1034 (7th Cir., 1969) the court ordered the reinstatement of high school students whose hair length did not conform to the school board standard stating:

> The freedom of an adult male or female to present himself or herself physically to the world in the manner of his or her own choice is a highly protected freedom....
>
> For the state to impair this freedom, in the absence of a compelling subordinating interest in doing so, would offend a widely shared concept of human dignity, would assault personality and individuality, would undermine identity, and would invade human 'being'. It would violate a basic value 'implicit in the concept of ordered liberty'. Palko v. Connecticut, 302 U.S. 219, 325....
> It would deprive a man or woman of liberty without due process of law in violation of the Fourteenth Amendment. See Griswold, 381 U.S. at 499-500 (Harlan, J., concurring).

Accord, Griffin v. Tatum, 300 F.Supp. 60 (M.D. Ala., 1969); Westley v. Rossi, 305 F.Supp. 706 (D. Minn., 1969); Durham v. Pulsiter, 312 F.Supp. 411 (D. Ut., 1970); Reitenberg v. Nelson, 310 F.Supp. 248 (D. Nebr., 1970).

The concept of the right to liberty is one which has developed from the right to contract in Allgeyer, to the right to raise a family in Meyer, to the right to control one's own appearance in Breen. Surely none of these rights can be seen as more basic, fundamental or worthy of protection than a woman's right to control her body and the nature, direction and quality of her life.

In light of this understanding of the meaning of the guarantees of the Fourteenth Amendment, it is even re critical that this Court carefully examine the ways which women are systematically deprived of their rights the abortion laws of Texas and Georgia as well as those nearly every state in the nation.

It should be obvious that from the moment a wo- n becomes pregnant her status in society changes as a sult of both direct and indirect actions of the govern- nt and because of social mores. Except in very rare ses (primarily among the wealthy) she is certainly no nger "free in the enjoyment of all [her] faculties; ... ee to use them in all lawful ways; to live and work ere [she] will; to earn [her] livelihood by any lawful lling; to pursue any livelihood or avocation...". Ma- ra v. Board of Education of the City of New York, su- a at 783-4.

Pregnancy, from the moment of conception, severe- limits a woman's liberty. In many cases of both pub- ic and private employment women are forced to temporar- ly or permanently leave their employment when they become regnant. The employer has no duty to transfer a preg- ant woman to a less arduous job during any stage of preg- ancy (should the woman or her doctor consider this advi- able); nor is there any statutory duty to rehire the wo- an after she gives birth. For example, under the New ork State Civil Service Law, Rule 3, a female employee ust report her pregnancy to the appointing authority ot later than the fourth month. The appointing au- hority then may in his discretion "...place the em- loyee on leave at any time when in its judgment the he interest of either the department or the employee ould be best served." [emphsis supplied] There is o indication that the employee's medical condition s the critical factor and there are no standards on hich the decision in made. What is plain is that re- ardless of whether the woman wishes and/or needs to ontinue working, regardless of whether she is physi- ally capable of working, she may nonetheless be re- uired to stop working solely because of her pregnancy. n many if not most states women who are public em- loyees are compelled to terminate their employment t some arbitrary date during pregnancy regardless of whether they are capable of continuing work. See for example Cohen v. Chesterfield County School Board, Civil Action No. 678-70-R (E.D.Va.) May 17, 1971; Schattman v. Texas Employment Commission, Civil Action No. A-70-CA-75 (W.D.Tex.) February 25, 1971; and LaFleur v. v. Cleveland School Board of Education, Civil Action No. C-71-292 N.D. Ohio, May 27, 1971.

In Connecticut a directive from the Attorney General in 1938 stated that a pregnant woman could not be employed "during the four weeks previous to and following her confinement." This rule still exists. In fact, such employment is a criminal offense (directed against the employer). This denial of liberty in one's work is accompanied by an unconstitutional taking of property, for Connecticut provides no maternity benefits. A woman is also denied unemployment compensation during her last two months of pregnancy, even when her unemployment is due to some reason other than pregnancy. CGST 31-236(5). Janello v. Administrator, Unemployment Compensation Act, 178 A.2d 282, 23 Conn. Supp. 155 (1961). If "total or partial unemployment is due to pregnancy," the woman is completely ineligible for benefits. Janello, supra at 156. Even worse, the employer has the absolute, arbitrary right to fire a pregnant woman when, in his estimation, her pregnancy would interfere with her work. Janello, supra at 157.

In Louisiana a recent amendment in 1968 of L. S.A.- R.S. 23:1601(6)(b) enables a woman who is forced to leave her employment either by contract or otherwise on account of pregnancy, to qualify for unemployment compensation. But, as illustrated in the case of Grape v. Brown, 231 So. 2d 663 (Ct. App. La., 1970) the unemployment compensation in no way adequately compensates either for the actual wages lost, or for the denial of liberty which forces a woman to receive unemployment compensation. Mary Grape was employed as a key punch operator by Southwestern Electric Power Co. When she became pregnant she was advised that the company policy required that expectant mothers terminate employment no later than the end of the 150th ay of pregnancy and that no leaves of absence would e granted. Thus she was forced onto unemployment ompensation and had lost her job.

Mississippi laws curtail even more severely he liberty of a woman and her property. Sec. 7379(a), iss. Code 1942 Rec. states that a married woman who as left work because of pregnancy is considered to ave voluntarily severed her employment without good ause and therefore is not even entitled to unemployent compensation. See Mississippi Employment Security Commission v. Corley, 148 So.2d 715 (Miss., 1963). hus, the pregnant woman loses her job, her source of ncome, and is forced to become economically dependent n others. The law is most harsh on pregnant women ho are heads of households, and depended upon as readwinners. Statistics show that a very high perent of all working women are in this position, i.e. hey must work to support themselves and/or their hildren.

But restrictions on a woman's liberty and proerty only begin with pregnancy. A woman worker with hildren is considered "unavailable for work" (which eans that she cannot qualify for unemployment compensation), if she restricts her hours of availability to late afternoon and night shifts so that she ay care for her children during the day. Connecticut courts have often held that "domestic responsibilities" are "personal reasons unrelated to employment," Lukenchuk v. Administrator, Unemp. Comp. Act, 176 A.2d 892, 23 Conn. Sup. 85 (Super. Ct., 1961) or "entirely disconnectied from any attribute of employment" Lenz v. Administrator, Unemp. Comp. Act, 17 Conn. Sup. 315 (Super. Ct.,1951). In one decision the court said that a woman had just five weeks to try to rearrange her life and her domestic responsibilities to try to make herself "available for work" according to Connecticut standards (i.e. ready to work at all hours of the day.) There is only one case that held that a woman who restricted her availability for personal reasons was entitled to unemployment compensation. The woman had seven children. Carani v. Danaher, 13 Conn. Supp.109(Super. Ct.,1943).

BLEED THROUGH

But the dominant belief is that a woman's "personal reasons" (in most cases, "domestic responsibilities") for seeking work during specific hours are not relevant to employment. Thus, women with home responsibilities (children or husband) -- who need or want to work -- are considered "unavailable for work." They are denied the freedom "to live and work where they will, to earn their livelihood by any lawful calling" Allgeyer v. Louisiana, supra and "to engage in any of the common occupations of life" Meyer v. Nebraska, supra -- freedoms that are implicit in the Fourteenth Amendment's "concept of ordered liberty." Palko v. Connecticut, 302 U.S. 319(1937). It becomes clear from Connecticut decisions on pregnant working women that the State of Connecticut considers pregnancy a "malady." Adams v. American Fastener Co., 7 Conn. Supp. 379(1939). Under these circumstances, a case can well be made that the anti-abortion law, in compelling a pregnant woman to continue this condition against her wishes, is not merely a denial of liberty, but also an imposition of cruel and unusual punishment on the woman. See Section III infra. "Confinement" well describes the situation of the pregnant woman, or mother, who is denied work, or restricted in her work because of an employer's decision on her ability to work.

Here we see how inextricably the rights to life and liberty are mixed and even more how laws restricting abortion deny women both.

Once a woman has given birth, according to the Court of Appeals for the Fifth Circuit, she may still be barred from employment as long as she has pre-school children. Phillips v. Martin Marietta Corp., 411 F.2d 1 (5th Cir., 1969). See Section II, infra, for a discussion of the treatment of Phillips by this Court. Furthermore, if she needs or merely wishes to work while she has pre-school children she cannot unless she is fortunate enough to have family who will care for the children or is wealthy enough to hire help. And, though a housekeeper, nurse, or baby sitter is a necessary expense enabling her to work, she may not deduct the salary of that person from her income tax 26 U.S.C.

214 and thus is normally left with little if any of her pay after those expenses are covered.

Thus as long as a woman has young children she is denied the right to obtain employment though her "...power to earn a living for [herself] and those dependant upon [her] is in the nature of personal liberty." Smith v. Hill, 285 F.Supp. 556, 560 (D.N.C., 1968).

A further denial of liberty results from the fact that women are generally forced to arbitrarily end their education because of pregnancy. Until recently, girls who became pregnant were forced to drop out of public school in New York. In New York City, Central Harlem, more than forty percent of the girls who leave school before graduation do so because of pregnancy. Haryou, 1964, Youth in the Ghetto, N.Y. Orans Press, p. 185. This still happens in countless other cities throughout the country as well. See, for example, Perry v. Grenada Municipal Separate School District, 300 F.Supp. 748 (N.D.Miss., 1969). Many women are also deprived of higher education because of college rules requiring that pregnant women leave school.

The importance of education in modern society has been stressed and restressed in recent years, since Chief Justice Warren stated in Brown v. Board of Education, 347 U.S. 483, 493 (1954):

> Today, education is perhaps the most important function of state and local governments.... It is required in the performance of our most basic public responsibilities.... It is the very foundation of good citizenship. Today it is a principal instrument in awakening..cultural values, in preparing...for later professional training and in helping...to adjust normally to his environment.

It has been recognized more recently that there are special problems for women in obtaining education for though "men and women are equally in need of continuing education...at present women's opportunities are more limited than men's." American Women: Report of the President's Commission on the Status of Women, 1963, p. 11. Nonetheless, women are robbed of their education and opportunity for any development and self-fulfillment; robbed of their rights to be "free in the enjoyment of all (their) faculties," Madera, supra, at 783-4, by chance an unwanted pregnancy.

The incursions on the liberty of an unmarried woman who becomes pregnant are even more severe. She too may be fired from her job and is even more likely to be compelled to discontinue her education. Unable to terminate her pregnancy, she is often forced into marriage against her will and better judgment in an attempt to cope with the new economic and social realities of her life. Such marriages are forced on women despite the fact that the right to marry or not to marry may not be invaded by the state. Loving v. Virginia, 388 U.S. 1 (1967).*

Of course, frequently, the man who is responsible for the pregnancy refuses to marry her. Then unable to support herself she may be forced to become a welfare recipient, become part of that cycle of poverty, and expose herself to the personal humiliation, loss of personal liberty and inadequate income that entails.

To further add to her difficulties, the mere

* The reaction of forcing a pregnant girl or woman into marriage as a "solution" to an unwanted out-of-wedlock pregnancy is exemplified by the ruling of a Maryland court in 1955, waiving the marriage age requirments to permit a thirteen year old pregnant girl to marry. Harold Rosen, M.D., Psychiatric Implications of Abortion, A Case Study of Social Hypocrisy, 17 Wes.R.L.Rev. 454, at 454.

act of her out-of-wedlock pregnancy or child resulting from that pregnancy may be used as "some evidential or presumptive effect" to a decision to exclude or remove her from public housing. Thorpe v. Housing Authority, 393 U.S. 268, 271 (1969). Thus, having been forced to bear a child she did not want, she may be deprived of her right and ability to provide for herself and her child either because of employer policies or because of her inability to leave the child. Surviving on at least marginal income, she who is most obviously in need of public housing is then deprived of decent shelter because of the existence of that very same child.

For a woman perhaps the most critical aspect of liberty is the right to decide when and whether she will have a child -- with all the burdens and limitations on her freedom which that entails. But that has been robbed from her by men who make the laws which govern her.

As early as 1848 women spoke out against the way in which men controlled their lives -- denied them of any meaningful liberty. At the Women's Rights Convention held in Seneca Falls, New York, on July 14, 1848, the women spoke of men as follows:

> He has compelled her (woman) to submit to laws in the formation of which she has no voice.... He has taken all her rights to property, even to the wages she earns.... In the covenant of marriage...the law (gives) him power to deprive her of her liberty and to administer chastisement.... He closes against her all the avenues of wealth and distinction which he considers most honorable to himself.... He has denied her the facilities for obtaining a thorough education.... He has endeavored in every way that he could to destroy her confidence in her own powers, to lessen her self-respect, and to make her willing to lead an abject life. Victory, How Women Won It, National American Woman Suffrage Association, A Centennial Symposium, 1840-1940, H.W. Wilson Co., 1940, pp. 15-25.

Restrictive laws governing abortion such as th of Texas and Georgia are a manifestation of the fact t men are unable to see women in any role other than tha of mother and wife. Furthermore,

> So long as he continues to think and write, to speak and act, as if maternity was the one and sole object of a woman's existence -- so long as children are conceived in weariness and disgust -- you must not look for high-toned men and women capable of accomplishing any great and noble achievement.*

As recently as July 12, 1971 the Supreme Court of the State of Florida reversed three convictions for conspiracy to commit abortion. In the concluding sentence of its opinion the Court stated: "In sum the [abortion] statute intrudes into the area of personal liberty of women and does it crudely in vague, uncertain, archaic language." Walsingham v. Florida, supra slip opinion, p. 15, Ervin, J., Concurring.

The Florida statute does not alone abridge a woman's fundamental right to liberty. The statutes of Georgia, Texas and nearly every other state in the nation similarly deny to women throughout the country their most precious right to control their lives and bodies.

II. THE GEORGIA AND TEXAS STATUTES RESTRICTING THE AVAILABILITY OF ABORTIONS DENY WOMEN THE EQUAL PROTECTION OF THE LAWS GUARANTEED TO THEM BY THE FOURTEENTH AMENDMENT.

The express guarantee of equal protection was originally designed to protect black people. Since that time, its protection has been greatly extended. First the courts extended equal protection to protect Chinese, Yick Wo v. Hopkins, 118 U.S. 356 (1886). More recently it has been extended to protect aliens, Takahashi v. Fish and Game Commission, 334 U.S. 410 (1948); Mexican American, Hernandez v. Texas, 347 U.S. 475 (1954), and poor persons, Griffin v. Illinois, 351 U.S. 12 (1956); Douglas v. California, 372 U.S. 353 (1963), and Shapiro v. Thompson, 394 U.S. 618 (1969).

Most recently federal estate courts have begun to apply the guarantees of the equal protection of the laws to prohibit discrimination against women.

In White v. Crook, 251 F. Supp. 401 (M.D. Ala. 1966) exclusion of women and Negroes from Alabama juries was held unconstitutional. In United States ex rel Robinson v. York, 281 F. Supp. 8, (D. Conn. 1968) differential sentences for men and women were struck down as "invidious discrimination against [women] which is repugnant to the equal protection of the laws guaranteed in the Fourteenth Amendment. In Kirstein v. Rector and Visitors of the University of Virginia, 309 F. Supp. 184 (E.D. Va. 1970) a three judge court held that the exclusion of women from the University of Virginia violated their rights to the equal protection of the laws. In 1970 a federal District Court in New York held that a public tavern could not deny service to a woman. Seidenberg v. McSorely's Ale House, Inc., 317 F.Supp. 583 (S.D.N.Y., 1970).

More recently the Supreme Court of the state of California rejected the ruling of this Court in Muller v. Oregon, 208 U.S. 412 (1908) to find that laws restricting women from being bartenders except in the most limited circumstances stand in violation of the guarantees of the Fourteenth Amendment. Sail'er Inn v. Kirby, # 29811 Sup. Ct. Calif. May 27, 1971.

BLEED THROUGH

Federal district courts have also looked to the guarantees of equal protection to invalidate regulations compelling female employees to take a leave of absence from work because of pregnancy. Cohen v. Chesterfield County School Board, # 678-70-R (E.D.Va.) (May 17, 1971) Schattman v. Texas Employment Commission, # A-70-Ca-75 (W.D. Tex.) (April 16, 1971) Order Denying Motion for Relief from Judgment. See also Mengelkoch v. Industrial Welfare Commission, 437 F. 2d 563 (9th Cir. 1971) holding that plaintiffs' challenge to California protective labor laws raised substantial constitutional questions.

Despite the fact that women are entitled to the equal protection of the laws, one major area in which they are daily denied that protection is in the area of abortion.

Man and woman have equal responsibility for the act of sexual intercourse. Should the woman accidentally become pregnant, against her will, however, she endures in many instances the entire burden or "punishment."

In obtaining an abortion, the threats and punishments fall on the woman. This happens even where the decision to have an abortion has been a mutual one. Only the woman is subjected to the variety of threats which often accompany the painful search for abortion - the threats of frightened or hostile doctors of giving her name to the police - the threat of subpoena and/or prosecution if the doctor who would help her is arrested.

It is often said that if men could become pregnant or if women sat in the legislatures there would no longer be laws prohibiting abortion. This is not said in jest. It reaches to the heart of the unequal position of women with respect to the burdens of bearing and raising children and the fact that they are robbed of the ability to choose whether they wish to bear those burdens.

And the woman carries an unequal and greater share of the burden, not merely for nine months, but for many years, all in violation of the equal protection of the laws, as we shall discuss below. The abortion laws therefore present a rather unusual constitutional situation. At first glance, it would appear that the concept of equal protection of the laws might not even apply to abortion since the laws relate only to women. However, when we look beyond the face of the laws to their effect, we see that the constitutional test of equal protection must be applied.* For the effect of the laws is to force women, against their will, into a position in which they will be subjected to a whole range of de facto forms of discrimination based on the status of pregnancy and motherhood.

As we have discussed at length above, a woman who has a child is subject to a whole range of de jure and de facto punishments, disabilities and limitations to her freedom from the earliest stages of pregnancy. In the most obvious sense she alone must bear the pains and hazards of pregnancy and childbirth. She may be suspended or expelled from school and thus robbed of her opportunity for education and self-development. She may be fired or suspended from her employment and thereby denied the right to earn a living and, if single and without independent income, forced into the degrading position of living on welfare.

For example, many if not most employers including public employers have policies requiring pregnant women to take a leave of absense or otherwise terminate their employment at a given stage of pregnancy. Recently the case of LaFleur v. Cleveland Board of Education, # C-71-292 N.D. Ohio, May 12, 1971 upheld one such regulation. Contra, Cohen > exclude absolutely any consideration of the normal relationship of working father to their pre-school age children and to require that an employer treat the two exactly alike in the administration of its general hiring policies. Phillips v. Martin Marietta, supra, 411 F. 2d at 4.

Only this winter this Court effectively affirmed that court's ruling with Justice Marshall dissenting by holding that

> The existence of such conflicting family obligations, if demonstrably more relevant to job performance for a woman than for a man, could arguably be a basis for distinction under §703(e) of the [civil rights] Act. Phillips v. Martin Marietta Corp. 91 S. Ct. 496, 498 (1971).

In other words this court said if men refuse to share equally in the care of their children then women may be doubly burdened - they may be burdened with the responsibilities of child care and they may be deprived of employment opportunities as well.

If a woman is unmarried, unless she succeeds in obtaining an abortion, she has no choice but to bear the child, while the man who shares responsibility for her pregnancy can, and often does, just walk away.

As a practical matter, the woman is then alone with the problem of seeking and financing an abortion and if that fails, she is alone paying the expenses of pre-natal care and childbirth and raising and supporting the child. She could seek to establish paternity of the father and therefore some measure of financial responsibility, However, to do this she must expose herself to accusations by the father concerning her sexual behavior as part of his attempt to avoid legal responsibility for the child. In some states she would further be forced to admit the commission of a crime, e.g. D.C. Code § 22-1002 (Crime of Fornication). Furthermore, although in most areas a parent has the legal responsibility to support his or her child whether married or single, e.g. D.C. Code §22-903, in some of those same places a parent will only be punished for neglect where married -- thus the irresponsibility of the man who walks away from the child he has helped to create is reinforced by the rule of law. For example, under New York law the mother is expressly liable for child support if the father is unable to support the child or cannot be found within the state. New York Family Court Act § 414.

In Texas, a father of an out-of-wedlock child has neither the common law nor the statutory duty to support his child. Home of Holy Infancy v. Kaska, 397 S.W. 2d 208 (Tex. 1965). See also Lane v. Phillips, 6 S.W. 610 (Tex. 1887), Beaver v. State, 256 S.W. 929 (Cr. App. Tex., 1923).

Having been forced to give birth to a child she did not want, a woman may be subject to criminal sanctions for child neglect, e.g., D.C. Code §22-902, if she does not care for the child to the satisfaction of the state. In some states even here the disabilities for the woman are greater than for the man. The New York courts seem to have found as a matter of law that the mother has a greater responsibility for the child than the father. In the case of People v. Edwards, 42 Misc. 2d 930, 249 N.Y.S. 2d 325 (1964), though the father and mother were jointly indicted for failure to provide shelter and medical attention for their baby, the court held that only the mother could be punished for failing to bring the baby to a doctor when a condition which began with a diaper rash resulted in the child's death. Of course, again, if the woman is unmarried and paternity was never legally established, the woman bears these legal burdens alone.

The unwed mother may suffer additional disabilities by being denied employment because of her status. Courts are gradually recognizing the inequities of so penalizing unwed mothers. Nonetheless, not every woman is in a position to go to court to contest such discriminatory actions and many such policies and practices still exist throughout the country unchallenged.

Even where the father is present, the mother rather than father will be primarily responsible for raising the children. As long as "women, as a class earn less than men." Gruenwald v. Gardner, 390 F.2d 591 (2d Cir., 1968), and women have less opportunity for advancement, they, rather than the father, will remain at home to raise the family.

The rulings of the Fifth Circuit and this Court in Phillips v. Martin Marietta, supra, further reinforce this arbitrary role differentiation, forcing the greater burden on child care on the mother. For in saying that a mother of pre-school age children may constitutionally be denied employment though a father may not, the power and authority of the courts is reinforcing the actions of private employers and society to force a woman to 'stay at home and take care of the children' even if she has otherwise provided for their care.

If such a broad range of disabilities are permitted to attach to the status of pregnancy and motherhood, that status must be one of choice. And it is not sufficient to say that the women "chose" to have sexual intercourse, for she did not choose to become pregnant. As long as she is forced to bear such an extraordinarily disproportionate share of the pains and burdens of childrearing (including, of course, pregnancy and childbirth), then, to deprive her of the ultimate choice as to whether she will in fact bear those burdens violates the most basic aspects of "our American ideal of fairness" guaranteed and enshrined in the Fourteenth Amendment. Bolling v. Sharpe, 347 U.S. 497 (1954).

There is yet another way in which women are denied the equal protection of the laws. This Court has shown great concern with the "conception of political equality" Reynolds v. Sims, 377 U.S. 533, 558 (1964) and particualrly with "questions of alleged 'invidious discriminations * * * against groups or types of individuals in violation of the constitutional guaranty of just and equal laws.'" Reynolds v. Sims, supra, 377 U.S. at 561 citing Skinner v. Oklahoma, 316 U.S. 535, 536 (1942). Because of this concern, in a line of cases the court has sought to guarantee that each citizen is fairly and equally represented in the legislature which make laws governing his or her life. See Baker v. Carr, 369 U.S. 186 (1962), Reynolds v. Sims, supra, and their progeny. Nevertheless, in the instance of abortion laws one finds the grossest form of lack of representation.

This court can surely take judicial notice of the fact that the state legislatures in Texas and Georgia, like state legislatures throughout the country are composed almost exclusively of men. As the supreme court of the state of Oregon stated in State v. Hunter, 300 P. 2d 455,457-7,208 Ore. 282 (Ore., 1956).

> ...We believe that we are justified in taking judicial notice of the fact that the membership of the legislative assembly which enacted this statute was predominately masculine. That fact is important in determining what the legislature might have had in mind with respect to this particular statute...

Therefore we have a situation in which persons are making laws which could never possibly effect them.*

These laws which are passed largely by men and only affect women were first instituted many years prior to the time that women even had the vote. The Georgia statute was enacted in 1876, the Texas in 1907. This relationship between the legislators and the laws they are making is even more complex than it may appear on the surface. For laws such as the abortion laws presently before this court in fact insure that women never will be able to function fully in the society in a manner that will enable them to participate as equals with men in making the laws which control and govern their lives. For as long as women are unable to control their reproductive lives they will be forced to disrupt their education, forego their career, and will never be a totally functioning part of the government which determines her rights. Forced to remain at home with her children a woman has neither the time, the money, nor the mobility to either organize an effective lobby on her own behalf or to assert her own rights as a direct participant in the legislative workings of government. The underrepresented city dweller could not realistically look to the rural dominated legislature to rectify the inequality of representation, nor could black people look to a white controlled legislature to eliminate the gerrymandering which cheapened their votes. Gomillion v. Lightfoot, 364 U.S. 339 (1960). Neither can women realistically look to male controlled legislatures to change laws which will return to them the control of their lives and bodies and that may incidentally ree them to actively participate in those same legisatures. Therefore, if women are to have their rights edressed they can look only to the courts.*

* Amici have not addressed themselves to the economic discrimination resulting from the application of the abortion laws of Texas and Georgia on the understanding that the issue is being treated fully by other amici and by parties to the litigation. Amici are deeply concerned, however about the economic hardship and blatant economic discrimination effected by such laws restricting the availability of legal abortion.

III. ABORTION LAWS VIOLATE THE CONSTITUTIONAL GUARANTEE AGAINST THE IMPOSITION OF CRUEL AND UNUSUAL PUNISHMENT.

To understand what having an unwanted pregnancy and child means to a woman, it may be best to consider the following analogy: a group of people are walking along the street. Half the group crosses; the remainder are stopped by a red light. Those stopped by the light are told the following:

> "From now on, for about nine months, you are going to have to carry a twenty-five pound pack on your back. Now, you will have to endure it, whether you develop ulcers under the load whether your spine becomes deformed, no matter how exhausted you get, you and this are inseparable.
> Then, after nine months you may drop this load, but from then on you are going to have it tied to your wrist. So that, wherever you go this is going to be with you the rest of your life and if, by some accident, the rope is cut or the chain is cut, that piece of rope is always going to be tied to you to remind you of it."*

Of course, this analogy is not complete. It does not include the extreme, sometimes excruciating pain and risk of death involved with the process of transferring the pack from your back to your wrist, nor does it fully describe the limitations placed on your liberty by having that load chained to your wrist for a substantial portion, if not all of your life. It does, however, begin to give some picture of the pain and burden of pregnancy and motherhood when both are involuntary. Forcing a woman to bear a child against her will is indeed a form of punishment, a result of society's ambivalent attitude towards female sexuality. The existe the sexual "double standard" has created the social sponse that when a woman becomes pregnant accident- ly, she must be "punished" for her transgression, rticularly if she is single. This punishment falls lely on the woman: she must face the physical burdens d emotional strains of an unwanted pregnancy, the grading experience of having an illegal abortion ften in filthy motel rooms at the mercy of quacks who e charging exhorbitant fees." Ervin, J. concurring, lsingham v. Florida, Case No. 40,210 (S.Ct. Fla., ly 12, 1971), and if unable to get such an abortion, e responsibilities and trauma involved in raising an wanted child. The man equally responsible for the egnancy faces no such punishment.

Those who seek to impose the punishment of forc- g a woman to bear a child against her will could not considering its scope and dimensions. Such a punish- nt condemns a woman to severe physical burden, pain and bor not only during pregnancy, but also through the rth process and after the child is born, imposing on r years of toil and loss of freedom. To deny an un- rried woman an abortion is even more obviously a nishment and an act of greater cruelty as she is tally alone, with all of the physical, financial and cial burdens of raising a child.

The Eighth Amendment to the United States Consti- tion protects all persons against the infliction of ruel and unusual punishment." Amici contend that the panding constitutional concern, as expressed by this urt, with practices which "offend the dignity of man", e contrary to "the evolving standards of decency that rk the progress of a maturing society" and punishment isproportionate to the offense committed" as violative the Eighth Amendment necessitates a finding that laws stricting abortion are unconstitutional

In 1910, the Supreme Court in Weems v. United tates, 217 U.S. 349 (1910), repudiated the nineteenth ntury assumption that the punishments proscribed by the ighth Amendment were limited to the barbarous practices of seventeenth century England. "The Cruel and Unusual Punishment Clause and The Substantive Criminal Law" 79 Harv.L.Rev. 635, 636-7 (1966). The Court in Weems, invalidating a section of the Phillipine Penal Code authorizing a sentence of 15 years hard labor and concomitant forfeiture of citizenship rights noted that a "principle to be vital must be capable of wider application than the mischief which gave it birth," 217 U.S. at 373. Further the Court held that the Eighth Amendment "is not fastened to the obsolete but may acquire meaning as public opinion becomes enlightened by a humane justice." 217 U.S. at 367. Underlying the Court's holding was the concept of "proportional punishment" as a "precept of the fundamental law." Significantly, the Court considered the moral stigma and mental anguish suffered as a result of such punishment to be of equal relevance as the purely physical burden imposed.

In Trop v. Dulles, 356 U.S. 86 (1958), invalidating a punishment of denaturalization for desertion as unconstitutional in violation of the Eighth Amendment, the Court again emphasized the standard of proportion, and the flexible, expansive nature of the Eighth Amendment's ban, while declaring their willingness to apply the Eighth Amendment affirmatively to protect individual liberty. Noting that the "traditional" punishment for desertion was death, the court rejected the notion that "excessiveness" alone was determinative of constitutional validity. Instead, the Court asserted that "the question is whether the punishment subjects the individual to a fate forbidden by the principle of civilized treatment guaranteed by the Eighth Amendment." 356 U.S. at 99. "The basic concept underlying the Eighth Amendment is nothing less than the dignity of man." 356 U.S. at 100. The Amendment, the Court noted, was not a static one; it "must draw its meaning from evolving standards of decency that mark the progress of a maturing society." 356 U.S. at 101. In setting a standard for the application of the Amendment, the Court rejected, as well, an exclusive concern with the physical aspect of punishment, forbidding what it characterized as "the total destruction of the individual's status in organized society." 356 U.S. at 101.

lifornia, 370 U.S. 660 (1962). In that case, the urt held that a state law which made the "status" of rcotics addiction a criminal offense constituted ruel and unusual punishment" in violation of the arantees of the Eighth Amendment. For Justice Doug- s stated in his analysis of the constitutional de- lopment of the Eighth Amendment; Douglas, J. concur- ng at 675:

> The historic punishments that were cruel and unusual included "burning at the stake, crucifixion, breaking on the wheel" (In re Kemmler, 136 U.S. 436, 446, 10 S.Ct. 930,933 34 L.Ed. 519) quartering, the rack and the thumbscrew (see Chambers v. Florida, 309 U.S. 227, 237, 60 S.Ct. 472, 477, 84 L.Ed. 716) and in some circumstances even solitary confinement (See In re Medley, 134 U.S. 160, 167-8, 10 S.Ct. 384, 386, 33 L.Ed. 835). The question presented in the earlier cases concerned the degree of severity with which a particular offense was punished or the element of cruelty present. A punishment out of all proportion to the offense may bring it within the ban against "cruel and unusual punishment." See O'Neil v. Vermont, 144 U.S. 323, 331, 12 S.Ct. 693, 696, 36 L.Ed.450. So may the cruelty of the method of punishment as, for example, disemboweling a person alive. See Wilkerson v. Utah, 99 U.S. 130, 135, 25 L.Ed. 345. But the principle that would deny power to exact capital punishment for a petty crime would also deny power to punish a person by fine or imprisonment for being sick.

The essence of the Eighth Amendment, as evolved n the cases discussed above, lies in its concern with he "disproportionate" nature of the punishment im- osed, the moral anguish as well as physical burdens f punishment, the extent to which punishment is a re- sponse to an individual's 'status' and is measured by volving standards of decency", and offensiveness to the "dignity of man." Laws which force women to endure unwanted pregnancy and motherhood against their will or to become criminals and take the risks to physical and mental health resulting from an illegal abortion are disproportionate to the act for which they are being punished --an act which, in many instances, is not even illegal. Further, amici contend that abortions, in fact if not in theory, punish women for private, sexual activity for which only women bear the repercussions of pregnancy, therefore punishing them for their status as women and potential child-bearers.

The pain and suffering associated with an unwanted pregnancy or child, is not solely physical pain. The emotional pain and scarring which accompanies an unwanted pregnancy is an equally important and far more lasting form of pain which must be considered in the context of guarantees of the Eighth Amendment, and the emphasis given to mental anguish as a crucial component of "cruel and unusual punishment." According to Dr. Natalie Shainess, who has devoted the majority of her 25-year practice as a psychoanalyst and psychiatrist to the area of feminine psychology and particularly with experience of being a mother, a woman who does not want her pregnancy suffers depression through nearly the entire pregnancy and often that depression is extremely severe. Furthermore, according to Dr. Shainess that depression continues even after birth may even go into psychotic states, and may result in permanent emotional damage to the woman.

Such potential permanent emotional damage, the risks to physical health and safety which may also result in permanent physical harm, see Fletcher v. State, 362 S.W.2d 845 (Cr.App.Tex., 1962), and the burdens of taking care of an unwanted child, constitute a form of long-term imprisonment. Such long term imprisonment, "could be so disproportionate to the offense as to fall within the inhibition" of the Eighth Amendment. Hancock v. United States, 163 F.2d 228 (6th Cir., 1947). For most women, bearing and raising an unwanted child is rse, it is life-term imprisonment. For the woman, the anted pregnancy may also carry with it the trauma of ing rejected or mistreated by the man when he learns the pregnancy. Under such conditions, the child re-lting from the relationship would constitute a lasting d omnipresent reminder of the suffering the woman ex-rienced from the man. Such a life-long reminder is form of constant punishment that the woman should not forced to face. When she is forced into that situa-on, however, not only does she suffer emotionally, t her suffering is manifested in her relations with r child. She may vent her anger by physically injur-g the child,* neglecting the child, or being extreme-over protective, virtually "smothering" the child otionally.

According to New York law as interpreted by its urts, a "child at tender age is entitled to have such re, love and discipline as only a good and devoted ther can usually give," Ullman v. Ullman, 151 A.D. 9, 135 N.Y.S. 80 (1912) (emphasis added); it is en-tled to care which includes its "spiritual and moral fe" In re Roe, 92 N.Y.S.2d 882, 883, 196 Misc. 830 om.Rel.Ct., 1949). Nonetheless, the State, by its in-stence on the right to life for the fetus, practically sures that once born, the child will receive neither e care, love, nor spiritual and moral life to which it entitled. If indeed, the unwanted child is a hated ild, in denying women the right to abortion Texas, orgia, and all other states with laws which restrict ortion are punishing not only the mother, but also e very child they claim to protect. Furthermore, under w York law a mother is required to give "care, guid-ce, supervision, love and affection," In re Carl, 174 sc. 955, 22 N.Y.S.2d 782, 784 (Dom.Rel., 1940), to the child she never wanted in the first place and she is punished if she is unable to.

By denying women the right to abortion the state is punishing her for her sexual activity with the equivalent of long-term imprisonment and giving her an indeterminate sentence of life with an unwanted child. Sentencing a woman to a full term pregnancy and motherhood against her will is thus a clear violation of her right to be free from cruel and unusual punishment. The words of this Court in Weems, supra, are most appropriate in describing such a "sentence."

> [Her] prison bars and [some] chains are removed, it is true after [nine months], but [she] goes from them to a perpetual limitation of [her] liberty. [She] is forever kept under the shadow of [her] crime....
> ...[She] is subject to tormenting regulations that, if not so tangible as iron bars and stone walls, oppress as much by their continuity, and deprive of essential liberty. It may be that even the cruelty of pain is not omitted. [She] must bear a chain night and day. [She] is condemned to painful as well as hard labor. 30 S.Ct. at 549.

Even where the woman decides she cannot endure the pains and penalties of pregnancy and motherhood, which the law attempts to force on her, she is still exposed to what may be the great physical and emotional pain and the far greater danger of illegal abortion. It has long been thought that abortion in and of itself caused substantial destructive emotional effects on women. More recently, however, a number of studies have shown that when abortions are legally obtained women do not suffer psychological harm as a result of their experience, but rather in most cases their emotional status improves and many report that they experience emotional growth as a result of the abortion experience. Pratt, Rappaport & Barlow, Arch. Gen. Psychiat., 20:408-414 (1969).

It is no answer to suggest that the woman may always choose to minimize her pain by placing the child for adoption following birth -- performing the function of "commodity" or a "baby breeder". For as one woman has movingly described:*

> The kind of trauma of giving a baby up for adoption leaves you with the feeling of -- at least I had my feeling about it as a mother -- I was a mother who had abandoned my child and I fought against this self-concept.
> I prepared to think of myself as a breeder, I was just breeding babies for someone else to take rather than think of myself as a mother who abandoned her baby.
>
> But the guilt -- for months after I left the home, I'd wake up in the night crying and sort of rocking my pillow and this feeling sometimes of deprivation but ... the guilt was stronger than the feeling that someone else had deprived, someone had ripped the baby from my arms.
> I would have been more comfortable that way than what I did, because I actually signed the papers and gave the baby up.

For this woman, and for many others, this experience carries with it a further overwhelming sense of guilt at having done something shameful -- a sense of guilt which may haunt her for years after and which, in the same person, will not develop in connection with an abortion -- even an illegal abortion. Such mental anguish, and the emotional harm which ultimately results is certainly disproportionate to the act for which a woman is being punished, and constitutes cruel and unusual punishment for her.

Finally, some might feel that whereas it may be constitutionally impermissible to deny a married woman an abortion, it is permissible to force an unmarried woman to see her pregnancy and its consequences through as a "deterrent to her immorality." However, not only is such a position unconstitutional, it is irrational. Compared with a married woman, an unmarried woman is likely to experience even greater unconstitutional deprivations of her liberty, as a result of the greater pain and suffering from being forced to bear and raise an unwanted child with no help from the man who is equally responsible for the conception of that child. Furthermore, both she and the child will become a financial "burden" on the society if she is forced to go on welfare.

Millions of women are now becoming truly conscious of the manifold forms of oppresion and discrimination of their sex in our society. They are beginning to publicly express their outrage at what they have always known - that bearing and raising a child that they do not want is indeed cruel and unusual punishment. Such punishment involves not only an indeterminate sentence and a loss of citizenship rights as an independent person as held unconstitutional in Weems, supra, great physical hardship and emotional damage 'disproportionate' to the "crime" of participating equally in sexual activity with a man, as held unconstitutional in Trop, supra, but is punishment for her 'status' as a woman and a potential child-bearer as held unconstitutional in Robinson, supra. As this Court in Trop so firmly stated, the concept underlying the Eighth Amendment is "nothing less than the dignity of man" 356 U.S. at 100 and "must draw its meaning from evolving standards of decency" at 101. Abortion laws reinforce the legally legitimized indignities that women have already suffered under for too long and bear witness to the inferior position to which women are relegated. The total destruction of a woman's status in society results from compelling her to take sole responsibility for having the illegal abortion or bear the unwanted child, and suffer the physical hardship and mental anguish whichever she chooses. Only the woman is punished by society for an act in which she has participated equally, only she is punished for her "status" as child-bearer. In light of "evolving standards of decency that mark the progress of a maturing society", the basis of the Eighth Amendment as set forth in Trop, supra, the struggle of women for full and meaningful equality in society over the last hundred years indicates that it would indeed be a sign of the immaturity of our social development if these laws were upheld. White persons have had to readjust their thinking and actions to question whether laws which discriminated against blacks were unconstitutional.

Men (of whom the legislatures and courts are almost exclusively composed) must now learn that they may not constitutionally impose the cruel penalties of unwanted pregnancy and motherhood on women, where the penalties fall solely on them.

IV. THERE IS NO COMPELLING STATE INTEREST JUSTIFYING THE VIOLATION OF FUNDAMENTAL CONSTITUTIONAL RIGHTS EFFECTED BY THE CHALLENGED ABORTION LAWS.

Historically under common law and in the early years of American law, abortion was legally permissible before the fetus was "quick" inside the mother. See generally, Cyril S. Means, Jr., "The Law of New York Concerning Abortion and the Status of the Fetus, 1664-68: A Case of Cessation of Constitutionality," 14 N.Y.L.F. 411, Feb. 1968; and Roy Lucas, "Federal Constitutional Limitations on the Enforcement and Administration of State Abortion Statutes," 46 N.C. L. Rev. 732, June 1968. The adoption of laws regulating (and almost effectively eliminating) legal abortion came about for a combination of three major reasons, none of which can any longer constitutionally justify the extreme incursion into and violation of protected rights effected by the challenged abortion laws. The three reasons were: (a) "compelling uniform adherence to specified moral norms ...[by] (l)egal bans on both contraception and all abortion...." Lucas, supra, p. 732, i.e., moral norms regarding sexual relations; (b) protecting the health of the mother from the dangers then inherent in any operation, Lucas, supra, p. 732; Means, supra; and (c) enforcing the newly established religious concept that the soul was present in the body from the time of conception. Lawrence Lader, Abortion, Beacon Press, Boston, 1966.

The operation and effect of the challenged Georgia and Texas abortion laws directly violate plaintiffs' constitutionally protected rights of life, liberty, equal protection, personal privacy of associations and others as well. As the Supreme Court of California stated in California v. Belous, supra, 80 Cal.Rptr. at 360:

> The critical issue is not whether such rights exist, but whether the state has a compelling interest in the regulation of a subject which is within the police powers of the state (Shapiro v. Thompson (1969), 394 U.S. 618, 89 S.Ct. 1322, 22 L.Ed.2d 600; Sherbert v. Verner, (1963), 374 U.S. 398, 403, 83 S.Ct. 1790, 10 L.Ed.2d 965), whether the regulation is "necessary  to the accomplishment of a permissible state policy" (McLaughlin v. Florida (1964), 379 U.S. 184, 196, 85 S.Ct. 283, 290, 13 L.Ed.2d 222; see also, NAACP v. Button, 371 U.S. 415, 438, 83 S.Ct. 328, 9 L.Ed.2d 105; Bates v. City of Little Rock (1960) 361 U.S. 516, 527, 80 S.Ct. 412, 4 L.Ed.2d 480; Huntley v. Public Util. Comm. 69 A.C. 62, 69 Cal. Rptr. 605, 442 P.2d 685; Vogel v. County of Los Angeles, 68 Cal.2d 18, 21, 64 Cal. Rptr. 409, 434 P.2d 961; People v. Woody, 61 Cal.2d 716, 718, 40 Cal.Rptr. 69, 394 P.2d 813.

The fact that the abortion laws may have been valid when first enacted does not resolve the questions concerning the present constitutionality of the law. California v. Belous, supra, at 362. Compare Gray v. Sanders, 372 U.S. 368, 381 (1963) with South v. Peters, 339 U.S. 276, 277 (1950); Baker v. Carr, 369 U.S. 186, 237 (1962); with Colgrove v. Green, 328 U.S. 549, 556 (1946); Brown v. Board of Education, supra, with Plessy v. Ferguson, 163 U.S. 537 (1896).

Most persons who seek to justify the constitutionality of abortion laws would now concede that the first two of the three justifications mentioned above are no longer able to sustain abortion laws which take such great tolls on the lives of women.

It is common knowledge that an abortion no longer entails the danger it did in the mid 1800's and early 1900's when the Texas and Georgia abortion laws as well as the laws of nearly all the other states were first enacted. In fact, as pointed out above, there is considerable evidence that abortion now carries about the same, if not lesser risks then childbirth. See p. 10, supra. Therefore the medical rationalization to sustain abortion restrictions can be easily dispensed with.

As for the use of abortion laws to ensure the community standard of morality, it should be clear from this Court's decision in Griswold v. Connecticut, supra, 381 U.S. at 498, Justice Goldberg, Warren and Brennan, concurring that such an argument is not constitutionally sufficient. See also Walsingham v. Florida, supra, slip opinion, p. 12, which notes that the abortion statutes themselves "...[do] not show a compelling state interest in prohibiting premarital sexual intercourse (the prelude to unwed mothers) since [they draw] no distinction between married and unmarried women." In any case it is quite evident that the "community" standard is at present a changing one. Furthermore, we must consider just who is the community. For on this particular issue there are at minimum two communities -- the community of men and the community of women. Normally, we cannot and should not consider legislation from such a perspective but in this case we can and must. For, here we have legislation which is made by men [see Page 32-33, supra] who are never directly affected by it (except to the extent that they fear that they themselves might never have been born were there no abortion law). It is women, who at best have an indirect voice in the determination of these laws, who must suffer from them. And it should be plain that the community of women does not support these laws. For centuries they have been seeking and obtaining abortions even at substantial risk to themselves despite the voice of the legislature.

It may well be said that the abortion laws which the states seek to maintain in fact undermine the moral fabric of the community. For, it is those laws which not only force countless women to flagrantly violate the law each year, but forces them into the sordid underworld of criminal abortions.*

However, even assuming the maintenance of a particular standard of morality for men and women were sufficient to sustain some legislation in the area, that legislation could not be drawn in such a way as to consistently place all of its weight and burden on only one sex. For this is just the sort of invidious discrimination prohibited by the Fourteenth Amendment.

Thus we must look to the third rationale for abortion laws. Although it is generally discussed in terms of the "right to life," if we analyze it more closely, the third rationale is actually a means of enforcing the religious concept that the soul is present in the body from the time of conception and therefore must be saved. The use of criminal statutes to enforce the views of one or more particular religious groups is of course proscribed by the First Amendment's Establishment Clause.

Looking closer at the argument that the state must guarantee to every fetus its right to life, we must immediately be struck by tremendous inconsistencies in the state's alleged concern for life.

* Amici do not take either the position that women who have abortions are "criminals" or that all persons who are willing to aid women in terminating unwanted pregnancies are criminals. However, there are many persons who unscrupulously profit from women's predicament and misery with little concern for their health and safety.

In fact, claims of great concern for the life of the fetus are at best questionable in practice and turn sour when examined in light of their consequences on the lives of women.

It is clear both from the application of the abortion laws as well as from other areas of law that the concern of the state in the life of the fetus is at best a qualified concern. Firstly, under the laws of many states the fetus has "no legal personality or identity until it sees the light of day." Endresz v. Friedberg, 24 N.Y.2d 478, 301 N.Y.S.2d 65, 70 (1969), and, therefore, an action for wrongful death of a fetus cannot be sustained. See also, Graf v. Taggart , 43 N.J. 303, 204 A.2d 140 (1964); Norman v. Murphy, 124 Cal.App.2d 95, 268 P.2d 178 (Dis.Ct.App., 1954); Keyes v. Construction Service, 340 Mass. 633, 165 N.E.2d 912 (1960); Powers v. City of Troy, 4 Mich. App. 572, 145 N.W.2d 418 (1966); Carroll v. Skloff, 415 Pa. 47, 202 A.2d 9 (1964), for similar rules in New Jersey, California, Massachusetts, Michigan and Pennsylvania.

What is more laws governing abortion in Georgia as in several other states with supposed "reform laws" show at best a qualified concern for the life of a fetus. Those statutes permit the abortion of a fetus resulting from rape or incest, and in some states a fetus growing within the body of an unmarried woman under the age of fourteen, fifteen or sixteen, or a woman with German Measles, e.g., Colo. Rev. Stat. Ann. § 40-2-50 et seq. (Supp. 1967).

In other states, a pregnant woman may not be executed if she is "quick with child". New York Code of Criminal Procedure, §§ 501 et seq. Presumably, as was true historically, a woman who is pregnant with an unquick fetus may be executed.* Of course, in that case the fetus will die with her.

Furthermore, in no other way do the states act to protect the fetus from dangers to its existence. There exist no intensive prenatal care programs for those expectant mothers who do not receive this necessary care. There exist no massive education programs concerning diet, exercise, etc., for expectant mothers. There is no mandatory innoculation against rubella, a crippling disease for a fetus to be affected by. Drugs harmful to the fetus are allowed on the market even though alternative treatment could be utilized. In New York, for example, the State Department of Social Services does not provide additional money for the fetus until the fourth month of pregnancy. Title 18, Codes, Rules and Regulations of the State of New York, § 353.2. Clearly, the states take no affirmative action to care for the fetus in which they claim such a compelling interest. Nor do the governments consistently protect the interest of the children who are subsequently born.

* For further historical discussion of this distinction between the quick and unquick fetus in New York law, see Means, supra, 14 N.Y.L.F. at pp. 441-3.

 If governments insist that there is a compelling state interest in protecting human life and therefore in outlawing abortions, why is it that these same governments fail to protect the rights of illegitimate children who are subsequently born. Although Levy v. Louisiana, 391 U.S. 68 (1968), stated that a state cannot treat an illegitimate child differently from legitimate offspring, in Labine v. Vincent, 91

In light of these facts we must look again at the argument that the state must protect each and every fetus which has been conceived. In order to assert this view one must assume that every fetus is a human being equal in all respects to every living citizen from the moment of conception. Stripped of any religious definitions of when meaningful human life begins, that is when the soul enters the human organism, the various medical procedures for terminating pregnancy that are currently illegal under the challenged laws are not significantly different from some current methods of birth control.*

S.Ct. 1017 (1971), this Court upheld a Louisiana statute which prohibited illegitimate children, though duly acknowledged, from claiming and taking property by interstate succession for their father's estate. There are cases in both the states of Georgia and Texas which reveal the same form of discrimination. In Patterson v. Liberty Mutual Insurance Co., 147 S.E.2d 64 (1966), the Georgia Court of Appeals refused to allow a posthumous illegitimate child who brought a proceeding to recover compensation for death of the deceased employee, the child's father, to recover. In Hargrove v. Lloyds Casualty Company of New York, 66 S.W.2d 466 (1933), the Texas Court held that an illegitimate child could not recover compensation for her father's death under Workingman's Compensation Act. Thus there would seem to be a fundamental inconsistency in vigorously protecting the right of the child to be born and then denying that same child equal protection. Such protection of the property of the father from the claims of his out-of-wedlock children may well be yet another factor to encourage men to desert the children they have fathered and the mothers of those children.

* E.G., it is commonly accepted that the intrauterine device (IUD) acts as an abortive agent rather than as a contraceptive which prevent conception.

There is a great variation in positions as to when the essential "humanness" which causes society to protect the life of its citizens actually develops. In fact, the final determination is a philosophical or religious one.

For example, one might consider that the moment of fertilization is the moment of creation of a human being. Under that approach the development of that "life" could not be interfered with from that moment of fertilization. In that case no I.U.D.'s could be legally used by women though they are widely used throughout the country. According to Father Robert F. Drinan, former Dean of the Boston College Law School, and now United States Congressman,

> There is no doubt whatever that countless individuals and several opinion molding groups in America are convinced that the Catholic Church is using its persuasion, its prestige and its political power to fight any change in the abortion laws. These individuals and associations are sometimes afraid to speak openly about the role of the Church lest they deepen the Church's antagonism to the causes they espouse. Drinan, Robert F., S.J., "The Morality of Abortion Laws," 14 Cath. Lawyer 190, 195 Summer (1968).

For that reason the political activities of the Catholic Church and its proponents in opposing even liberalization of abortion laws remains an open secret which is difficult if not impossible to "prove" in a traditional legal sense. However, in reporting the passage by the Hawaii legislature of a bill repealing that state's abortion law, the New York Times stated that "The Roman Catholic Church waged a long battle to try to keep the abortion bill from passing." New York Times, 2/25/70, 1:5. The Hawaiian experience is plainly not an isolated experience.

Significantly, under the common law there appears to have been no legal proscription against abortion before the fetus was quick within the mother -- and it was at that time that the soul was thought to enter the organism. Means, supra, at 426-8. At approximately the time that the view of the Catholic Church shifted concerning the entry of the soul, laws concerning abortion did too -- both moving back to the time of conception.

What is more, according to Rabbi David M. Feldman, Author of Birth Control in Jewish Law, the position of the Catholic Church on the question of abortion is doctrinal rather than a general moral position. The position stems in part from an ancient interpretation of the Hebrew Septuagint, with respect to "ensoulment" leading to the proscription of abortion of a "formed" fetus. Feldman, Birth Control in Jewish Law, New York University Press 1968, pp. 257-8 and 269. It further stems from the position of the Church on original sin and baptism, which leads to the conclusion that if a fetus is not permitted to develop to term so that it can be baptized at birth, it is "worse than murder" for then the fetus is doomed to limbo. Feldman, Ibid., pp. 268 and 270.

In contrast with the Catholic approach to abortion, under Jewish law, the welfare of the woman -- her pain and suffering -- is paramount. Feldman, Ibid., pp. 291-2. In Jewish law, the fetus does not become a person until the moment of birth. Feldman, Ibid., pp. 255 and 273. The fetus, at least in the early stages is considered part of its other's body, Feldman, Ibid., p. 265, and only when its head emerges is it inviolate. Feldman, Ibid., p. 275. Therefore, in any number of situations in which abortion would be permissible under Jewish law it would be forbidden under the laws of Texas and Georgia and nearly every other state in the country as would be more consonant with Catholic doctrine.

Abortion laws throughout the country are thus based on a religious definition of when "human" life begins. As a result, no woman may legally terminate an unwanted pregnancy except under the most limited circumstances, because to do so would offend the religious precepts of others. She then, though forced to adopt certain beliefs, has her personal constitutional freedoms eroded by laws which not only favor one religious doctrine but actually enforce it. Thus, the Texas and Georgia as well as most other abortion laws are in direct conflict with constitutional rule that "[t]he government is neutral, and while protecting all, it prefers none, and it disparages none." School District of Abington Township v. Schempp, 374 U.S. 203, 215 (1965). As this Court stated in that case:

> The wholesome 'neutrality' of which this Court's cases speak thus stems from a recognition of the teachings of history that powerful sects or groups might bring about a fusion of governmental and religious functions or a concert or dependency of one upon the other to the end that official support of the State or Federal Government would be placed behind the tenets of one or all orthodoxies. 374 U.S. at 222.

Just such fusion deprives countless of women each year of the most basic control over their bodies and their lives in a way which will affect them for the rest of their days, and all in violation of the constitutional proscription against the establishment of religion.

> The 'establishment of religion' clause of the First Amendment means at least this: Neither a state or Federal Government can set up a church. Neither can pass laws which aid one religion, aid all religions, or prefer one religion over another. Neither can force nor influence a person to go to or to remain away from church against his will or force him to profess a belief or disbelief in any religion. No person can be punished for entertaining or professing religious beliefs or disbeliefs, for church attendance or non-attendance. No tax in any amount, large or small, can be levied to support any religious activities or institutions, whatever they may be called, or whatever form they may adopt to teach or practice religion. Neither a state nor the Federal Government can, openly or secretly, participate in the affairs of any religious organizations or groups and vice versa. In the words of Jefferson, the clause against establishment of religion by law was intended to erect "a wall of separation between church and state." Everson v. Board of Education, 330 U.S. 1, 15-16 (1947), citing Reynolds v. United States, 98 U.S. 145, 164 (1878).

The Texas and Georgia laws governing abortion constitute the most glaring example of the demolition of th wall. Furthermore, insisting that a woman carry to term each and every pregnancy which may occur the state is not only enforcing a particular religious belief but developing a form of right unique in America law. For, in no other instance does the right to live include the right to use another person's body - his or her kidney, heart and lungs. Yet the denial t women the right to an abortion gives a fetus the right to occupy an unwilling woman's body and use not only her uterus but every other organ of her body without her consent.

Thus stripped of the remaining religions justification for the prohibition of abortion, there is no argument sufficient to sustain the abridgment of a women's rights effected by the denial of abortion.

"Where there is a significant encroachment upon personal liberty, the State may prevail only by showing a subordinating interest which is compelling." Griswold v. Connecticut, supra, 381 U.S. at 497, citing Bates v. City of Little Rock, 361 U.S. 516, 524 (1960).

Amici urge this Court to consider the following questions:

> Are the interests of society being served by a law which exposed over a million women last year to such risks [as described above]? Are the interests of society being served by women bearing unwanted children, subjected to the pressures of an emotionally and financially deprived existence? Are the interests of society being served by the population explosion we are now witnessing? South Dakota v. Munson, supra, slip opinion, p. 9.

> Thus the real question is not "How can we justify abortion"? but "How can we justify compulsory childbearing?" Cisler, "Unfinished Business: Birth Control and Women's Liberation," Sisterhood is Powerful, ed., Robin Morgan, Random House, 1970, p. 278.

This Court must then conclude, as other courts have across the nation, that,

> Upon a balancing of relevant interest, we hold that a woman's right to refuse to carry an embryo during the early months of pregnancy may not be invaded by the state without a more compelling public necessity than is reflected in the statute in question. Walsingham v. Florida, supra, slip opinion, p. 12, citing Babbitz v. McCann, supra.

And further, that,

> The Court can find no compelling interest of the state and concludes that the right to choose to bear or not to bear children is a fundamental right of the individual woman to be exercised in any manner she chooses and which may not in any way be abridged by law. People v. Robb, supra, slip opinion, p. 9.

V. YOUNGER v. HARRIS DOES NOT IMPAIR OR LESSEN THE JURISDICTION, POWER OR RESPONSIBILITY OF THIS COURT TO GRANT THE RELIEF REQUESTED.

In Younger v. Harris, 91 S.Ct. 746 (1971), and its companion cases this Court refused to rule on the constitutionality of several state statutes challenged on First Amendment grounds. The Court held that the constitutional objections could and should be raised by the litigants in defense to a criminal prosecution, and the litigants would not be irreparably harmed by raising their constitutional rights in that forum. That is not the case here however.

In the two cases before this Court the primary plaintiffs are women in need of abortions. Neither they, nor other women throughout the country, who daily have their rights denied by the Georgia, Texas and other abortion statutes, can turn to the state criminal process for a determination of their rights. For, the violation of their rights does not stem primarily from the fact that they may be prosecuted for having an abortion (though in rare cases they are), but from the fact that a very real threat of criminal prosecution of third parties prevents them from obtaining the medical care they require. As long as abortion laws such as those of Georgia and Texas are in effect they will not be able to obtain abortions. As the Supreme Court of the State of California recognized in California v. Belous, supra, 80 Cal.Rptr. at 366, since the doctor is risking his own freedom and professional career in performing an abortion, "Rather than being impartial, the physician has a 'direct, personal, substantial, pecuniary interest in reaching a conclusion' that the woman should not have an abortion." The situation of women barred from obtaining abortions by unconstitutional laws is therefore distinguishable from that of appellees in Boyle v. Landry, 91 S.Ct. 758 (1971). This Court found that they were deterred from exercising their constitutional rights only by their own "imaginary or speculative fears of prosecution." 91 S.Ct. at 758. Furthermore, women are not required to entrust the protection of their constitutional rights to a third party which has litte interest in protecting those rights. Perlman v. United States, 247 U.S. 7, 12-13 (1918).

Amici have attempted to show that to require a woman to carry, give birth to and raise a child against her will is indeed irreparable harm sufficient to satisfy the standard of Dyson v. Stein, 91 S.Ct. 769 (1971), decided with Younger v. Harris, supra, in which the Court stated that,

> ...federal intervention affecting pending state criminal prosecutions, either by injunction or by declaratory judgment is proper only where irreparable injury is threatened. The existence of such injury is a matter to be determined carefully under the facts of each case.

The rights of women such as Mary Doe and Jane Roe who are denied the abortions they seek must not turn on whether some few medical personnel are courageous enough to open themselves to prosecution by performing the needed abortions, and then challenge the restrictive law in a criminal proceeding. This is too tenuous a thread for millions of women throughout the country to rest their constitutional rights on. In Younger v. Harris, supra, 91 S.Ct. at 751, this Court noted that it has long been considered appropriate for the federal courts to rule on the constitutionality of state criminal statutes where,

> ... The threat to the plaintiff's federally protected rights [is] one that cannot be eliminated by his defense against a single criminal prosecution. See, e.g., Ex Parte Young, 209 U.S. 123, 145-7.

That is exactly the situation before the Court. Women are having their lives and bodies mangled and destroyed daily by abortion laws such as those of Georgia and Texas and cannot look to the state criminal process to rid themselves of the bonds of these laws. This Court must, therefore, exercise the "duty" of the federal courts to hear and decide federal constitutional claims, for the federal courts are the "...primary and powerful reliances for vindicating every right given by the Constitution...." Zwickler v. Koota, 381 U.S. 241, 247 (1967).

CONCLUSION

For the foregoing reasons Amici urge this Court to find Georgia Code Annotated § 26-1201 and Texas Penal Code Articles 1191, 1192, 1193, 1194 and 1196 violate the most fundamental rights of women guaranteed by the United States Constitution.

MOTION FOR LEAVE TO FILE A BRIEF AS AMICI CURIAE

Planned Parenthood Federation of America, Inc., hereinafter called "Planned Parenthood," and the American

THROUGH

Association of Planned Parenthood Physicians, hereinafter called "AAPPP," hereby respectfully move for leave to file a brief annexed hereto as amici curiae in these cases.

The appellants consented in writing to the filing of this amici brief. The states of Georgia and Texas have declined to consent thereto.

Planned Parenthood Federation of America, Inc., is a not-for-profit corporation originally organized in 1922 and existing under the laws of the State of New York. Its headquarters are in New York City. It is the leading national voluntary public health organization in the field of family planning and birth control and a leading national organization in the field of educating the public concerning the danger to the United States and the world inherent in continuing population growth.

As of May, 1971, Planned Parenthood had 190 affiliates in 42 states and the District of Columbia, operating approximately 700 family planning clinics offering services to the public. Planned Parenthood provides its affiliates guidance in the areas of birth control, voluntary sterilization, treatment of infertility problems, abortion and education for marriage and parenthood. Each of the affiliates functions under strict medical standards promulgated by the National Medical Advisory Committee in conjunction with local medical advisory committees, all such committees consisting exclusively of physicians.

Planned Parenthood also functions as a clearing house for information and services relating to these same areas. It formulates nationwide medical and clinical standards and is active in developing guidelines and materials relating to public and professional education in this field. Its Medical Director and other consultants confer with medical school faculties and local agencies in relation to teaching techniques, formation of clinics and the like.

Many of Planned Parenthood's affiliates operate in cooperation with local public health facilities. The affiliates are also teaching and training centers for physicians, nurses, teachers and social workers and provide for referral services to qualified medical specialists.

Planned Parenthood's concern with family planning and family health necessarily includes concern with the availability of abortion and with the compelling problems which result from restrictive abortion laws which make medically safe, legal abortions unavailable to many women. Planned Parenthood has adopted a policy on abortion which states in part:

> "The optimum method of birth control is the consistent employment of effective contraception but in practice this goal is sometimes not achieved. It is, therefore, desirable that provisions respecting abortion not be contained in State Criminal Codes. Planned Parenthood believes that since abortion is a medical procedure, it should be governed by the same rules as apply to other medical procedures in general when performed by properly qualified physicians with reasonable medical safeguards."

This commitment to the principle that safe abortions should be available to all who seek them is a necessary corollary of Planned Parenthood's activities in the area of birth control. While Planned Parenthood does not view abortion as an alternative to contraception, it recognizes that abortion services are essential to protect women where contraception is unavailable, where it has not been used or where it has failed. Planned Parenthood believes that abortions must also be available to women who have been raped and in cases where the fetus may be deformed as a result of the mother's exposure to rubella, her use of drugs which affect fetal development or as a result of other factors.

Each year a number of the patients served by Planned Parenthood affiliates (in Georgia and Texas as well as in other states) experience unwanted pregnancies, often due to contraceptive failure. Contraceptive technology has not developed to a point where there is any perfect contraceptive and many of the techniques available to particular women do on occasion fail. Also, many women do not have effective access to contraception. There are, therefore, vast numbers of unwanted pregnancies each year which do not involve failure of use or motivation on the part of the patient.

Throughout the United States many patients who experience unwanted pregnancies seek abortion services from the Planned Parenthood clinics, especially those women who have looked to those clinics for contraceptive services. Because of the Georgia and Texas abortion laws challenged herein, and similarly restrictive laws on the books in other states, the activities of Planned Parenthood affiliates are severely circumscribed and they are unable to provide patients with the medical services they urgently need.

The American Association of Planned Parenthood Physicians (AAPPP) was organized in 1963. As of May, 1971, its membership consisted of 650 physicians specializing in obstetrics and gynecology and having a special interest in the various aspects of human reproduction. Many such physicians are connected with Planned Parenthood affiliates, health departments, hospitals and other agencies; others are primarily private practitioners.

Papers presented at AAPPP conventions are published in Advances in Planned Parenthood. The 1970 volume reached 5,000 doctors, thus sharing the experience, studies and ideas of AAPPP physicians with other non-member doctors engaged in providing family planning services.

AAPPP adopted a resolution on abortion at its 1970 annual meeting which states in part:

> "The American Association of Planned Parenthood Physicians supports the principle that the decision whether or not to bear children is a right which belongs solely to each individual woman, to be exercised by her in any manner she may desire.
> Consequently the decision to undergo legal abortion, as one method of exercising this right, must rest with the individual woman and her physician.

Therefore, the American Association of Planned Parenthood Physicians strongly urges the abolition of all statutes and criminal laws which in any way restrict the performance of abortion by qualified medical personnel."

AAPPP believes that restrictive abortion statutes not only impair rights of women to receive medical treatment for abortion and to determine whether to bear children, but also interfere with the practice of good medicine by preventing physicians from providing their patients with a safe medical procedure which is often necessary for the health and well-being of the patient.

Both Planned Parenthood and the AAPPP by reason of their long experience in and knowledge of the field of family planning services believe that they are in a unique position to aid the Court in its resolution of the issues raised in these cases. Both organizations have a profound interest in vindicating the constitutional right of all women to have access to qualified medical services for abortion, insuring that no woman is denied her freedom to choose whether or not to bear a child, and establishing the right of physicians to provide the best available medical service to their patients.

Therefore, Planned Parenthood and AAPPP respectfully request that the Court grant this motion for leave to file the annexed brief amici curiae.

BRIEF FOR PLANNED PARENTHOOD FEDERATION OF AMERICA, INC. and AMERICAN ASSOCIATION OF PLANNED PARENTHOOD PHYSICIANS AS AMICI CURIAE

Opinions Below

The opinion of the United States District Court for the Northern District of Georgia in Doe v. Bolton is reported at 319 F. Supp 1048 (1970). The opinion of the United States District Court for the Northern District of Texas in Roe v. Wade is reported at 314 F. Supp 1217 (1970).

Jurisdiction

The jurisdiction of this Court in both Doe v. Bolton and Roe v. Wade is invoked under 28 U.S.C. §1253 (1964 ed.). For full statements, as to jurisdiction, amici respectfully refer the Court to the statements incorporated in the briefs for the appellants in the two cases.

Statutes Involved

1. Roe v. Wade

TEXAS PENAL CODE ANN. art. 1191, at 429 (1961):

> "If any person shall designedly administer to a pregnant woman or knowingly procure to be administered with her consent any drug or medicine, or shall use towards her any violence or means whatever externally or internally applied, and thereby procure an abortion, he shall be confined in the penitentiary not less than two nor more than five years; if it be done without her consent, the punishment shall be doubled. By 'abortion' is meant that the life of the fetus or embryo shall be destroyed in the woman's womb or that a premature birth thereof be caused."

TEXAS PENAL CODE ANN. art. 1192, at 433 (1961):

"Whoever furnishes the means for procuring an abortion knowing the purpose intended is an accomplice."

TEXAS PENAL CODE ANN. art. 1193, at 434 (1961):

"If the means used shall fail to produce an abortion, the offender is nevertheless guilty of an attempt to produce abortion, provided it be shown that such means were calculated to produce that result, and shall be fined not less than one hundred nor more than one thousand dollars."

TEXAS PENAL CODE ANN. art. 1194, at 435 (1961):

"If the death of the mother is occasioned by an abortion so produced or by an attempt to effect the same it is murder."

TEXAS PENAL CODE ANN. art. 1196, at 436 (1961):

"Nothing in this chapter applies to an abortion procured or attempted by medical advice for the purpose of saving the life of the mother."

2. Doe v. Bolton

(Those sections of the statute declared unconstitutional by the court below are italicized.)

GA. CODE ANN. §26-1201 at 85 (1970 revision): Criminal Abortion

Except as otherwise provided in section 26-1202, a person commits criminal abortion when he administers any medicine, drug or other substance whatever to any woman or when he uses any instrument or other means whatever upon any woman with intent to produce a miscarriage or abortion. (Acts 1968, pp. 1249, 1277.)

GA. CODE ANN. §26-1202 at 85-87 (1970 revision): Exception

(a) Section 26-1201 shall not apply to an abortion performed by a physician duly licensed to practice medicine and surgery pursuant to Chapter 84-9 or 84-12 of the Code of Georgia of 1933, as amended, based upon his best clinical judgment that an abortion is necessary because:

(1) A continuation of the pregnancy would endanger the life of the pregnant woman or would seriously and permanently injure her health; or

(2) The fetus would very likely be born with a grave, permanent, and irremediable mental or physical defect; or

(3) The pregnancy resulted from forcible or statutory rape.

(b) No abortion is authorized or shall be performed under this section unless each of the following conditions is met:

(1) The pregnant woman requesting the abortion certifies in writing under oath and subject to the penalties of false swearing to the physician who proposes to perform the abortion that she is a bona fide legal resident of the State of Georgia.

(2) The physician certifies that he believes the woman is a bona fide resident of this State and that he has no information which should lead him to believe otherwise.

(3) Such physician's judgment is reduced to writing and concurred in by at least two other physicians duly licensed to practice medicine and surgery pursuant to Chapter 84-9 of the Code of Georgia of 1933, as amended, who certify in writing that based upon their separate personal medical examinations of the pregnant woman, the abortion is, in their judgment, necessary because of one or more of the reasons enumerated above.

(4) Such abortion is performed in a hospital licensed by the State Board of Health and accredited by the Joint Commission on Accreditation of Hospitals.

(5) The performance of the abortion has been approved in advance by a committee of the medical staff of the hospital in which the operation is to be performed. This committee must be one established and maintained in accordance with the standards promulgated by the Joint Commission on the Accreditation of Hospitals, and its approval must be by a majority vote of a membership of not less than three members of the hospital's staff; the physician proposing to perform the operation may not be counted as a member of the committee for this purpose.

(6) If the proposed abortion is considered necessary because the woman has been raped, the woman makes a written statement under oath, and subject to the penalties of false swearing, of the date, time and place of the rape and the name of the rapist, if known. There must be attached to this statement a certified copy of any report of the rape made to any law enforcement officer or agency and a statement by the solicitor general of the judicial circuit where the rape occurred or allegedly occurred that, according to his best information, there is probable cause to believe that the rape did occur.

(7) Such written opinions, statements, certificates, and concurrences are maintained in the permanent files of such hospital and are available at all reasonable times to the solicitor general of the judicial circuit in which the hospital is located.

(8) A copy of such written opinions, statements, certificates, and concurrences is filed with the Director of the State Department of Public Health within ten (10) days after such operation is performed.

(9) All written opinions, statements, certificates, and concurrences filed and maintained pursuant to Paragraphs (7) and (8) of this subsection shall be confidential records and shall not be made available for public inspection at any time.

(c) Any solicitor general of the judicial circuit in which an abortion is to be performed under this section, or any person who would be a relative of the child within the second degree of consanguinity, may petition the superior court of the county in which the abortion is to be performed for a declaratory judgment whether the performance of such abortion would violate any constitutional or other legal rights of the fetus. Such solicitor general may also petition such court for the purpose of taking issue with compliance with the requirements of this section. The physician who proposes to perform the abortion and the pregnant woman shall be respondents. The petition shall be heard expeditiously and if the court adjudges that such abortion would violate the constitutional or other legal rights of the fetus, the court shall so declare and shall restrain the physician from performing the abortion.

(d) If an abortion is performed in compliance with this section, the death of the fetus shall not give rise to any claim for wrongful death.

(e) Nothing in this section shall require a hospital to admit any patient under the provisions hereof for the purpose of performing an abortion, nor shall any hospital be required to appoint a committee such as contemplated under subsection (b) (5). A physician, or any other person who is a member of or associated with the staff of a hospital, or any employee of a hospital in which an abortion has been authorized, who shall state in writing an objection to such abortion on moral or religious grounds shall not be required to participate in the medical procedures which will result in the abortion, and the refusal of any such person to participate therein shall not form the basis of any claim for damages on account of such refusal or for any disciplinary or recriminatory action against such person.

GA. CODE ANN. §26-1203 at 87 (1970 revision): Punishment

A person convicted of criminal abortion shall be punished by imprisonment for not less than one nor more than 10 years. (Acts 1968, pp. 1249-1280.)

Statement of the Cases

Amici respectfully refer the Court to the statements of the cases incorporated in the briefs for appellants.

Questions Presented

1. Whether Articles 1191, 1192, 1193, 1194 and 1196 of the Texas Penal Code by limiting the grounds for the performance of abortions deprive women and physicians of their fundamental rights of privacy and liberty in violation of the Ninth and Fourteenth Amendments to the Constitution.

2. Whether §26-1201 to §26-1203 of the Georgia Code by limiting the grounds for the performance of abortions deprive women and physicians of their fundamental rights of privacy and liberty in violation of the Ninth and Fourteenth Amendments to the Constitution.

Interest of Planned Parenthood Federation of America, Inc. and American Association of Planned Parenthood Physicians as Amici Curiae

We have in the accompanying notice of motion set forth the pertinent facts concerning Planned Parenthood Federation of America, Inc. and the American Association of Planned Parenthood Physicians and the reasons why we believe acceptance by this Court of this brief on their behalf as amici curiae is appropriate to consideration of the questions raised in these cases.

Planned Parenthood Federation of America, Inc. and the American Association of Planned Parenthood Physicians believe that they can provide the Court facts about contraceptive failure, unwanted births, and abortion which will not otherwise be presented. Moreover, the ability of Planned Parenthood and its affiliates to function effectively in the area of family planning and the ability of the member doctors of American Association of Planned Parenthood Physicians to practice medicine are drastically curtailed by the statutes such as those of Texas and Georgia which are at issue in these cases. Amici believe that the parties will not cover material presented herein.

Amici have not briefed separately either the question of whether the courts below improperly denied injunctive relief or the issues of jurisdiction as to which this Court has postponed determination. Amici support the arguments made by appellants in their briefs as to jurisdiction and injunctive relief.

With respect to arguments on the merits, amici will discuss only the question of whether the Georgia and Texas statutes, insofar as they restrict the grounds for the performance of abortion, are unconstitutional, since these are the questions as to which amici believe they are in a special position to be of aid to the Court and to present new material. Amici do, however, support the arguments developed in the appellants' brief in Doe v. Bolton, that the requirements in the Georgia statute as to residency, physician consultation, hospital committee approval and accreditation of hospitals by the Joint Commission are unconstitutional for the reasons stated by appellants in that case. Amici also concur with the appellants' contentions that both the Texas statute and the Georgia statute are unconstitutionally vague.

Summary of Argument

In this brief amici have presented factual material, as well as legal arguments, to demonstrate that the Texas and Georgia abortion statutes, by prohibiting all abortions other than those performed for the specific reasons set forth in the statutes, violate fundamental constitutional rights of women and their physicians.

The facts on contraception, abortion and unwanted births which amici discuss in Point I demonstrate the compelling need for a decision on the merits of these cases. Contraception, which provides the first line of defense against compulsory pregnancy and childbearing, is neither available to all nor fully effective when used. Literally millions of individuals have no access to the most effective, or indeed, any contraceptives because of their economic situation or because of inadequate medical or pharmaceutical services. In addition, many women, for medical or other reasons, cannot avail themselves of the most effective techniques of contraception.

Childbirth may be dangerous or unsuitable for a girl or woman for a variety of reasons. Her physical or mental health may be adversely affected by pregnancy; there may be a risk of serious fetal defect; the pregnancy may occur in a teenager out of wedlock, or may have been the result of an act of rape or incest; she may be unable to support another—or any—child. There are in short, a whole host of reasons—medical, social, economic and psychological—why a pregnant girl or woman may wish to have an abortion.

Abortion is an accepted and safe medical procedure and various respected medical organizations have stated their views to the effect that there should be no statutorily imposed restrictions on the grounds for which an abortion is performed. Restrictive laws such as those in Texas and Georgia, however, deprive women of their right of choice and force most women, unless they are able to obtain a safe, legal abortion out of state, to choose between bearing a child against their wishes or seeking illegal and unsafe abortions. These alternatives involve risks to the pregnant woman and to society and, when the woman carries the pregnancy to full term, to the unwanted child as well, especially if the child is born out of wedlock.

Prior cases decided by this Court have established the fundamental nature of the rights of the individual in areas relating to marriage, the family and sex. Moreover, the right to abortion must be viewed as a corollary of the right to control fertility which was recognized in Griswold v. Connecticut, 381 U.S. 479 (1965). Also at issue are the woman's right to life and to needed health services and her physician's right to practice medicine in accordance with the highest standards of the profession.

Since it cannot be demonstrated that the Texas and Georgia abortion statutes are both narrowly drawn and necessary to promote a compelling state interest, the statutes must, under established principles of law, be declared unconstitutional.

ARGUMENT

POINT I

The facts relating to unwanted births, contraception and abortion show the compelling need for a determination by this Court of the issues raised in these cases.

Amici present the following material to bring to the Court's attention the serious health problems facing women and society where abortion is not available to terminate pregnancies which for a variety of reasons should not result in compelling the birth of a child. Such pregnancies include those resulting from contraceptive failure and from rape, as well as those which will probably result in the birth of a deformed or defective child. They also include pregnancies which if carried to full term will create severe hardship or utterly disrupt the life of the mother, particularly where she is an unmarried teenager.

A. The Facts About Contraception

1. Availability of Contraception

Although contraceptive services are legally available in all states to married persons and in almost all states without regard to marital status,[1] in fact contraceptives are not readily available to a substantial portion of the population. This is particularly true of urban and rural poor in many areas of the country. In some of these areas even non-prescription and relatively ineffective contraceptives cannot be obtained. Even if some form of contraception is available there is likelihood of unwanted pregnancy since the most effective and practical contraceptives, such as the birth control pill, the intrauterine device, and the diaphragm[2] can be obtained only on the prescription of a doctor whose services are denied to hundreds of thousands of poor. The extent to which the poor are unable to obtain effective or even any contraceptives is shown by a recent report of the Senate Committee for Labor and Public Welfare which states:

> "Problems of unwanted children do not occur only in low income and less educated families in this country, but the consequences are greater in this group because of the accumulation of difficulties this condition imposes upon the poor. • • •

1. In only two states—Wisconsin (WIS. STAT. ANN. §151.15), and Massachusetts (MASS. GEN. LAWS ch. 272 §§21, 21A)—is prescription and/or distribution of contraceptives to unmarried persons prohibited. The Massachusetts law was declared unconstitutional by the Court of Appeals for the First Circuit in Baird v. Eisenstadt, 429 F.2d 1398 (1st Cir. 1970), prob. juris. noted, 401 U.S. 934 (1971) (No. 804, 1970 Term; renumbered No. 70-17, 1971 Term).

2. See pp. 13-20, infra.

> • • • Medically indigent families (defined according to poverty levels established by the Social Security Administration) have an average annual fertility rate 53 per cent higher than the nonpoor. The couple with funds to purchase health care has relatively easy access to family planning services. The medically indigent couple—usually dependent on public and voluntary agencies for health care—is forced to do without, or to rely heavily on the least effective nonmedical techniques for fertility control unless they happen to reside in an area where family planning services are made readily available by public health services or voluntary agencies.
> A number of studies have established the existence of a group totaling about 5 million medically indigent women in the United States of child bearing age having a need for subsidized family planning services." SEN. REP. No. 91-1004, 91st Cong., 2d Sess. 9 (1970) (footnote omitted) (emphasis added).

Because of the unavailability of contraceptives to so many women, and the unavailability in most states of legal abortions, many medically indigent women, who should not be forced to bear a child for medical or other reasons, have no alternative unless willing and able to obtain illegal abortions.

2. Contraceptive Failure

There is a wide variation among contraceptives respecting efficacy, safety and side effects. A recent study by Dr. Christopher Tietze, the Associate Director of the Bio-Medical Division of The Population Council and one of the leading experts in the field, examines the level of effectiveness of the various contraceptive methods.[3] Tietze distinguishes between use-effectiveness or clinical effectiveness—"the protection from unwanted pregnancy achieved by users under real life conditions, including the effects of carelessness, ambivalence, and other manifestations of human frailty"[4]—and theoretical or biological or physiological effectiveness—"the antifertility action of a method under laboratory conditions."[5]

In his study, Tietze ranks currently utilized contraceptive methods according to estimated theoretical effectiveness[6] into four categories. The categories are "most effective," "highly effective," "less effective" and "least effective."[7]

Included in the "most effective" category are surgical sterilization, oral contraceptives, injectable progestational

3. Tietze, Effectiveness of Contraceptive Methods in CONTROL OF HUMAN FERTILITY: PROCEEDINGS OF THE FIFTEENTH NOBEL SYMPOSIUM, 303 (E. Diczfalusy & U. Borell eds. 1971) (hereinafter cited as Tietze). This section of amici's brief will also draw upon Segal & Tietze, Contraceptive Technology: Current and Prospective Methods in REPORTS ON POPULATION/FAMILY PLANNING, REPORT No. 1 (July 1971 Edition) (in press) (hereinafter cited as Segal & Tietze).

5. Id. at 303.

6. With respect to measurements of theoretical effectiveness he states: "Since these [laboratory] conditions are rarely achieved by human populations and can never be ascertained for most methods, theoretical effectiveness is not usually accessible to direct measurement. However, it can be inferred from the performance of the most successful group of users, supplemented by a priori anatomical and physiological considerations and by observations in the laboratory either in vitro or in vivo, or perhaps more accurately, in viva." Id. at 303-304.

agents and temperature rhythm.[8] However, even as to techniques that are theoretically most effective, method failures occur. Also, each of these techniques has disadvantages and some are unavailable for medical reasons for many people.

Voluntary female or tubal sterilization is the most effective contraceptive method there is and a "method for which theoretical effectiveness and use-effectiveness coincide," although there are occasional failures of this technique.[9]

There is some data indicating "a somewhat lower level of effectiveness" achieved by male sterilization or vasectomy as opposed to tubal sterilization; however, such data is fragmentary.[10]

Despite its effectiveness, sterilization is not appropriate for many. A disadvantage of surgical sterilization as a method is that only in some cases is restoration of fertility in males and females possible after sterilization.[11] Thus, unless an individual is certain that he or she never wants any, or any more children, sterilization is inappropriate.

Oral contraceptives (OCs) of the combined type are "almost 100 percent effective" when "taken according to the prescribed regimen."[12] But the oral contraceptives have disadvantages such as side effects during their early use.[13] Moreover, their use is medically contraindicated for certain patients, particularly those with a history of thromboembolic disease.[14]

12. Tietze, supra note 3 at 305. Sequential medication according to Tietze is "somewhat less effective than combined medication." Id. at 306. Failures occur with both types of oral contraceptives, the only important reason for which is the patient's omission of one or more tablets in the course of the prescribed medication cycle. Segal & Tietze, supra note 3, at 5.

Temperature rhythm is defined as "the determination of ovulation by means of basal body temperature and restriction of coitus to the post-ovulatory phase of the cycle"[15] and is placed by Tietze in the theoretically "most effective" category[16] whereas calendar rhythm, is in the "less effective"[17] or third category. Neither technique is suitable for many women particularly those with grossly irregular menstrual cycles.[18] The chief disadvantage of both of the rhythm methods is that "opportunity for coitus is greatly reduced, especially with temperature rhythm"[19] which is the more reliable method. Both techniques, if the sole methods relied upon, obviously require that the couple be highly motivated and disciplined,[20] since careful records must be kept and periods of abstinence observed.

13. Thus, "the early use of OCs is frequently associated with symptoms similar to those occurring during early pregnancy, such as nausea, vomiting, or breast engorgement * * *. Other common complaints are breakthrough bleeding during medication, weight gain, headache, dizziness, and brownish discoloration of the facial epidermis known as chloasma. Whereas most of these symptoms last only a few months, some users become discouraged and turn to other methods or even abandon their efforts at family planning." Segal & Tietze, supra note 3, at 6.

14. Id. at 6-7.

15. Tietze, supra note 3, at 307. Also included in the most effective category is the injectable progestational agent which is still in the testing stage. Id. at 306-307.

16. Id. at 307.

17. Id. at 310.

18. Segal & Tietze, supra note 3, at 5.

19. Ibid.

Tietze's second category—the theoretically "highly effective methods"—includes the intrauterine devices (IUDs), the diaphragm with cream or jelly, and the condom.[21] Tietze found that the most complete information on theoretical effectiveness is available for the intrauterine devices "since theoretical effectiveness and use-effectiveness are almost identical with this method."[22]

The clinical data available on IUD effectiveness indicates that "failure rates based on all pregnancies with the most widely used IUDs * * * ranged from 1.5 to 3.0 per 100 women during the first year of use and declined during later years."[23] In some cases in which pregnancy occurred, the IUD had been expelled without the user noticing it. However, the majority of the pregnancies occurred in women with the IUD in situ.[24] Tietze points out that "since some conceptions after an IUD had been expelled could have been avoided by careful self-examination, the theoretical effectiveness of the loop may be placed somewhere between the rate based on all pregnancies and the rate based on pregnancies with IUD in situ."[25]

There are other disadvantages to the IUD aside from the failure rate attributable to method, as opposed to use. Side effects may occur, the most common of which are

"bleeding or spotting and pain, including cramps, backache, and similar discomforts. These symptoms most often occur soon after insertion and tend to disappear within a few months. In some cases, however, the bleeding or pain is sufficiently severe to require removal of the device."[26]

Segal and Tietze report that the association of pelvic inflammatory disease [PID] with the use of intrauterine devices is "a more important adverse experience."[27] As of July 1971 it was not yet known "whether the insertion of an IUD in women with healthy pelvic organs [as opposed to insertion in women with pre-existing chronic or subchronic conditions] can produce PID * * *."[28]

Tietze also reports that levels of theoretical effectiveness for the diaphragm and the condom are about the same as that for the IUD.[29] Pregnancy may occur with the condom due to a break or tear in the product.[30] There may be failure with even a well-fitted diaphragm due to improper insertion or due to displacement of the diaphragm during coitus.[31] However, use-effectiveness "is

28. Ibid. Segal & Tietze state: "The majority of cases of PID among women using IUDs are relatively mild and can be treated successfully with antibiotics and without removing the device. frequently lower" with the diaphragm and condom,[32] and perfect use without omissions is rare.[33]

The "less effective methods" of contraception described by Tietze are chemical contraceptives such as vaginal foams, jellies, creams and the like, calendar rhythm and coitus interruptus.[34] Evidence indicates that "vaginal foams are more effective than jellies and creams which, in turn, are more effective than foaming tablets and suppositories."[35]

Coitus interruptus, while of high theoretical effectiveness if correctly practiced, is, according to Tietze, a "less effective" technique because many males are physiologically unable to practice it effectively.[36]

The "least effective" techniques of contraception include the post-coital douche and prolonged breast feeding.[37] The former has a very high failure rate; in addition, rapid sperm migration to an area beyond the effective reach of the douche has been observed.[38] Hence, the very low rating of the douche. Breast feeding has a tendency to postpone the return of ovulation and menstruation. The duration of the protection cannot be predicted, and since the first post-delivery ovulation may precede menstruation, the woman may conceive without realizing that she is no longer protected.[39]

It is clear from the foregoing that even the theoretically most effective or highly effective methods of contraception are not always actually effective for a number of reasons. Except for voluntary sterilization which many people will not use, even the most effective or highly effective methods have shortcomings either in terms of method failures or in terms of side effects or medical contraindications. In addition some of the methods are so difficult to practice regularly and correctly that they have little practical utility.

Although the method failures for some techniques are not high in terms of percentages, a failure rate of 1.5 to 3 per 100 women with, for example, the IUD, is indeed significant when one considers the vast numbers of women using this device, e.g., in 100,000 women, 1,500 to 3,000 would experience contraceptive failure.

The failure rates are, of course, much higher when the use-effectiveness is considered, and this too varies with the techniques in question, as well as with the motivation and education of the people using them.[40]

B. The Facts About Abortion

1. Abortion Is an Accepted Medical Procedure

There is no medical dispute as to the efficacy and safety of abortion as a procedure for the termination of an unwanted pregnancy. Indeed it has been shown that abortion in the early stages of pregnancy is far safer than childbirth.[41]

Modern medical opinion regards abortion as a procedure which should be available without state imposed restrictions as to the permissible reasons. Thus, on June 25th, 1970, the House of Delegates of the American Medical Association recommended that licensed physicians be permitted to perform abortions in hospitals or approved clinics without restriction after consultation with two other physicians.[42]

In August, 1970, the Executive Board of the American College of Obstetricians and Gynecologists approved a policy permitting performance of an abortion at the patient's request, which specifically states:

> "It is recognized that abortion may be performed at a patient's request, or upon a physician's recommendation.
> • • • When abortion is requested by a patient, a consultation is not necessary. When abortion is recommended by a physician, the indication for the proce> dure should be approved by a consultant knowledgeable in regard to the condition thought to indicate abortion * * *".[43]

Under this policy there are no restrictions to the grounds for abortion, and consultation is required only in those cases in which it is not the woman who requests abortion but rather the physician who recommends it.

The Committee on Family Planning of the Maternal and Child Health Section of the American Public Health Association recently stated that legal abortion as a safe health measure must be accepted as an essential component of maternal and child health services.[44] In addition, the American Psychiatric Association and the Group for Advancement of Psychiatry have recently endorsed the repeal of state abortion laws as applied to competent licensed physicians.[45]

2. The Dangerous Effects on Life and Health of Restrictive Abortion Laws

It has been estimated that about one million illegal abortions are performed each year.[46] While some of these illegal abortions are performed by physicians, the often tragic consequences of clandestine abortions, many of them self-induced, or performed by non-physicians, have created a serious state and national health problem. The most serious consequence of bungled illegal abortion is, of course, the death of the pregnant woman. It is estimated that abortion-related mortality is under-reported by as much as fifty percent.[47] Earlier estimates were that between 5,000 and 10,000 women died each year because of bungled illegal abortions.[48] However, the number of deaths from criminal abortion has decreased in recent years as a result of several factors including the advent of antibiotics, so that a figure of 500 to 1,000 such deaths per year is probably a more reliable national estimate.[49] Despite the fact that the death rate from illegal abortion has decreased, the adverse side effects of such abortions, including severe infection,[50] permanent sterility[51] or other serious compli-

C. The Facts About Unwanted Births

The magnitude of the problem of unwanted births is discussed in the 1971 interim report of the President's Commission on Population Growth and the American Future. This report states:

> "Estimates made in 1965, based on married women's own reports about their childbearing experience, indicated that one-third of the married couples who did not intend to have any more children already had at least one unwanted child. In the period 1960-65 nearly 20 percent of all live births were reported as unwanted by their parents. Only one-fourth of all parents claimed to have been completely successful in preventing both unwanted and unplanned pregnancies.
>
> The 20 percent of births reported as unwanted by their parents represents nearly five million children born between 1960 and 1965 who theoretically would never have been born if their parents' desires had prevailed. Fortunately, many of these unwanted pregnancies and birth become wanted children. But many do not."

ily and often lead to the abuse and neglect of the children.[53]

The most disastrous unwanted pregnancies are those occurring out of wedlock. Illegitimacy rates are high in the United States and are increasing.[54] In 1968, the estimated number of illegitimate live births in the United States was 339,200. More than half of these births were to females between the ages of 15 and 24.[55] These figures do not reflect the number of out-of-wedlock conceptions since they do not take into account such factors as: out-of-wedlock pregnancies that are successfully concealed; out-of-wedlock pregnancies that result in forced marriages and legitimate births; and out-of-wedlock pregnancies that result in the delivery of stillborn infants. Also to be considered are the number of out-of-wedlock pregnancies terminated by spontaneous miscarriage or by abortion, legal or illegal. The extent to which premarital conception is not reflected in illegitimate births is partially revealed in a survey conducted by The National Center for Health Statistics which revealed that one-third of all first-born children in the United States in the years 1964 to 1966 were conceived out of wedlock. The study showed that "of the average 1,174,000 first births to women aged 15-44 which occurred in the United States each year during 1964-1966, 166,000 or 14 percent were illegitimate and 218,000, or 19 percent were premarital conceptions of legitimate babies."[56]

The unmarried girl or woman who becomes pregnant is faced with a number of alternatives, many of which depend on her economic status. In some instances a hastily arranged marriage will take place and an illegitimate birth will thus be prevented. Such forced marriages often between immature young people frequently lead to divorce or desertion. If the pregnant woman does not marry, she may seek an abortion. If she lives in a state in which the indications for abortion are circumscribed and/or in which the procedural hurdles for obtaining an abortion are great, she may, if she has sufficient funds, travel to another state or country to obtain a medically safe, legal abortion. If, however, she is young and/or ignorant and/or poor, she may try to abort herself or may turn to the unskilled quack abortionist and serious injury or even death may result from either course.

For the girl or woman who does not obtain an abortion, does not marry and bears the child, the costs to her, to the illegitimate child and to society are incalculable. She is likely to become a school dropout, economically dependent, poverty-stricken and trapped.[57] In addition, the occurrence of illegitimate births has adverse effects on the health of the unmarried mother and her child, many of which are related to her failure to obtain adequate prenatal care.[58] These effects include higher rates of prematurity and infant mortality than occur in legitimate births,[59] increased health hazards for the infant, including higher infant mortality rates during the first year,[60] and increase in child abuse and neglect.[61] Also important, because of the frequency with which illegitimate births occur to adolescents, is the direct relationship between early childbearing and the risks of particular diseases in offspring[62] and the risk of maternal death.[63]

At least one important study has analyzed the effects on children who are born after a request by their mother for a legal abortion on psychiatric grounds had been refused.[64] This study, which was conducted in Sweden following the first liberalization in 1939 of Sweden's abortion law, compared a series of 120 children born of unwanted pregnancies[65] as to which abortions on psychiatric grounds had been denied, with a control series of 120 children. The subjects of the study were followed from birth to the time of their 21st birthday.

The study found important differences between the unwanted and the control children. The authors summarized their findings as follows:

"A study of the social features revealed that many more of the unwanted than control children had not had the advantage of a secure family life during childhood. They were also registered more often in psychiatric services, and a few more of them than control subjects received psychiatric care. They were more often registered for antisocial and criminal behavior, and slightly more often for drunken misconduct, and they got public assistance more often than the control subjects. A few more of them were educationally subnormal and far fewer had pursued theoretical studies over and above what is obligatory. They were more often exempted from military service. More of the females married early and had children early than in the control series. The differences between the two series in these respects were often statistically significant, and when they were not significant they always pointed in the same direction—to the unwanted children being born into a worse situation than the control children."[66]

From the data gathered the authors concluded that "the very fact a woman applies for legal abortion means that the prospective child runs a risk of having to surmount greater social and mental handicaps than its peers, even when the grounds for the application are so slight that it is refused."[67]

Amici believe that the facts presented on unwanted births as well as on contraception and abortion demonstrate the importance of the cases at bar to individuals and to society.

POINT II

The Georgia and Texas statutes, by restricting the grounds for the performance of abortions, violate fundamental rights of women and their physicians under the Ninth and Fourteenth Amendments to the Constitution.

Amici contend that the legislative restrictions on the permissible grounds for abortion contained in the statutes here involved deprive women in Texas and Georgia of their fundamental constitutional right under the Ninth and Fourteenth Amendments to choose whether or not to bear a child. We contend further that these laws also infringe a woman's fundamental right to life and health, and a physician's right to practice medicine in accordance with the highest standards of his profession.

A. Statutory Framework

1. Texas

The Texas abortion statute proscribes all abortions except those which are "procured or attempted by medical advice for the purpose of saving the life of the mother." Texas Pen. Code Ann. arts. 1191, 1196 (1961)

Abortions are completely denied all women in Texas other than those who fall within this narrow and vaguely worded exception; indeed, in practice abortions are denied to women who cannot convince a physician that they come within this exception.

Women in Texas whose pregnancy results from rape or incest, or for whom pregnancy would be dangerous to physical or mental health, or whose pregnancy is contraindicated, because of exposure to rubella or because of other intervening factors which result in there being a substantial risk of fetal defect or deformity—all are compelled to continue the pregnancy irrespective of their needs and the judgment of their physicians. Women unable for economic or other reasons to rear another or indeed any child are forced to become parents and have the quality not only of their lives but also that of their families adversely affected.[68] The Texas law also has the obvious effect of forcing most teenagers who become pregnant to bear children, many if not most of whom will be illegitimate.

2. Georgia

The Georgia statute prohibits abortions except where

> "(1) A continuation of the pregnancy would endanger the life of the pregnant woman or would seriously and permanently injure her health; or
>
> "(2) The fetus would very likely be born with a grave, permanent, and irremediable mental or physical defect; or
> "(3) The pregnancy resulted from forcible or statutory rape." GA. CODE ANN. §26-1202(a) (1970 revision).

In Georgia, accordingly there are many women who do not fall within these categories and who cannot obtain needed abortions. Thus, if the injury to health, although "serious," is not "permanent," abortion is prohibited. Moreover, since the criminal law of Georgia provides that statutory rape is committed only where the female is 14

68. The effects of such restrictions on pregnant women and girls has been discussed. See pp. 24-29, supra.

years of age or younger,[69] teenagers over that age are unable to obtain abortions unless they fall within the terms of one of the other exceptions, which is highly unlikely. Also disregarded by the Georgia statute are the economic and social hardships imposed by unwanted pregnancy. That the pregnancy may have resulted because of contraceptive failure or unavailability is immaterial. Even if the pregnancy resulted from forcible rape, abortion is not assured.[70]

B. The Fundamental Right to Choose Whether or Not to Bear a Child

The right of a woman to choose whether or not to bear a child is an aspect of her right of privacy and liberty and, we submit, a fundamental right. This Court has frequently protected the individual's right of privacy and has emphasized the right of the individual "as against the Government • • • to be let alone,"[71] and the "right to be free, except in very limited circumstances from unwarranted governmental intrusions into one's privacy."[72]

69. GA. CODE ANN. §26-2018 (1970 revision).

70. The abortion statute requires, where abortion is considered necessary because of rape, that "the woman makes a written statement under oath, and subject to the penalties of false swearing, of the date, time and place of the rape and the name of the rapist, if known." In addition, a statement by the solicitor general of the judicial circuit where the rape allegedly occurred is required "that according to his best information, there is probable cause to believe that the rape did occur." GA. CODE ANN. §26-1202(b)(6) (1970 revision).

71. Olmstead v. United States, 277 U.S. 438, 478 (1928) (dissenting opinion of Mr. Justice Brandeis). The majority decision in Olmstead was overruled in Katz v. United States, 389 U.S. 347 (1967).

72. Stanley v. Georgia, 394 U.S. 557, 564 (1969).

A wide range of private individual activity in the areas of marriage, the family and sex has thus been safeguarded against governmental interference. The right to procreate, described by this Court as "one of the basic civil rights of man,"[73] led the Court to invalidate as a violation of equal protection an Oklahoma statute which imposed sterilization upon persons convicted two or more times of larceny but not upon similarly situated persons convicted of embezzlement. Skinner v. Oklahoma, 316 U.S. 535 (1942). Similarly, the right to marry,[74] the right to direct the education of one's children,[75] the right to have possession of pornography in the privacy of one's own home,[76] have all been held to be fundamental rights under the Constitution.

We believe that the right of privacy recognized by this Court in Griswold v. Connecticut, 381 U.S. 479 (1965), includes the right of women to decide not only when but also whether to bear a child. As former Justice Tom C. Clark has cogently stated:

> "[A]bortion falls within that sensitive area of privacy—the marital relation. One of the basic values of this privacy is birth control, as evidenced by the Griswold decision. Griswold's act was to prevent formation of the fetus. This, the Court found, was constitutionally protected. If an individual may prevent conception, why can he not nullify that conception when prevention has failed?" Clark, Religion, Morality and Abortion: A Constitutional Appraisal, 2 Loyola Univ. (L.A.) L. Rev. 1, 9 (1969).

73. Skinner v. Oklahoma, 316 U.S. 535, 541 (1942).

74. Loving v. Commonwealth, 388 U.S. 1 (1967).

75. Pierce v. Society of Sisters, 268 U.S. 510 (1925); Meyer v. Nebraska, 262 U.S. 390 (1923).

76. Stanley v. Georgia, 394 U.S. 557 (1969).

The force of Mr. Justice Clark's reasoning is apparent. Griswold recognized fundamental constitutional rights relating to the prevention of conception and established the substantive constitutional basis of the right to practice contraception and thus control fertility. As we have shown, recognition of the right to control conception by employing contraceptives by no means solves the problem of undesirable or unwanted pregnancies.[77] Even if the most reliable contraceptive techniques are employed, failures of use as well as failures of method occur. The most effective contraceptives are not 100 per cent effective and in many cases may be contraindicated for both medical and other reasons.[78] Moreover, there are literally millions of Americans for whom the most reliable, or indeed any reliable contraceptive is unavailable.[79]

The decision to bear or not to bear children is one of the most private and personal decisions that can be made. The responsibilities involved in raising a child are obviously serious ones and the implications of becoming a parent are far-reaching. Denial of an abortion to a woman who needs one thus infringes her freedom to regulate manifold aspects of her life, not only her reproductive potential.

The right to contraception implicitly includes the right to choose whether or not to become a parent. The right to control one's reproductive life even after fertilization has occurred is a corollary of the right this Court has recognized in Griswold and is at least equal in stature to similar private rights also previously acknowledged by this Court's decisions. See, e.g., Stanley v. Georgia, 394 U.S. 557 (1969); Loving v. Commonwealth, 388 U.S. 1 (1967); Skinner v. Oklahoma, supra; Pierce v. Society of Sisters, 268 U.S. 510 (1925); Meyer v. Nebraska, 262 U.S. 390 (1923). Accordingly, we believe that in order to adequately implement the values protected by Griswold this Court should expressly recognize the right of abortion.

77. See pp. 12-29, supra.

That there is a fundamental constitutional right to abortion was the conclusion of the courts below in the instant cases. Doe v. Bolton, 319 F. Supp. 1048 (N.D. Ga. 1970) (per curiam), ques. of juris. postponed to merits, 91 S. Ct. 1614 (1971) (No. 971, 1970 Term; renumbered No. 70-40, 1971 Term); Roe v. Wade, 314 F. Supp. 1217 (N.D. Their view has also been accepted by a number of other courts which have considered the question and have affirmed that this is a fundamental right. E.g., Doe v. Scott, 321 F. Supp. 1384 (N.D. Ill. 1971), *appeals docketed, sub noms. C. The Fundamental Right to Life and Health

The woman's right to have access to needed medical services and more broadly her right to life and health are also at stake here. The right to life is, of course, self-evident and the right to protect health seems equally fundamental. See Jacobson v. Massachusetts, 197 U.S. 11 (1905). As this Court acknowledged in United States v. Vuitch, 91 S.Ct. 1294 (1971), health includes all aspects of physical and mental well-being. While, in Vuitch, this Court was construing the District of Columbia statute, we believe that implicit in that construction was the recognition that people must be free to safeguard health as defined broadly in that case.

Freedom to obtain medical services for safeguarding health (regardless of whether the risk is "permanent," as it must be under Georgia law) must be deemed an aspect of life and liberty if the Ninth and Fourteenth Amendments are to have meaning. There can hardly be a more basic attribute of freedom than the right to be secure from physical or emotional harm and the question of whether and how health should be protected is one uniquely suited to solution by the patient and the physician.

D. The Physician's Right to Provide His Patients with the Best Medical Treatment

The right of physicians to provide medical services to their patients must also be deemed fundamental and, as we have shown in Point I, abortion is a recognized medical service. Yet these Texas and Georgia laws prevent doctors from providing abortions for reasons wholly unrelated to medical and health considerations.

Amici suggest that there is no dispute as to the fundamental freedom of professionally trained people to pursue their calling on the basis of their training and expertise. This was the doctrine of Dent v. West Virginia, 129 U.S. 114 (1889), and is implicit in many later decisions of this Court. See, e.g., Willner v. Committee on Character and Fitness, 373 U.S. 96 (1963); Greene v. McElroy, 360 U.S. 474 (1959); Schware v. Board of Bar Examiners, 353 U.S. 232 (1957).

Physicians, like other members of learned professions, serve society by the exercise of expert judgment; they are responsible for the well-being of patients. Arbitrary government interposition of non-medical barriers between the patient and the exercise of the physician's professional judgment represents a serious infringement of the personal liberty of doctors. See Dent v. West Virginia, supra. See also United States v. Freund, 290 Fed. 411 (D. Mont. 1923); United States v. One Package, 86 F. 2d 737 (2d Cir. 1936). As this Court stated in Dent:

> "Few professions require more careful preparation by one who seeks to enter it than that of medicine. * * * The physician must be able to detect readily the presence of disease, and prescribe appropriate remedies for its removal." 129 U.S. at 122.

And, as the district court concluded in Freund, a law which arbitrarily forbids a doctor from exercising his skill in a manner approved by medical consensus, is "an unreasonable mandate to malpractice * * * and is invalid." 290 Fed. at 413.[81]

81. Amici suggest that Lambert v. Yellowley, 272 U.S. 581 (1926), and Everard's Breweries v. Day, 265 U.S. 545 (1924), which overruled United States v. Freund, 290 Fed. 411 (D. Mont. 1923) by implication, are not relevant here because in Lambert and

In deciding the medical procedures to follow in all situations other than those involving abortion doctors are free to make objective decisions based on the medical situation and on medically relevant factors presented. It makes little sense to speak of the freedom to learn and to study if the state can interpose itself arbitrarily and direct a physician to disregard his skills and the well-being of his patients.

Moreover, the restrictive abortion laws often create for a doctor the dilemma of whether to follow the dictates of his conscience as a physician and use his medical skills to protect the patient or act in his own self-interest, regardless of the cost to the health and well-being of his patient and even when there are grounds to believe the patient is eligible for legal abortion. While the state may properly require doctors to act responsibly in the interest of the welfare of their patients, it may not, amici submit, require doctors to act irresponsibly to their patients because the state has put the doctor in the position of subordinating the patient's welfare to his own self-interest in avoiding risk of prosecution. Thus, the state has created a conflict of interest between the doctor and the patient and has restricted doctors in a manner wholly inconsistent with freedom to pursue their profession according to the best standards of medical practice.

Everard the Court found that there was "no consensus of opinion among physicians and medical authorities that they [the restricted liquors] have any substantial value as medicinal agents. * * *" Everard's Breweries v. Day, supra at 562. Indeed, the consensus of opinion appeared to be against the value of the prohibited liquors as medicinal agents. The holding in Freund, on the other hand, was based upon a finding of consensus in favor of the proscribed treatment. As pointed out in Point I, abortion is a fully accepted medical procedure.

E. Since Neither the Texas nor the Georgia Statute Promotes any Compelling State Interest, Both Violate the Ninth and Fourteenth Amendments to the Constitution.

Since the right to choose whether or not to bear a child and the right to give and receive medical treatment are fundamental rights of constitutional magnitude, the states of Georgia and Texas bear a heavy burden of justification for the severe restrictions on abortion contained in the laws at issue in these cases. As this Court stated in Bates v. Little Rock, 361 U.S. 516 (1960):

> "Where there is a significant encroachment upon personal liberty, the state may prevail only upon showing a subordinating interest which is compelling. N.A.A.C.P. v. Alabama, 357 U.S. 449. See also Jacobson v. Massachusetts, 197 U.S. 11; Schneider v. State, 308 U.S. 147; Cox v. New Hampshire, 312 U.S. 569, 574; Murdock v. Pennsylvania, 319 U.S. 105; Prince v. Massachusetts, 321 U.S. 158; Kovacs v. Cooper, 336 U.S. 77." 361 U.S. at 524.

We believe that no more than four hypothetical state interests can be put forth by Texas and Georgia to support their statutory limitations on the permissible grounds for performance of abortions—(a) enforcing morals; (b) increasing population; (c) protecting the health of the pregnant woman; and (d) protecting the fetus. We shall discuss each of these interests separately but briefly in order to demonstrate that the statutes involved cannot stand on any of them.

1. Enforcing Morals

Any asserted state interest in enforcing morals by forbidding abortions, on the theory that this would prevent illicit sexual conduct, scarcely merits discussion. In the first place, if such an interest were asserted, the statutes would present clear instances of impermissible overbreath since neither Texas nor Georgia draws any distinction between pregnancies occurring within the marriage relationship and those outside it. Moreover, in Texas no distinction is drawn between consensual and non-consensual intercourse.

Narrowly drawn statutes exist or may be devised for the purpose of deterring sexual misconduct. Reliance upon anti-abortion statutes as a deterrent is not only overbroad but to "prescribe * * * [an unwanted pregnancy] * * * as a punishment for illicit intercourse would be a monstrous thing." State v. Baird, 50 N.J. 376, 383, 235 A. 2d 673, 677 (1967) (concurring opinion, Weintraub, C.J.). See also Baird v. Eisenstadt, 429 F. 2d 1398, 1402 (1st Cir. 1970), prob. juris. noted, 401 U.S. 934 (1970) (No. 804, 1970 Term; renumbered No. 70-17, 1971 Term). Moreover, there is no reasonable basis for believing that illegal sexual behavior has been or will be deterred by proscribing abortion.

Amici submit that any interest in deterring fornication or adultery cannot be deemed sufficiently compelling to justify the interference worked by these statutes on the rights of women (including married women pregnant by their husbands) and the rights of their physicians.

2. Increasing Population

With respect to any possible state interest in fostering population growth by unwanted pregnancies, amici need only point to the increasing concern of the United States Government and the governments of many of the states as well as of the United Nations and its constituent members with the threat posed by population increases.[82] In view of the widely acknowledged dangers of continued increase in population and of the myriad problems presented by unwanted pregnancies,[83] it is inconceivable that any serious attempt can be made to justify statutes restricting the grounds for abortion as a means of assuring continued population growth.

3. The Statutes Do Not Serve the Health Interests of Pregnant Women.

While the state admittedly has an interest in adopting appropriate narrowly drawn measures designed to protect the health and safety of all who seek medical care, no health interest can possibly be served by limiting the grounds for the performance of abortions.[84]

At one time, abortion, like other surgery, was dangerous. However, given the state of modern medical knowledge and present-day surgical techniques and procedures, 82. See, e.g., Presidential Message on Population, 115 CONG. REC. 20025-29 (1969); Commission on Population Growth and the American Future, An Interim Report to the President and the Congress (1971).

83. See supra at 24-29.

84. Georgia does not appear in the past to have argued that the purpose of its statutory limits on the grounds for abortion is to protect the health of women. See Jurisdictional Statement at 14-15, Bolton v. Doe, appeal dismissed, 91 S.Ct. 1614 (1971).

it can no longer be argued that these statutes are public health measures designed to protect the pregnant woman from hazards of abortion. For the fact is that today an abortion performed during the early stages of pregnancy in safe clinical surroundings by a physician involves less risk to the woman than does childbirth itself.[85]

The Texas and Georgia statutes and others like them, far from serving any health interest, have in fact created enormous public health problems by forcing women to bear unwanted children or resort to primitive methods of self-abortion or go to unqualified and/or discredited performers of abortions, which often result in serious injury or death.[86] If a woman is unable to justify her right to an abortion under the terms of the Texas or Georgia statutes, then unless she has the ability and the funds to seek a safe, legal abortion in another state or country, her only alternative is either to risk an unsafe, illegal abortion or to bear a child against her will, despite the fact that the pregnancy may be medically contraindicated.

The Texas law makes no pretext of considering the woman's health interests, except in the most extreme cases. The Georgia statute is somewhat less draconian, but in requiring "serious" and "permanent" injury to the woman's health before an abortion can be performed, it also demonstrates its lack of concern with real health needs. Moreover, the statute's onerous procedural requirements render abortion even in cases of threatened "serious" and "permanent" injury illusory for many women, and in addition contain no provision permitting abortion in emergencies. Thus, the threat to health is enhanced and the disregard of health made clear.

When the unwanted pregnancy occurs out of wedlock, particularly to a teenager, compulsory birth of an unwanted child is peculiarly detrimental to the child born and to the community as well as to the mother.[87] But whether the pregnancy occurs in or out of marriage, it is plain that the harmful effects of compulsory pregnancy and childbirth far outweigh any health danger to a woman for whom an abortion is performed by a licensed physician in proper clinical surroundings.

4. Protecting the Interest of the Fetus

The final interest that might be urged by Georgia and Texas is the states' alleged interest in the fetus after fertilization has occurred.

Amici contend that even assuming the states may be said to have interests in the potentiality for life that is represented by the fetus in the early stages of pregnancy, such interests cannot constitutionally be given precedence over the fundamental rights of women.

The California Supreme Court in People v. Belous, supra, correctly noted that "the law has always recognized that the pregnant woman's right to life takes precedence over any interest the state may have in the unborn,"[88] and both the Texas and Georgia statutes acknowledge this,

87. See pp. 24-29, supra.

88. People v. Belous, 71 Cal. 2d 954, 969, 80 Cal. Rptr. 354, 363, 458 P. 2d 194, 203 (1969) cert. denied, 397 U.S. 915 (1970).

although the inhibitions imposed on doctors by the threat of criminal prosecution tends to jeopardize women's lives. Georgia's more permissive statute also negates any claim that the state considers the fetus to have rights equal to those of the pregnant woman. Moreover, the states, through their criminal laws have neither equated abortion with murder nor made any effort to outlaw the use of the intrauterine device which in fact may function to prevent implantation after fertilization has occurred.[89]

Any assertion that the fetus' interests take precedence over the constitutional rights of women derives from non-secular considerations such as a conclusion as to "when life begins." In a culturally and religiously pluralistic society, the beliefs of individuals on matters such as this vary widely on the basis of religion and moral value systems. For those who equate abortion with murder, any state law sanctioning abortion in any situation, even where necessary to save life, is an anathema. But the differences which exist on this question in our society are religious and philosophical; they cannot be resolved by legislative fiat, nor, we believe, is it constitutionally permissible for the state to adopt the metaphysical belief of some about the nature of the fetus, particularly when, in so doing, it infringes the fundamental rights of living persons.

Conclusion

For the reasons stated in this brief and in the briefs of the appellants, amici respectfully urge that this Court affirm the judgments of the three-judge courts below insofar as they held unconstitutional the limitations in the Georgia and Texas statutes on the grounds for the performance of abortions, reverse the judgment of the Texas three-judge court insofar as it denied injunctive relief, and reverse the judgment of the Georgia three-judge court insofar as it denied injunctive relief and upheld the constitutionality of the residency, consultation, committee approval and joint accreditation requirements of the Georgia law.

IN THE

Supreme Court of the United States

No. 70-40, 1971 Term

MARY DOE, et al.,

Appellants,

—v.—

ARTHUR K. BOLTON, Attorney General of the State of Georgia, et al.,

Appellees.

ON APPEAL FROM THE UNITED STATES DISTRICT COURT FOR THE NORTHERN DISTRICT OF GEORGIA

MOTION FOR LEAVE TO FILE A BRIEF AS AMICI CURIAE FOR THE AMERICAN COLLEGE OF OBSTETRICIANS AND GYNECOLOGISTS, AMERICAN MEDICAL WOMEN'S ASSOCIATION, AMERICAN PSYCHIATRIC ASSOCIATION, NEW YORK ACADEMY OF MEDICINE, MEDICAL SCHOOL DEANS AND PROFESSORS, AND CERTAIN INDIVIDUAL PHYSICIANS

Pursuant to Rule 42(3) of this Court, the organizations and physicians named on the cover and initial pages of this Motion, respectfully ask leave to file the annexed brief as Amici Curiae in the above-styled case.

Counsel for appellant have not responded to the request for leave to file a brief. Counsel for appellee asked Amici to seek the leave of this Court.

Interest of Amici Curiae

Amici are organizations and individuals from the medical profession generally, as well as particular specialties.

Amicus American College of Obstetricians and Gynecologists was founded in 1951 and has 13,400 Fellows and Junior Fellows. ACOG was organized in part to "establish and maintain the highest possible standards for obstetric and gynecologic education in medical schools and hospitals, obstetric and gynecologic practice and research" and to "maintain the dignity and efficiency of obstetric and gynecologic practice in its relationship to public welfare." The ACOG "Policy on Abortion" recognizes that "abortion may be performed at a patient's request, or upon a physician's recommendation." (For complete text of policy statement, see Appendix A.)

Amicus American Medical Women's Association, which was organized over 56 years ago, is composed of some 2,000 women physicians and women medical students throughout the United States and territories. AMWA has supported liberalization of abortion laws "for those who, for family planning or health reasons, wish it, and that this be done with the approval of their physicians."

Amicus American Psychiatric Association is a scientific and educational medical organization, composed of 18,783 qualified doctors of medicine who specialize as psychiatrists in the diagnosis, care and treatment of mental diseases and defects of the mind. It is the second largest medical specialty organization in the United States. Abortions are a prime interest to psychiatrists because pregnancy, child-bearing, birth and abortion can have material effects upon the mental processes of patients requiring psychiatric diagnosis, evaluation and care. The Board of Trustees of the APA on Dec. 12-13, 1969, upon the recommendation of the Committee on Psychiatry and Law, approved the following:

"Position Statement on Abortion"

"A decision to perform an abortion should be regarded as strictly a medical decision and a medical responsibility. It should be removed entirely from the jurisdiction of criminal law. Criminal penalties should be reserved for persons who perform abortions without medical license or qualifications to do so. A medical decision to perform an abortion is based on the careful and informed judgments of the physician and the patient. Among other factors to be considered in arriving at the decision is the motivation of the patient.

> Often psychiatric consultation can help clarify motivational problems and thereby contribute to the patient's welfare."

Composed of 3,118 Fellows, Amicus the New York Academy of Medicine was incorporated, by special act of the Legislature of the State of New York in 1851, for the advancement of science and medicine:

> "The New York Academy of Medicine recommends repeal of those sections of the criminal code referable to the performance of abortion by qualified physicians and further supports the legal changes that would place abortion under the general provisions of the medical practices act of all the various states."

The individual Amici also include over 170 medical school deans, departmental chairmen, and professors of both obstetrics and gynecology and other branches of medicine.

Amici have a vital interest in overturning the jurisdictional holding of the lower court. The panel found no "case or controversy" posed by the sub-class of physician plaintiffs. Doe v. Bolton, 319 F. Supp. 1048, 1052-54 (N.D. Ga. 1970) (per curiam); J.S., at 4-a to 9-a. Although the district court upheld the "standing" of the physician class, the judges denied that physicians who "are not free to perform or counsel the obtaining of abortions" may contest the law short of inviting criminal prosecution. Id.

This determination runs completely contrary to decisions by this Court, e.g., Investment Co. Institute v. Camp, 401 U.S. 617, 620 (1971); LSCRRC v. Wadmond, 401 U.S. 154, 158-59 (1971); Epperson v. Arkansas, 393 U.S. 97, 101-02 (1968); Abbott Laboratories v. Gardner, 387 U.S. 136, 151-53 (1967). It also asks the near impossible of physicians and their patients. Either a pregnant woman must file an action and await lengthy judicial deliberations which risk her very life and health (fifteen weeks intervened between the April 16, 1970, filing date and the July 31 decision in this case). Or, a physician must invite criminal prosecution, where none is necessary to reveal the continuing impact of the statute's restrictions. Only two physicians in Anglo-American history have had sufficient courage to choose the latter route. See Rex v. Bourne [1939] 1 K.B. 687; Hodgson v. Randall, 314 F. Supp. 32 (D. Minn. 1970), aff'd mem., 402 U.S. —— (May 17, 1971).

Amici have a second important interest in the merits. The Georgia law regulating the medical procedure of abortion is patterned after analogous Model Penal Code provisions.[1] Similar laws are currently in force in twelve states.[2] Amici include or represent physicians from each of these additional jurisdictions. A decision on this appeal will have the effect of settling, one way or another, objections to those other eleven statutes. For this reason, Amici have a legitimate claim to be heard.

Equally important to the Amici is the need to present medical data to the Court concerning the implementation of this type of legislation. On a cumulative as well as state-by-state basis, data have gradually become available from public health authorities. These reveal discriminatory variations in access to medical abortions, from county-to-county, hospital-to-hospital, and state to state. All purport to be operating under similar statutory language.

To the extent that these data have bearing upon the constitutional questions before this Court, Amici have prepared illustrative tables and charts. These appear in Appendix B to the brief annexed hereto.

Amici Curiae, as physicians, also have data and argument in support of the contention that state law cannot rationally differentiate the medical procedure of abortion from all other procedures, by limiting the former to general community hospitals accredited by the Joint Commission on Accreditation of Hospitals [JCAH]. The aforementioned tables and charts show the paucity of such fully accredited hospitals in the affected states, such as Georgia, Arkansas, and another eight states with substantially the same requirement. This lack of available facilities is accentuated by the tendency for many accredited hospital directorates to permit their physicians to perform few or no medical abortions.

---

[2] The twelve states are: Arkansas, California, Colorado, Delaware, Kansas, Maryland, New Mexico, North Carolina, Oregon, South Carolina, Virginia, and Georgia.

In some states, however, the laws permit specialized abortion facilities. In others, data from abortion experience suggests that the limitation of this medical procedure to fully accredited general community hospitals goes far beyond legitimate public health demands. Amici have assembled the most relevant and recent scientific findings. These are discussed in the annexed brief.

In two respects the brief for Amici Curiae will supplement the brief for appellants in a manner useful to the Court. First, Amici will concentrate arguments primarily on the interference of the statute with physicians, patients, and the physician-patient relationship.

Second, Amici will present these arguments from a national perspective, by showing how the Georgia-type law compares with laws in other states, both in terminology and implementation at the statewide, county, and hospital levels.

For the most part, the data materials are no more technical than the far more extensive records filed in antitrust, patent, and food and drug litigation. Amici have prepared the annexed brief and appendix to ensure that the Court will not be without what Judge Learned Hand denominated as "the aid of unpartisan and authoritative scientific assistance in the administration of justice" in this case. See Parke-Davis & Co. v. H. K. Mulford Co., 189 Fed. 95, 115 (C.C.S.D.N.Y. 1911) (L. Hand, J., referring to the need for technical assistance in interpreting the patent on "adrenalin.").

For the reasons set forth, the Court should grant the Motion of Amici and receive the annexed brief.

Respectfully submitted,

Roy Lucas,
Attorney for Movant Amici Curiae.

Questions Presented 1

Statute Involved 3

Statement of the Case 7

I. Medical Aspects of Abortion 7

II. Incidence of Medically Induced Abortion 13

III. Incidence and Sequelae of Nonmedical Abortion 15

IV. Abortion and Contraception 16

A. Contraceptive Failure 16

B. Lack of Access to Contraception 18

ARGUMENT:

JURISDICTION:

I. The District Court had jurisdiction to grant declaratory and injunctive relief to the class of physicians 22

A. Physicians have standing to assert their own fundamental personal rights, and those of the class of their patients who seek medical advice and treatment, because enforcement of the statute in question is almost solely against physicians, the physicians' interests are inextricably related to those of their patients, and the rights of patients cannot be adequately protected unless considered along with those of physicians 22

1. Standing of Physicians 22

2. Physician's Standing to Assert Patient's Right to Seek Medical Care 23

B. The drastic regular and recurring impact of the statute upon physicians and their patients poses a continuing case or controversy, which is ripe for adjudication, because physicians are deterred and hampered by the statute in advising and treating their patients, and repeatedly compelled to refuse to provide medical care out of a reasonable fear of enforcement of the statute 25

C. Injunctive relief was necessary to prevent inevitable grave and immediate injury to physicians and their patients, because defense of criminal and/or administrative proceedings in a single case could not eliminate the recurring controversy, and the mere fact of such a state proceeding would drastically invade the physician-patient relationship, as well as exert an in terrorem effect upon the profession 34

THE MERITS:

II. The provisions in Georgia Criminal Code §§26-1201, -1202(a)(1)-(3), -1202(b)(1)-(9), -1202(c), and -1202(e), which differentiate the medical procedures of therapeutic and elective induced abortion from all other forms of health care, deprive physicians of the fundamental personal right to administer to their patients, and patients of the right to seek medical care, in violation of the Due Process and Equal Protection clauses of the Fourteenth Amendment .. 37

A. The rights of physicians to administer health care, and of patients to seek medical treatment, are fundamental personal interests recognized by national and international standards of medical practice, and protected by the First, Ninth, and Fourteenth Amendments 38

1. Physicians Have a Fundamental Right to Administer Health Care Without Arbitrary State Interference 38

2. Patients Have a Fundamental Right to Seek Health Care Which Includes the Treatment of Medical Abortion 41

B. The Equal Protection and Due Process clauses of the Fourteenth Amendment require that restrictive classifications in the challenged statute be narrowly drawn and supported by compelling state interests, in order not to abridge fundamental personal rights 45

C. The Georgia law on medical abortion, and similar laws in eleven other states, restrict access to this medical procedure in a manner which offends the Equal Protection clause of the Fourteenth Amendment 48

1. The "Health" Clause Is Interpreted Differently in Every State, Community, and Hospital, and Has Been Demonstrated to Be Without a Reasonably Specific Meaning 49

2. Widespread Discrimination on the Basis of a Patient's Place of Abode Has Resulted From the Statute and Its Uneven Administration 61

D. The provisions in Georgia Criminal Code §§26-1201, -1202(a)(1)-(3), -1202(b)(1)-(9), -1202(c), and -1202(e) are not narrowly drawn and do not advance a compelling state interest 68

1. The Limitation of Medical Justifications to Cases in Which: (1) Continuation of Pregnancy Would "Endanger the Life" of the Woman, or "Seriously and Permanently Injure Her Health," or (2) "[t]he Fetus Would Very Likely Be Born With a Grave, Permanent, and Irreme-

dial Mental or Physical Defect," or (3) "[t]he Pregnancy Resulted From Forcible or Statutory Rape," Is Neither Narrowly Drawn Nor Supported by Any Compelling State Interests 69

a. The limiting provisions are not rationally related to a public health interest 70

b. The provisions advance no legitimate interest in protecting human life 72

c. The provisions do not advance any rational moral value 73

2. The Requirement That Patients Requesting a Therapeutic or Elective Abortion Be Examined and Certified by Three Physicians, and That Certifications Be Approved Further by a Hospital Committee of Three or More Physicians, Is Neither Narrowly Drawn Nor Supportive of a Compelling State Interest 74

a. The consulting requirement precludes a clinical relationship by creating an adversarial one, which serves no medical purpose 74

b. Multiple physician consultations have no rational justification where the patient has no specialized medical problem which could complicate the induced abortion procedure 76

c. The committee process is devoid of procedures which remotely resemble those required by the due process clause 78

3. The requirement that the medical procedure of abortion be undertaken only in hospitals accredited by the Joint Commission on Accreditation of Hospitals unjustifiably discriminates against a single medical procedure, and seriously limits the availability of medical facilities for abortion, without advancing any compelling state interest 80

a. The JCAH itself does not advocate that medical procedures be confined to a given type of facility or limited to particular patient circumstances .. 82

b. No public health justification can be advanced for confining the medical procedure of abortion to those limited institutions which are JCAH-accredited 85

4. The prohibition further limiting access to the medical procedure of induced abortion to the single class of patients who are "bona fide legal resident[s] of the State of Georgia" violates the Privileges and Immunities clause of Article IV, §2, and the Equal Protection clause of the Fourteenth Amendment by excluding non-resident patients for reasons which are neither narrowly drawn nor supportive of any legitimate, compelling state interest 90

ON APPEAL FROM THE UNITED STATES DISTRICT COURT FOR THE NORTHERN DISTRICT OF GEORGIA

BRIEF FOR THE AMERICAN COLLEGE OF OBSTETRICIANS AND GYNECOLOGISTS, AMERICAN MEDICAL WOMEN'S ASSOCIATION, AMERICAN PSYCHIATRIC ASSOCIATION, NEW YORK ACADEMY OF MEDICINE, MEDICAL SCHOOL DEANS AND PROFESSORS, AND CERTAIN INDIVIDUAL PHYSICIANS AS AMICI CURIAE

Interest of Amici Curiae

The professional and personal interests of the Amici Curiae in the subject matter of this case are described in the Motion for leave to file this brief, supra.

Questions Presented

I. Whether the district court should have granted both declaratory and injunctive relief to the class of physician plaintiffs, to prevent continuing drastic and irreparable injury caused by the statute in question, which sharply curtails access to the medical procedure of induced abortion.

II. Whether the classifications in Georgia Criminal Code §§26-1201, -1202(a)(1)-(3), -1202(b)(1)-(9), -1202(c), and -1202(e), which differentiate the medical procedure of induced abortion from all other forms of therapeutic and elective health care, by:

[A] confining the procedure to the limited number of hospitals both accredited by the Joint Commission on Accreditation of Hospitals [JCAH] and licensed as hospitals by the Georgia State Board of Health; and

[B] requiring that the patient's chosen physician obtain the approval of (1) two additional examining physicians, and (2) a hospital committee of three or more physicians before performing a medical abortion; and

[C] limiting the medical justifications for the procedure to instances certified by all of the above physicians wherein: (1) continuation of pregnancy would "endanger the life" of the woman, or "seriously and permanently injure her health," or (2) "[t]he fetus would very likely be born with a grave, permanent, and irremedial mental or physical defect," or (3) "[t]he pregnancy resulted from forcible or statutory rape;" and further

[D] restricting access to the medical procedure of induced abortion to the single class of patients who are "bona fide legal resident[s] of the State of Georgia," violate the Equal Protection and Due Process clauses of the Fourteenth Amendment by unjustifiably abridging the fundamental personal rights to administer and seek medical care.

Statute Involved

GEORGIA CRIMINAL CODE §§26-1201, through -1203, at 85-89 (1969) provides:

26-1201. Criminal abortion.—Except as otherwise provided in section 26-1202, a person commits criminal abortion when he administers any medicine, drug or other substance whatever to any woman or when he uses any instrument or other means whatever upon any woman with intent to produce a miscarriage or abortion.

26-1202. Exception.—(a) Section 26-1201 shall not apply to an abortion performed by a physician duly licensed to practice medicine and surgery pursuant to Chapter 84-9 or 84-12 of the Code of Georgia of 1933, as amended, based upon his best clinical judgment that an abortion is necessary because:

(1) A continuation of the pregnancy would endanger the life of the pregnant woman or would seriously and permanently injure her health; or

(2) The fetus would very likely be born with a grave, permanent, and irremedial mental or physical defect; or

(3) The pregnancy resulted from forcible or statutory rape.

(b) No abortion is authorized or shall be performed under this section unless each of the following conditions is met:

(1) The pregnant woman requesting the abortion certifies in writing under oath and subject to the penalties of false swearing to the physician who proposes to perform the abortion that she is a bona fide legal resident of the State of Georgia.

(2) The physician certifies that he believes the woman is a bona fide resident of this State and that he has no information which should lead him to believe otherwise.

(3) Such physician's judgment is reduced to writing and concurred in by at least two other physicians duly licensed to practice medicine and surgery pursuant to Chapter 84-9 of the Code of Georgia of 1933, as amended, who certify in writing that based upon their separate personal medical examinations of the pregnant woman, the abortion is, in their judgment, necessary because of one or more of the reasons enumerated above.

(4) Such abortion is performed in a hospital licensed by the State Board of Health and accredited by the Joint Commission on Accreditation of Hospitals.

(5) The performance of the abortion has been approved in advance by a committee of the medical staff of the hospital in which the operation is to be performed. This committee must be one established and maintained in accordance with the standards promulgated by the Joint Commission on the Accreditation of Hospitals, and its approval must be by a majority vote of a membership of not less than three members of the hospital's staff; the physician proposing to perform the operation may not be counted as a member of the committee for this purpose.

(6) If the proposed abortion is considered necessary because the woman has been raped, the woman makes a written statement under oath, and subject to the penalties of false swearing, of the date, time and place of the rape and the name of the rapist, if known. There must be attached to this statement a certified copy of any report of the rape made by any law enforcement officer or agency and a statement by the solicitor general of the judicial circuit where the rape occurred or allegedly occurred that, according to his best information, there is probable cause to believe that the rape did occur.

(7) Such written opinions, statements, certificates, and concurrences are maintained in the permanent files of such hospital and are available at all reasonable times to the solicitor general of the judicial circuit in which the hospital is located.

(8) A copy of such written opinions, statements, certificates, and concurrences is filed with the Director of the State Department of Public Health within 10 days after such operation is performed.

(9) All written opinions, statements, certificates, and concurrences filed and maintained pursuant to paragraphs (7) and (8) of this subsection shall be confidential records and shall not be made available for public inspection at any time.

(c) Any solicitor general of the judicial circuit in which an abortion is to be performed under this section, or any person who would be a relative of the child within the second degree of consanguinity, may petition the superior court of the county in which the abortion is to be performed for a declaratory judgment whether the performance of such abortion would violate any constitutional or other legal rights of the fetus. Such solicitor general may also petition such court for the purpose of taking issue with compliance with the requirements of this section. The physician who proposes to perform the abortion and the pregnant woman shall be respondents. The petition shall be heard expeditiously and if the court adjudges that such abortion would violate the constitutional or other legal rights of the fetus, the court shall so declare and shall restrain the physician from performing the abortion.

(d) If an abortion is performed in compliance with this section, the death of the fetus shall not give rise to any claim for wrongful death.

(e) Nothing in this section shall require a hospital to admit any patient under the provisions hereof for the purpose of performing an abortion, nor shall any hospital be required to appoint a committee such as contemplated under subsection (b) (5). A physician, or any other person who is a member of or associated with the staff of a hospital, or any employee of a hospital in which an abortion has been authorized, who shall state in writing an objection to such abortion on moral or religious grounds shall not be required to participate in the medical procedures which will result in the abortion, and the refusal of any such person to participate therein shall not form the basis of any claim for damages on account of such refusal or for any disciplinary or recriminatory action against such person.

26-1203. Punishment.—A person convicted of criminal abortion shall be punished by imprisonment for not less than one nor more than 10 years.

Statement of the Case

The specific facts which gave rise to this action and appeal are fully set out in appellants' brief. Amici will accordingly not repeat those matters, but will concentrate instead upon the broader national impact of the Court's decision in this case, and background data which may aid the Court in its deliberations.

I. Medical Aspects of Abortion

The standard text on obstetrics and gynecology, coauthored by the dean of American gynecology, now Deputy Assistant Secretary for Population Affairs, HEW, Louis M. Hellman, M.D., defines abortion, both spontaneous and induced, as follows:

> "Abortion is the termination of a pregnancy at any time before the fetus has attained a stage of viability. Interpretations of the word 'viability' have varied between fetal weights of 400 g (about 20 weeks of gestation) and 1,000 g (about 28 weeks of gestation) . . . . Although our smallest surviving infant weighed 540 g at birth, survival even at 700 or 800 g is unusual." L. HELLMAN & J. PRITCHARD, WILLIAMS OBSTETRICS 493 (14th ed. 1971).

The procedure of induced abortion differs from spontaneous not in the result, nor in the underlying reason for the abortion but primarily in its being conscious and volitional. For example, a patient infected with rubella (German measles) may abort spontaneously, because her body rejects a badly damaged embryo. Another similarly situated patient may seek an induced abortion as part of a reasoned mental judgment in order to reject a damaged embryo in favor of a subsequent normal pregnancy. From this perspective, "spontaneous abortion can be regarded as an important biologic mechanism which has evolved in viviparous animals to deal with the numerous embryologic errors arising during development." Potts, Postconceptive Control of Fertility, 8 INTERNATIONAL J. OF GYNECOLOGY & OBSTETRICS 957 (1970).

Spontaneous abortions cannot be brought about, under current technology, solely by the will of the patient. Yet, the bio-chemical systems of patients play an increasing role in what had previously been regarded as an accidental phenomenon. One recent study of spontaneously aborted embryos showed that 38% "had a chromosomal abnormality." Carr, Chromosome Studies in Selected Spontaneous Abortions, 37 OBSTETRICS & GYNECOLOGY 750 (1971). Not only do fetal defects frequently cause spontaneous abortion, but numerous other causes beyond the patient's control, and often working in her favor, appear to be involved. In fact, "[w]hen pregnancy is defined as beginning at fertilization or implantation, then the rate of spontaneous wastage is even higher and may approach 50%." Potts, supra.

No law requires that a patient seek or a physician provide treatment to prevent spontaneous abortion. Neither nature nor the law values an embryo which the patient's bio-chemical system rejects. In such cases the needs of the patient, and the treatment provided by the physician are committed by law in every state to the discretion of the physician and patient, and accepted medical practice. No hospital committees interfere with this relationship; no government programs seek to promote confinement and treatment in cases of threatened spontaneous abortion.

Indeed, spontaneous abortions before the fourth week of pregnancy are "perceived by the patient as delayed menstruation or may not be recognized at all." L. HELLMAN & J. PRITCHARD, WILLIAMS OBSTETRICS 496 (14th ed. 1971). This is perhaps the case because in early pregnancy, when the overwhelming number of all abortions take place, embryonic development has scarcely begun. "The 4 weeks old embryo measures 5 mm. [1/5 in.]. . . ." Shettles, Fertilization and Early Development From the Inner Cell Mass, in SCIENTIFIC FOUNDATIONS OF OBSTETRICS AND GYNECOLOGY 154 (E. E. Philipp, et al., eds. 1970). As noted in standard embryology texts,

> "during these early stages, the development of all mammals is fundamentally the same. The specific characteristics of any form emerge but slowly, and relatively late. . . . The illustrations of sections of 5-mm human embryos are quite applicable, for example, to similarly located sections of 5-mm pig embryos. The basic plan of early body structure is amazingly similar." B. PATTEN, HUMAN EMBRYOLOGY 5 (3d ed. 1968).

The 5-mm embryo, for example, still has "a conspicuous tail . . ." L. AREY, DEVELOPMENTAL ANATOMY 98 (7th ed. 1965) (italics in original).

Neither the medical profession nor state health authorities treat spontaneous or induced abortions prior to 20 weeks of development as events which in any way are comparable to the loss of human life. As one prominent physician recently stated:

> "To the medical profession operating within its present framework, the conceptus, prior to twenty weeks of age, does not have the same legal status as one after that time. Should there be an untimely birth before twenty weeks, the act is considered an abortion, not a delivery, and is not listed on the > mother's parity record. A birth or death certificate is not required and the body is handled as a pathological specimen without requiring legal interment." Ryan, Humane Abortion Laws and the Health Needs of Society, 17 W. Res. L. Rev. 424, 427 (1965).

Induced abortion, in medical practice, is a relatively minor surgical procedure, insofar as risks to the patient's physical or mental well-being are concerned. This exceptional safety consideration was noted by Dr. John McKelvey, former head of obstetrics and gynecology at the University of Minnesota:

> "Under ideal circumstances, abortions can be done with very little vital risk. The procedures which are open to the poor on the contrary can be very risky not only to the life of the individual but to her future health." McKelvey, The Abortion Problem, 50 Minn. Med. 119, 124 (1967).

The degree of safety can be readily seen by comparing patient mortality rates for induced abortion with those of childbirth and other typical medical procedures.

The maternal mortality rate in the United States for 1967 averaged 28.0 deaths per 100,000 live births. For nonwhites the rate was almost three times as high, 69.5 deaths per 100,000 live births.[1] The comparable mortality rates for various surgical procedures in the United States, per 100,000 operations, have been as follows:[2] Appendectomy[3]

---

[1] U.S. Bureau of the Census: Statistical Abstracts of the United States: 1970, Table 69, at 55 (91st ed.).

[2] The data are derived from surveys by the Commission on Professional and Hospital Activities, in Ann Arbor, Michigan, which are published in the Professional Activities Survey (PAS) Re-—400 per 100,000; Cholecystectomy[4] (gall bladder operation)—1,600 per 100,000; Tonsillectomy/adenoidectomy[5]—5.2 per 100,000.

In the years 1963 to 1968, therapeutic abortions were unavailable in the United States on any large scale. Most patients had to show serious physical or mental disease to obtain the procedure. Of the 9,722 therapeutic abortions in the 1963-68 survey by the Commission on Professional and Hospital Activities only a single death "unequivocally resulted from the operation."[6] This death represents the equivalent of a mortality rate of 10.3 per 100,000 therapeutic abortions. Even this figure is misleadingly high in that the abortion was induced by an abdominal operation (hysterotomy) which poses substantial hazards of its own. Nonetheless, a 10.3 rate is 2.7 times safer than childbirth, 38.8 times safer than appendectomy, and 155 times safer than cholecystectomy, all other factors being equal.

A more correct estimation of the surgical risks from induced abortion can be made by examining the induced abortion mortality rates from other jurisdictions, in which abortion is available as an elective procedure in cases of contraceptive failure.

In England and Wales, which only recently reformed their 1803 abortion law, the 1968-1969 data showed a total of 15 deaths from 54,000 legal abortions, a rate of 28.0 per 100,000.[7] This included, however, "the many surgeons within the N.H.S. [National Health Service] who perform a few abortions each [and] have had a higher death rate (36/100,000) than the few surgeons who do many abortions in private practice (14.2/100,000)."[8]

Again, the British data do not begin to demonstrate the safety of elective abortion in a sample wherein the patients are healthy, the medical practitioners skilled, and the procedures undertaken in very early pregnancy. This circumstance, moreover, does not exist even in northern Europe "where rates of about 40 per 100,000 have been reported in recent years."[9] There, higher mortality rates resulted in large part from "the fact that a substantial proportion of legal abortions is performed after the third month of gestation."[10] Only in eastern Europe, where "almost all legal abortions are performed in the first trimester of pregnancy with the majority in the second month,"[11] have mortality rates fallen to as few as 1.2 per 100,000 operations (Hungary: 1964-67, 9 deaths, 739,000 legal abortions).

The extent to which elective induced abortion for healthy women is enormously safer than childbirth and various other medical procedures can be seen by tabulating the figures given above:

Medical Procedure or Event	Mortality (per 100,000 procedures)
Elective induced abortion (Hungary: 1964-67)	1.2
Tonsillectomy (U. S.: PAS 1969)	5.2
Therapeutic induced abortion (U. S.: 1963-68)	10.3
Childbirth (U. S.: 1967)	28.0
Appendectomy (U. S.: PAS 1968)	400
Cholecystectomy (U. S.: PAS 1968)	1,600

From these figures, it should be abundantly clear that a state must carry a heavy burden of persuasion to classify induced abortion apart from other medical procedures in terms of any public health or safety considerations.

In sum, the medical procedure of induced abortion, which is severely restricted by the statute involved in this case, is potentially 23.3 (28/1.2) times as safe as the process of going through ordinary childbirth. Numerous lower state and federal courts have reviewed or taken judicial notice of the facts set out in holding that no legitimate public health rationale could justify restrictive abortion legislation. See, e.g., California v. Belous, 71 Cal.2d 954, 965, 458 P.2d 194, 200, 80 Cal. Rptr. 354, 360 (1969), cert. denied, 397 U.S. 915 (1970); McCann v. Babbitz, 310 F. Supp. 293, 301 (E.D. Wis.) (per curiam), appeal dismissed, 400 U.S. 1 (1970) (per curiam).

II. Incidence of Medically Induced Abortion

In the United States on the whole, induced abortion under medical auspices was relatively restricted until 1967, when the first of twelve states, Colorado, enacted the American Law Institute abortion law proposal in the Model Penal Code.[12] Georgia followed in 1968.

Only 5,000 therapeutic abortions were estimated to have been done in United States medical facilities in 1963,[13] as contrasted with 200,000 to 1,000,000 unwanted pregnancies thought to be terminated annually outside of the clinical setting.[14] These are over and above the "nearly 20 percent of all recent births [which] were unwanted," according to the "1965 National Fertility Study (NFS) . . . ." Bumpass & Westoff, The "Perfect Contraceptive" Population, 169 SCIENCE 1177, 1180 (1970).

Since 1967, the incidence of abortions in medical facilities has risen substantially, but only in the few states which have removed virtually all restrictions that previously differentiated abortion from other forms of medical treatment.

In New York City alone, for example, nearly 165,000 abortions were performed between July 1, 1970, and May [14] Secret induced abortions are inherently incapable of quantification. Nonetheless, one can be certain that the number is very high. For estimates, see Fisher, Criminal Abortion, in ABORTION IN AMERICA 3-6 (H. Rosen ed. 1967); M. CALDERONE (ed.), ABORTION IN THE UNITED STATES 180 (1958); P. GEBHARD et al., PREGNANCY, BIRTH AND ABORTION 136-37 (1958); F. TAUSSIG, ABORTION: SPONTANEOUS AND INDUCED 25 (1936); Regine, A Study of Pregnancy Wastage, 13 MILBANK MEM. FUND QUART. No. 4, at 347-55 (1935).

31, 1971.[15] Nearly 40,500 of these women were not residents of New York State![16]

III. Incidence and Sequelae of Nonmedical Abortion

The problem of abortions induced by nonmedical personnel, in circumstances conducive to infection, psychic trauma, and not infrequently death, remains with the medical profession in most other states, however.

> "[S]eptic abortion has become a leading cause of maternal deaths. In Philadelphia over 50 percent of the maternal deaths result from complications of abortion, and this fact apparently holds true in other areas of the country: Stevenson reports 57 percent in Michigan; Hellman, 33 percent at the Kings County Hospital in Brooklyn; and Fox, 28 percent in California." R. SCHWARZ, SEPTIC ABORTION 7 (1968).

The booklength treatment by Dr. Schwarz of the University of Pennsylvania School of Medicine could never have been written but for the legal restrictions on abortion. The chapters describe in detail the medical techniques of treating patients who are refused abortion by physicians and then resort to incompetent, nonmedical practitioners. These patients often return for treatment of complications that can be traced back to statutes such as that in question in this case.

Georgia remains among the states with an exceptionally low number of medical abortions. Despite an ostensibly more generous statute, Georgia has a serious continuing public health problem in illegal abortions induced by untrained practitioners in dangerous settings. For the 1968-1970 period Georgia was last in number of abortions per 1,000 births among the twelve states with Model Penal Code-type therapeutic abortion acts. In Georgia the ratio was 4.0, by contrast with California where a similar law resulted in 194.2 abortions per 1,000 births for 1970 (See APPENDIX B, infra, Table I-2, at B-5, 6, for data on all twelve states). Only "5 percent of the practicing physicians in Georgia reported performing abortions in 14 percent of Georgia's counties during 1968 and 1969." Rochat, et al., An Epidemiological Analysis of Abortion in Georgia, 61 AM. J. PUBLIC HEALTH 543, 547 (1971).

IV. Abortion and Contraception

A. Contraceptive Failure:

Significant contraceptive failure rates, and widespread lack of information about contraception, are two of the many factors which must be understood in assessing the impact of abortion laws on families and individuals in Georgia, and the United States.

A wealth of medical evidence shows that the factual basis for this position is sound.

The most effective contraceptive known, "the pill" or oral contraceptive, has in practice produced side effects "disagreeable enough to cause a 20 to 40 per cent drop-out rate" among those patients who were informed of and chose to use the method in the first place. E. NOVAK, et al., TEXTBOOK OF GYNECOLOGY 647 (8th ed. 1970). The vast proportion of the population not receiving family planning services never reach that option, of course. Other methods are less effective in practice than the 99% effective oral contraceptive. Id. These range from the intrauterine devices, which pose problems of their own and vary in effectiveness, to abstention and rhythm, which are not seriously regarded by the medical profession in this century.[17]

The following chart illustrates the contraceptive failure problem:

[17] For discussion of contraceptive-techniques, effectiveness, and the full range of complex factors involved, see generally J. PEEL & M. POTTS, CONTRACEPTIVE PRACTICE (1969).

[18] The factor of patient use, or non-use is always relevant. Highly motivated, sophisticated users might have no failure with a contraceptive foam, for example.

The number 80 in the first line indicates that among 100 women utilizing no contraception for one year, 80 will become pregnant.

B. Lack of Access to Contraception:

All too frequently it is presumed that people have access to and are able to use highly effective contraceptives, and are themselves at fault in cases of unwanted or unplanned pregnancy. This assumption could not be further from medical reality. Contraception is not widely available in the United States. In fact, Congress passed the Family Planning Services and Population Research Act of 1970, Pub. L. No. 91-572 (Dec. 24, 1970), with an overall appropriation exceeding $380 million "to assist in making comprehensive voluntary family planning services readily available to all persons. . . ." National studies on the magnitude of unwanted births, such as data from HEW's 1965 National Fertility Study, for example, showed:

> "[In] the period 1960 to 1965 there were 4.7 million births that would have been prevented by 'perfect contraception.' These births represent one fifth of all births during the period. Approximately two million of these births occurred among the poor and the near-poor and half of these among Negro poor and near-poor." [19]

The most recent studies identify as a principal problem the absence of adequate information and services for people with a need to know about contraception, and when that fails, medically induced abortion. As late as the close of 1969,

> "some 4.3 million women in need of subsidized family planning services were not receiving them insofar as could be determined from reports of organized programs; no programs at all could be identified in 1,636 counties—53 percent of all counties—containing one-fourth of the unmet need. Services continue to be concentrated in relatively few populous counties. . . ." [20]

The basic 1968 study covered each State by county. In Georgia a total of 179,932 medically indigent women in need of family planning information were shown to be unserved. This amounted to 88% of such women.[21] These individuals can hardly be thought to be able to protect their marital and personal privacy through contraception, when that is altogether unavailable to them.

This deficiency is not confined to patients. Only a few short years ago, a review of texts used in medical schools revealed that "[t]wo thirds of the texts (25 texts) contained either no mention of contraception or only isolated reference to it, with no complete discussion." Tietze, et al., Teaching of Fertility Regulation in Medical Schools, 196 J. AMERICAN MEDICAL ASS'N 20, 23 (1966).

Patients have limited access to contraceptive methods and information. Physicians have limited willingness to prescribe contraception. As if this were not enough, contraceptive devices, techniques, and use are far from effective as a means whereby a family can determine how many children they will have and no more.

While a narrow concern is occasionally voiced that "'those who dance must pay the piper,'"[22] such an approach to judicial reasoning obscures the medical and legal issues. In the first place, studies of unwanted fertility, such as Bumpass & Westoff, supra, were of samples of married couples. This study did not evaluate the fact that 339,200 illegitimate births occurred in 1968, which at that time were 9.7% of all births.[23]

In or out of wedlock, unwanted pregnancy can have damaging consequences, not only for the married couple, or unmarried woman, but more so for the society which must face and deal with anti-social behavior, delinquency, and crime brought about to some degree by unwantedness. A detailed study of 120 children who were born after their mothers' applications for therapeutic abortions had been turned down in Sweden casts light upon the social consequences of restrictive abortion laws.[24] Among the "unwanted" group, by their twenty-first birthday, 28.3% had received psychiatric care, 18.3% had been registered with child welfare boards for delinquency, 8.3% were on the penal register, and 14.2% had received public assistance. The authors concluded:

Amici have presented the above analysis and data to introduce the medical and social context of this case. The data and conclusions which follow therefrom, are not intended to suggest that this Court, or any judicial body, ought to weigh policy matters to determine questions of constitutional law. Only when it is claimed that a statute interferes with a litigant's fundamental personal rights, is it incumbent upon the Court to inquire into the case. Such an inquiry must ask the nature of the rights asserted, whether such rights are implicit or express in constitutional doctrine, and whether a legislative body might justifiably abridge the rights asserted. The very nature of the rights in this case necessitates an understanding of contraception, abortion, and associated phenomena. The response to possible legislative justifications similarly requires an examination of medical and social facts. In the threshold treatment above, and in the arguments which follow, Amici will concentrate on particularly relevant medical data thought to be necessary to the Court's ultimate determination of law.

ARGUMENT

JURISDICTION

I.

The District Court had jurisdiction to grant declaratory and injunctive relief to the class of physicians.

A. Physicians have standing to assert their own fundamental personal rights, and those of the class of their patients who seek medical advice and treatment, because enforcement of the statute in question is almost solely against physicians, the physicians' interests are inextricably related to those of their patients, and the rights of patients cannot be adequately protected unless considered along with those of physicians.

1. Standing of Physicians

The sub-class of physicians alleged throughout that the statute in question directly curtailed their own interests in providing adequate medical advice and treatment for patients. These interests are aspects of "liberty," "property," and association directly protected by the First and Fourteenth Amendments. There can no longer be doubt that the opportunity to pursue one's profession is encompassed within the concepts of "liberty" and "property." This has been the teaching of decisions involving members of and aspirants to the bar, Willner v. Committee on Character and Fitness, 373 U.S. 96, 102-03 (1963); teachers, Slochower v. Board of Higher Educ., 350 U.S. 551 (1956); scientists, Greene v. McElroy, 360 U.S. 474, 492 (1959); and physicians as well, Birnbaum v. Trussell, 371 F.2d 672 (2d Cir. 1966).

The present case, therefore, is wholly unlike Tileston v. Ullman, 318 U.S. 44 (1943) (per curiam). There a physician, who claimed no rights whatsoever of his own, sought declaratory relief against a statute which prohibited patients from using contraceptives. Here, physicians are drastically affected by direct enforcement provisions of the challenged statute. Tileston, however, had made "no allegations asserting any claim under the Fourteenth Amendment of infringement of [his] liberty or his property rights." 318 U.S. at 44. It is abundantly clear that the physician sub-class

> "alleged such a personal stake in the outcome of the controversy as to assure that concrete adverseness which sharpens the presentation of issues upon which the court so largely depends for illumination of difficult constitutional questions." Baker v. Carr, 369 U.S. 186, 204 (1962), quoted in Flast v. Cohen, 392 U.S. 83, 99 (1968).

2. Physician's Standing to Assert Patient's Right to Seek Medical Care

The physicians also invoked the rights of their present, past, and prospective patients. A pregnant woman is generally in no position to undertake protracted litigation to establish her right to an abortion, and none has ever been prosecuted. Neither a physician's rights, nor those of his patients, should depend upon the ability to find a cooperative martyr, to be indicted as a principal.

This case, then, is a close parallel to Griswold v. Connecticut, 381 U.S. 479 (1965), because

> "[t]he rights of [patients] are likely to be diluted or adversely affected unless those rights are considered in a suit involving [physicians] who have this kind of confidential relationship to them." 381 U.S. at 479,

Similarly, it has been held in abortion prosecutions that the physician may assert his patient's rights, a proposition which the lower court correctly accepted, and California v. Belous[26] considered so self-evident as to justify no more than a footnote. In fact, each federal and state court decision in recent months has concluded, without the need for extensive discussion, that physicians in both declaratory and defensive actions have standing to assert the rights of patients. E.g., United States ex rel. Dr. Jesse Williams, II v. Zelker, —— F.2d ——, No. 35381 (2d Cir. July 2, 1971) (Tom C. Clark, J.); Crossen v. Breckenridge, —— F.2d ——, No. 20852 (6th Cir. June 23, 1971) (Miller, J.). See also Truax v. Raich, 239 U.S. 33 (1915); Pierce v. Society of Sisters, 268 U.S. 510 (1925); see generally Sedler, Standing to Assert Constitutional Jus Tertii, 71 YALE L.J. 599 (1962).

Physicians, in light of their direct involvement in the day to day effects and enforcement of the statute, are situated in much the same way as the defendant-covenantor in Barrows v. Jackson, 346 U.S. 249 (1953), because here as there "it would be difficult if not impossible for the persons whose rights are asserted to present their grievances before any court." 346 U.S. at 257. In any medical context it is meaningless to speak of physicians without patients and patients without physicians. In law it would be equally meaningless to hold that a physician may not rely upon her or his patients' rights.

B. The drastic regular and recurring impact of the statute upon physicians and their patients poses a continuing case or controversy, which is ripe for adjudication, because physicians are deterred and hampered by the statute in advising and treating their patients, and repeatedly compelled to refuse to provide medical care out of a reasonable fear of enforcement of the statute.

"There can be little doubt that fear of the law is a determining factor in the policy adopted by hospitals and surgeons, both in the United States and in Great Britain." G. WILLIAMS, THE SANCTITY OF LIFE AND THE CRIMINAL LAW 168 (1966). Medical professionals, commendably, do not habitually flout laws in order to contest their validity. This Court, and lower courts, should not force such anti-social conduct by taking an unduly narrow view of the Article III case or controversy requirement, as was done by the lower court. Nothing in Article III, prior decisions by this Court, or considerations of judicial management remotely suggests that a physician must flout a statute and risk fines, imprisonment, and license revocation in order to challenge a law which poses concrete cases and controversies in the physician's office day after day.

The nature of the recurring case or controversy produced by the challenged statute is understandable, specific, and fully manageable within sound judicial procedures. Physicians do not simply "'feel inhibited'" by the restrictions on reasons and procedures for medical abortions in Georgia. See Younger v. Harris, 401 U.S. 37, 42 (1971). They are inhibited in a very serious, plainly demonstrable, concrete, and specific manner.

Georgia, and to a similar degree eleven other states, have singled out for criminal sanctions the medical procedure of abortion, separating it from all other procedures.

This in itself is a threat to physicians whose patients over a period of time may include hundreds who request abortions for valid personal reasons not covered by the law.

Georgia has enacted a special criminal statute which a physician must obey when processing applications for medical abortion. Otherwise he risks license revocation, fines, and imprisonment. These sanctions do not exist for other medical procedures.

While it is not incorrect to state that "whether a particular operation is necessary for a patient's physical or mental health is a judgment that physicians are obviously called upon to make routinely whenever surgery is considered," United States v. Vuitch, 402 U.S. 62, 72 (1971), this does not terminate what must be a more searching inquiry. A decision reached between Scylla and Charybdis, or "under the Sword of Damocles," Doe v. Randall, 314 F. Supp. 32, 36 (D. Minn. 1970) (Neville, J., concurring), is qualitatively different from one of proceeding with a routine appendectomy.

Performance of even the most perilous surgery does not require approval by three examining physicians and ex parte rehearing de novo before a special hospital committee. More importantly, in no other sphere of medical practice could a physician perform a medical procedure believed to be in the patient's best interests and requested by the patient, complete the treatment with total satisfaction to himself and the patient, and nonetheless face license revocation and ten years in state prison, indeed ten years per patient.

The difference between routinely evaluating the need for requested surgery, and applying the Georgia law on medically-induced abortion, lies in the wide-ranging and irreconcilable points of view among physicians as to when a patient "deserves" an abortion, the novelty of the law, the severe penalty provision, and the unique impact upon the physician-patient relationship of such laws.

Traditionally, the medical profession has been subject only to generalized limitations upon the scope of patient treatment. First, the physician must undertake necessary training and secure by license the right to practice his profession. This license is general in terms, and removes the physician from scrutiny by the criminal law in his treatment of patients.[27] State medical licensing laws are uniformly upheld, as in Dent v. West Virginia, 129 U.S. 114 (1889). The rationale for limited legislative intervention in the complex sphere of medicine is reasonable and not difficult to discern. As stated by Mr. Justice Field in Dent:

> "Few professions require more careful preparation by one who seeks to enter it than that of medicine. It has to deal with all those subtle and mysterious influences upon which life and health depend, and requires not only a knowledge of the properties of vegetable and mineral substances, but of the human body in all its complicated parts, and their relationship to each other, as well as their influence upon the mind." 129 U.S. at 122.

Even with respect to the dispensing of hard narcotics, legislatures have never sought to prescribe the patient's symptoms which justify treatment and those which do not, much less to require treatment only in a particular type of medical facility. In fact, Young v. United States, 315 U.S. 257 (1942), construed the Harrison Narcotic Act to exempt altogether "physicians administering to patients whom they personally attend." 315 U.S. at 259. No inquiry was to be made into the complexities of diagnosis and treatment.

With respect to the medical abortion procedure, however, physicians could reasonably anticipate criminal and administrative sanctions if they engaged in the ordinary practice of medicine. Normally a physician only seeks consultation for specialized problems. For abortions, he must call in an additional two examining physicians, and present his patient's case to a three or more member hospital abortion committee. With other surgery he would simply schedule the operating room for a given hour.

In ordinary medical practice, some procedures are done in the physician's clinic, some perhaps as a volunteer in a public free clinic, and others in a hospital, which may or may not be accredited by the Joint Commission on Accreditation of Hospitals [hereinafter JCAH]. With respect to medical abortion, however, the JCAH-accredited hospital is the sole institution authorized by Georgia law to permit abortions. The law further permits hospital owners to refuse to allow any abortions at all, regardless of the types of other comparable surgery normally undertaken there.

The low rate and maldistribution of medical abortions in Georgia, the very fact that this lawsuit was joined in by a physician subclass, and the severity of penalties which a physician might incur by violating the statute or hospital rules, are evidence of "a specific live grievance." Golden v. Zwickler, 394 U.S. 103, 110 (1969). While the lower court did not find a case or controversy between the physician subclass and state officials, that conclusion was unaccompanied by explanation. By contrast, federal courts in Wisconsin,[28] Texas,[29] Colorado,[30] Illinois,[31] North Carolina,[32] and Ohio[33] have faced the same questions of pre-indictment case or controversy, and ruled in the manner suggested by Amici.

It is not the province of a physicians' brief for Amici Curiae to undertake a lengthy review of this Court's decisions in the ripeness and case or controversy field. As Amici, physicians note, however, that prospective lawyers are not required to be disbarred or refused admission to the bar in order to contest statutes which affect the conduct of law students. LSCRRC v. Wadmond, 401 U.S. 154, 158-59 (1971). The teachers in Epperson v. Arkansas, 393 U.S. 97 (1968), and Baggett v. Bullitt, 377 U.S. 360 (1964), did not face a court-imposed dilemma forcing them to flout an anti-evolution statute in the Scopes tradition, or risk entanglement in a perjury prosecution which might follow the signing of a loyalty oath. The Scopes trial was an exciting event. Abortion prosecutions are another matter altogether. Only two physicians in Anglo-American history have had sufficient courage to choose the latter route. See Rex v. Bourne [1939] 1 K.B. 687; Hodgson v. Randall, Similarly, the drug companies in Abbott Laboratories v. Gardner, 387 U.S. 136 (1967), were permitted by this Court to make a broad attack on labelling regulations promulgated by the Commissioner of Food and Drugs. Physicians, even more than drug companies, "deal in a sensitive [profession], in which public confidence," 387 U.S. at 153, is especially important.

Indeed, even the earlier "ripeness" cases which found no controversy support the presence of a sufficient degree of justiciable adversity on the facts presented here.[34]

A bare majority in Poe v. Ullman, 367 U.S. 497 (1961), for example, found no controversy over the unenforced Connecticut law against the use of contraceptives. Justice Frankfurter's plurality opinion relied upon four factors: (1) a history of non-enforcement of the statutes against physicians and patients. 367 U.S. at 501-02; (2) the fact [34] The present action recalls the election cases where judicial review was sought too late, but underlying issues would recur again and again. As the Court stated in Moore v. Ogilvie, 394 U.S. 814, 816 (1969), "[t]he problem is . . . 'capable of repetition, yet evading review,' Southern Pacific Terminal Co. v. ICC, 219 U.S. 498, 515. The need for its resolution thus reflects a continuing controversy. . . ." And so it is here. Physicians seek to challenge the full statutory scheme on its face, and as applied in recurring kinds of cases. The problem here is repeated on a scale far exceeding that of recurring four-year presidential elections.

This is not a case like Hall v. Beals, 396 U.S. 45 (1969) (per curiam), where no continuing injury whatsoever was present. Nor is Brockington v. Rhodes, 396 U.S. 41 (1969) (per curiam), pertinent. There the relief sought was limited in nature and rendered impossible to grant by the passage of time.

that "contraceptives are commonly and notoriously sold in Connecticut stores. Yet no prosecutions are recorded. . . ." 367 U.S. at 502; (3) the absence of "real threat of enforcement," 367 U.S. at 507; and (4) the failure to find "deterrent effect . . . grounded in a realistic fear of prosecution." 367 U.S. at 508.

Each of these features is different in the present case, and additional considerations make this case even more appropriate for decision, on the merits.

(1) Physicians can easily document the fact that abortion statutes are regularly enforced by criminal prosecutions and license revocations. In addition, hospital committees in effect enforce the laws within their institutions. Neither Poe nor Griswold indicated that hospital committees in Connecticut regulated the prescription of contraceptives to patients.

(2) Abortions in Georgia's hospitals are obviously not "commonly and notoriously" available upon request.

(3) There is more than "real threat of enforcement" of Georgia's abortion laws. There is frequent actual enforcement at the administrative level of decision making.

Georgia residents from July to December, 1970, were 27th nationally in abortion-to-birth ratios. Approximately 67% were forced to leave the State for treatment. See APPENDIX B, infra, Figure I-2, at B-7. From July 1, 1970 to March 31, 1971, a total of 838 Georgia residents obtained legal abortions in New York City. Chase, Abortions to Out-of-State Residents (June 29, 1971) (report released by Health Services Administration, City of New York).

The above analysis considers the Poe plurality opinion in isolation and assumes the case was correctly decided.

However, Poe was handed down over persuasive dissents by Justices Harlan and Douglas, and memorandum notations of dissent from Justices Stewart and Black. Poe has been repeatedly criticized and suggestions made that it be or was limited to its facts.[35] These criticisms largely derive from the sentiment that no civilized legal system should require an honest citizen to risk prison and disgrace to test the constitutionality of a statute.[36]

Poe appears to be one of the exceedingly few decisions which requires a litigant to invite and undergo criminal prosecution. Ultimately, the physicians prevailed, seven-to-two, four years later. Suppose they had not? The Poe decision would have consigned them to accepting the penalty. Other decisions, as Justices Harlan and Douglas pointed out, dissenting in Poe, imposed no such Hobson's choice.[37]

Justice Harlan's dissent in Poe undertook at length to demonstrate that the majority was in substantial error. 367 U.S. at 522-39. The Justice placed chief reliance on Pierce v. Society of Sisters, 268 U.S. 510 (1925), and Truax v. Raich, 239 U.S. 33 (1915). Both permitted anticipatory relief to avoid damage caused by the present effect of a

For an excellent general discussion of the "ripeness" question in the context of criminal law, see Note, Declaratory Relief in the Criminal Law, 80 HARV. L. REV. 1490 (1967).

[36] A corollary is the not infrequent condemnation of those who flagrantly break a law to test its validity.

[37] After Thomas Hobson (1544-1631), of Cambridge, England, who rented horses, but gave customers only the horse nearest the door. Here the physician must often choose between sending the patient out the door, or being taken out himself by law enforcement officers.

statute rather than imminence of enforcement. Significantly, in Pierce

> "a Court which included Justices Holmes, Brandeis, and Stone rejected a claim of prematureness and then passed upon and held unconstitutional a state statute whose sanctions were not even to become effective for more than seventeen months after the time the case was argued. . . ." Poe v. Ullman, 367 U.S. 497, 538 (1961) (Harlan, J., dissenting).

See also West Virginia Board of Education v. Barnette, 319 U.S. 624 (1943) (students allowed to challenge possible expulsions prior to actual dismissal, and prior to effective date of rule which, if enforced, would have required expulsion); Terrace v. Thompson, 263 U.S. 197, 216 (1923) ("They are not obliged to take the risk of prosecution, fines and imprisonment and loss of property in order to secure an adjudication of their rights").

Moreover, Congress, in passing the Declaratory Judgment Act, recognized the need to provide a federal anticipatory remedy in lieu of defense to a criminal prosecution. A Senate Report reflected this specific concern:

> "It is often necessary, in the absence of the declaratory judgment procedure, to violate or purport to violate a statute in order to obtain a judicial determination of its meaning or validity." S. Rep. No. 1005, 73d Cong., 2d Sess., at 2-3.

In the instant case, physicians positively refrain from treating and advising patients for the reason that they fear criminal prosecution, or administrative sanctions. They are not uninterested citizens urging an academic question, but are a class of citizens greatly affected and deterred by the challenged statutes. As Professor Bickel suggested, in a slightly different context, "it may be true that by hypothesis no more suitable case can ever be constructed, because those who are unjustifiably deterred will never be prosecuted, and what deters them is precisely the prospect of litigation." [38]

In light of the considerations set out above, the lower court erred in dismissing claims of the physician subclass for want of a case or controversy.

C. Injunctive relief was necessary to prevent inevitable grave and immediate injury to physicians and their patients, because defense of criminal and/or administrative proceedings in a single case could not eliminate the recurring controversy, and the mere fact of such a state proceeding would drastically invade the physician-patient relationship, as well as exert an in terrorem effect upon the profession.

Amici, as physicians, can point to three substantial reasons why the lower court should have issued an injunction to enforce the extent of declaratory relief granted.

(1) First, the law is unclear on the extent to which state law enforcement authorities are bound by federal declaratory judgments pending appeal. There is authority that the Georgia courts would not have been bound by any aspects of the lower court's opinion, should officials have determined to institute state court proceedings against a physician. See United States ex rel. Lawrence v. Woods, 432 F.2d 1072 (7th Cir. 1970), cert. denied, 402 U.S. —— (May 17, 1971); State v. Coleman, 46 N.J. 16, 214 A.2d 393 (1965); Iowa Nat'l Bank v. Stewart, 214 Iowa 1229, 232 N.W. 445 (1930). Under such an interpretation, Georgia authorities would have been free to proceed against any physicians or hospitals that altered their practices.

The suggested dilemma is not fanciful. Under similar facts state officers in Wisconsin sought to defy and circumvent judgments by federal courts in two different districts of the state. See McCann v. Babbitz, 320 F. Supp. 219 (E.D. Wis. 1970) (per curiam), vacated for reconsideration, 402 U.S. 903 (1971); Kennan v. Nichol, —— F. Supp. ——, 71-C-118 (W.D. Wis. Apr. 27, May 5, 6, 1971).

An injunctive order removes any doubt about the rights of the respective parties, not only with respect to the scope of permissible conduct, but also concerning which party should appeal, and to what appellate court. The parties in Wisconsin made one trip to this Court only to learn that the attorney general had appealed to the wrong forum, as had the physician. McCann v. Babbitz, 310 F. Supp. 293 (E.D. Wis.) (per curiam), appeal dismissed, 400 U.S. 1 (1970) (per curiam).

(2) Where, as here, an injunction is needed to clarify the effect of a declaratory judgment, the order serves to avoid altogether the state-federal friction which might otherwise ensue. In many respects a bare declaratory judgment is an open invitation to state authorities to ignore the federal court at their option. By contrast, an injunction brings certainty and finality to the dispute, and at least discourages state officials from threatening or initiating any administrative or criminal proceedings or investigations. More importantly, an injunction ab initio obviates the possibility of a subsequent need to enjoin state court judges and proceedings under one of the express exceptions to 28 U.S.C. 2283 (1964 ed.). In this sense, the injunction at the outset is sensible preventive medicine.

(3) The third reason for initial injunctive relief is to avoid the kind of grave irreparable injury which would befall physicians and their patients should the declaratory judgment be ignored at the administrative or any other level. There is no adequate remedy at law, or in the state courts, for a woman who is compelled to continue a pregnancy against her will. What was not undone by contraception, or by medical abortion in early pregnancy, or by spontaneous abortion in many cases, cannot be recompensed after birth. It is the unwilling mother who must accept the role of child-rearing for up to twenty years, not the legislators, and not the judges of the lower court.

By the same token, defense of a single criminal charge or license revocation proceeding would neither be an adequate forum in which to resolve the "continuing controversy between [physicians] and the State . . . ," Perez v. Ledesma, 401 U.S. 82, 102 (1971) (Brennan, J., concurring), nor an avenue that posed no threat of grave irreparable injury. If Abbott Laboratories means anything, it is that the mere fact of prosecution in a sensitive health-related industry is presumed to have disastrous consequences. Where, as in this case, the physicians present a straightforward legal issue, "the [statute] is directed at them in particular; it requires them to make significant changes in their everyday [professional] practices; if they fail to observe the [statute] they are quite clearly exposed to the imposition of strong sanctions," 387 U.S. at 154, then injunctive relief is both necessary and proper. Even more so is this the case, when one recalls that Abbott Laboratories, Inc., was a corporation asserting purely economic interests.

THE MERITS

II.

The provisions in Georgia Criminal Code §§26-1201, -1202(a)(1)-(3), -1202(b)(1)-(9), -1202(c), and -1202(e), which differentiate the medical procedures of therapeutic and elective induced abortion from all other forms of health care, deprive physicians of the fundamental personal right to administer to their patients, and patients of the right to seek medical care, in violation of the Due Process and Equal Protection clauses of the Fourteenth Amendment.

The statute in question undoubtedly restricts a physician in the practice of his profession. It limits his right to exercise his skills and apply his overall knowledge to the patient's benefit. By the same token, the statute deprives the patient of the right to seek health care in connection with the medical procedure of induced abortion.

The magnitude of the restrictions imposed by statutes such as the Model Penal Code-type abortion law is far reaching. As the co-reporter to the Code observed in a critical examination of its limitations, "[it] is not a question of restricting the freedom of a few eccentrics to avoid inflicting great psychic injury on the bulk of the population, but of restricting the freedom of scores of millions of citizens, having conflicting but equally respectable sensibilities to be protected." Schwartz, Morals Offenses, and the Model Penal Code, 63 COLUM. L. REV. 669, 683 (1963).

The contention of Amici Curiae, in full support of the Appellants in the case, is that the restrictions in the statute as is necessary to preserve their health." The Vuitch decision went on to construe the term health to encompass "psychological as well as physical health," and " 'the state of being sound in body or mind.' "

The present case also has First and Fourteenth Amendment freedom of association implications, namely, the right of the physician to provide medical information, followed by treatment, for his patients, and the right of the patient to receive same. The right of a competent licensed physician to give medical advice can be characterized as free expression alone, or when viewed as an aspect of the physician-patient relationship, it becomes part of the freedom of association between physician and patient. The First Amendment has long been held to accord presumptive protection for the "freedom to associate and privacy in one's associations." NAACP v. Alabama, 357 U.S. 449, 462 (1958). This has been the case with the marital relationship,[39] and that of attorney and client.[40] The relationship between physician and patient is no different; it promotes the fundamental purpose of maintaining the health and well-being of the American people.

The advice aspect of medical practice is but one part of claim, for medical treatment involving interruption of the unwanted pregnancy may be what the patient ultimately requests, and the criminal statute proscribes.

The nature of this interest has been described by a "variety of descriptive terms: compelling; substantial; subordinating; paramount; cogent; strong." 391 U.S. at 376-77 (citations omitted).

The interests of patients must also be considered before examining the implementation of this law.

2. Patients Have a Fundamental Right to Seek Health Care Which Includes the Treatment of Medical Abortion

United States v. Vuitch, 402 U.S. 62 (1971), took the initial steps toward recognition of a right to seek medical treatment as a fundamental personal right protected by the Constitution. There this Court suggested a right of patients to "such treatment as is necessary to preserve their health."

While Vuitch had no need to hold, as a matter of constitutional law, that the right of access to health care was a fundamental personal right, such a holding in the present case would be judicially sound, and expressive of a manageable judicial principle.

Some measure of the recognition which nations give to the right of access to health care can be seen in the Constitution of the World Health Organization:

> "The enjoyment of the highest attainable standard of health is one of the fundamental rights of every human being without distinction of race, religion, political belief, economic or social condition." [41]

Congress, in passing the Comprehensive Health Planning Act of 1966, took a similar position:

> "[T]he fulfillment of our national purpose depends on promoting and assuring the highest level of health attainable for every person, in an environment which contributes positively to healthful individual and family living . . . ." [42]

The text of the Constitution supports this position by directly recognizing the rights to "life and liberty" in the Fourteenth Amendment. The term "life," in particular, was used in the 19th century in the manner that "life and health" are used today. As late as the 1880's Sir Joseph Lister's surgical techniques were only beginning to be used in the United States. " 'First Listerian operations' were still dotting the American surgical scene all through the eighties." H. CLAPESATTLE, THE DOCTORS MAYO 194 (1941). Only after Listerism gained a firm position in American surgery did non-emergency operations become feasible, not simply as "a last desperate throw of the dice with death, but a means of restoring health deliberately chosen in the early, curable stages of disease." Id. at 269 (emphasis added).

[42] Public Law 89-749.

In addition to the decisions upholding rights associated with access to health care (and marital privacy), an overlapping body of precedent extends significant constitutional protection to the citizen's sovereignty over his or her own physical person.

As early as 1891 this Court stated:

> "No right is more sacred, [n]or is more carefully guarded . . . than the right of every individual to the possession and control of his own person, free from all restraint or interference of others unless by clear and unquestionable authority of law. As well said by Judge Cooley, 'The right to one's person may be said to be a right of complete immunity: to be let alone.'" Union Pac. Ry. v. Botsford, 141 U.S. 250, 251 (1891),[43] quoted in Terry v. Ohio, 392 U.S. 1, 8-9 (1968).

This right, like all rights, has limits, as illustrated by Jacobson v. Massachusetts, 197 U.S. 11 (1904). There the Court upheld a compulsory vaccination law, but only to avoid "great dangers" and to protect "the safety of the general public." 197 U.S. at 29. The lengths to which the Court went, however, to justify a shot in the arm, point up the degree to which personal autonomy in health matters is entitled to protection.

In family matters relating to child rearing and procreation, the Court has recognized and sustained individual rights on a constitutional plane. "The freedom to marry . . . ," Loving v. Commonwealth, 388 U.S. 1, 12 (1967); "the right to have offspring," Skinner v. Oklahoma, 316

[43] Botsford involved government coercion in forcing a medical examination.

U.S. 535, 536 (1942); "the liberty of parents and guardians to direct the upbringing and education of children under their control," Pierce v. Society of Sisters, 268 U.S. 510, 534-35 (1925); as well as the right, at least of a married woman, to use contraceptives, Griswold v. Connecticut, 381 U.S. 479 (1965), are all protected constitutionally.

Most recently the Court reaffirmed the "fundamental . . . right to be free, except in very limited circumstances, from unwanted governmental intrusions into one's privacy," Stanley v. Georgia, 394 U.S. 557, 564 (1969) (Marshall, J.), and embraced with approval Mr. Justice Brandeis' dissent in Olmstead v. United States:

> "The makers of our Constitution undertook to secure conditions favorable to the pursuit of happiness. They recognized the significance of man's spiritual nature, of his feelings and of his intellect. They knew that only a part of the pain, pleasure and satisfactions of life are to be found in material things. They sought to protect Americans in their beliefs, their thoughts, their emotions and their sensations. They conferred, as against the Government, the right to be let alone—the most comprehensive of rights and the right most valued by civilized man." 277 U.S. at 478.

Chief Justice, then Circuit Judge, Burger, in Application of Georgetown College, Inc., 331 F.2d 1010, 1016-17 (D.C. Cir.) (en banc), cert. denied, 377 U.S. 978 (1964), also urged a right to be let alone, in the context of a religious objection to blood transfusions, which could include "even absurd ideas which do not conform, such as refusing medical treatment even at great risk." 331 F.2d at 1017. If refusing health care might be constitutionally protected, surely the right to seek health care for sensible reasons should enjoy equal or greater constitutional status.

Retired Justice Tom C. Clark has also suggested that constitutional concepts should include control over family planning beyond the stage of contraception. He wrote:

> "[A]bortion falls within that sensitive area of privacy —the marital relation. One of the basic values of this privacy is birth control, as evidenced by the Griswold decision. Griswold's act was found to prevent formation of the fetus. This, the Court found, was constitutionally protected. If an individual may prevent conception, why can he not nullify that conception when prevention has failed?"[4]

B. The Equal Protection and Due Process clauses of the Fourteenth Amendment require that restrictive classifications in the challenged statute be narrowly drawn and supported by compelling state interests, in order not to abridge fundamental personal rights.

Several basic considerations have been articulated for the evaluation of competing interests in equal protection cases. One, which applies in matters of unique local interest involving taxes and business regulations, states:

> "Under traditional equal protection principles, a State retains broad discretion to classify as long as its classification has a reasonable basis." Blackmun, J., in Graham v. Richardson, 402 U.S., ——, —— (June 14, 1971).

[4] Clark, Religion, Morality, and Abortion: A Constitutional Appraisal, 2 LOYOLA UNIV. (L.A.) L. REV. 1, 9 (1969) [hereinafter "Clark"].

However, a somewhat different technique is necessary when a "suspect classification" appears or important fundamental personal rights are threatened. As stated with respect to the fundamental personal right to travel in Shapiro v. Thompson, 394 U.S. 618, 638 (1969):

> "[T]he traditional criteria do not apply in these cases. Since the classification here touches upon [a] fundamental right . . . its constitutionality must be judged by the stricter standard of whether it promotes a compelling state interest." (Emphasis by the Court.)

This is also the case with the "suspect classification":

> "The classifications . . . are inherently suspect and are therefore subject to strict judicial scrutiny whether or not a fundamental right is impaired." Graham v. Richardson, 402 U.S. ——, —— (June 14, 1971).

In all cases, moreover,

> "a statutory discrimination must be based on differences that are reasonably related to the purposes of the Act in which it is found." Morey v. Doud, 354 U.S. 457, 465 (1957).

Stringent standards are more appropriate for the present case. These standards apply because the Georgia statute does more, far more, than regulate the medical procedure of abortion in the same way it might regulate some other medical practice, i.e., by requiring that all clinics or hospitals obtain State licensure, or that all physicians obtain a license to practice.

The Georgia Therapeutic Abortion Act touches heavily upon the fundamental rights of physicians and patients.

Its classifications specify State-imposed "conditions" which a private physician and patient must satisfy to avoid criminal responsibility.

These "conditions" have no parallel in other medical procedures. They abridge the fundamental rights of some individuals by altogether prohibiting abortions for them, i.e., women whose physical or mental health would be "seriously," but not "permanently" impaired by continuation of pregnancy, or "healthy" women who had contraceptive failure. The classifications make abortions exceedingly difficult for others to obtain, i.e., those women in areas of Georgia where the only accredited hospitals refuse to do any abortions, or those who lack the financial resources to obtain psychiatric certification and cover hospitalization costs (barriers erected not by the patient, but by the State). Because of the statute's impact on fundamental rights, its classifications cannot stand unless supported by "a countervailing state interest of overriding significance." Boddie v. Connecticut, 401 U.S. 371, 377 (1971). Also, if any such compelling State interest is promoted by a classification, the class must not be unnecessarily restrictive. "'Precision of regulation must be the touchstone in an area so closely touching our most precious freedoms.'" Griswold v. Connecticut, 381 U.S. 479, 497, 498 (1965) (Mr. Justice Goldberg, concurring).

Here, a reading of the statute shows suspect classifications which impinge upon the marital relationship, as affected by the timing and spacing of children, cf. Griswold v. Connecticut, 381 U.S. 479 (1965); the personal interest in access to medical care, cf. United States v. Vuitch, 402 U.S. 62 (1971); the "human right" [not] "to have offspring," cf. Skinner v. Oklahoma, 316 U.S. 535, 536 (1942); and the right announced as early as 1891 by Mr. Justice Gray (within limits) "to the control and possession of his [or her] own person, free from all restraint or interference of others, unless by clear and unquestionable authority of law." Union Pac. Ry. v. Botsford, 141 U.S. 250, 251 (1891). As to the latter, this Court only upheld the compulsory vaccination laws to avoid "great dangers" and to protect "the safety of the general public." Jacobson v. Massachusetts, 197 U.S. 11, 29 (1904) (Harlan, J.).

The stringent standards of review apply not only to the arbitrary features of the statute which appear on its face, but also to applications and effects of the statute which come about in practice.

C. The Georgia law on medical abortion, and similar laws in eleven other states, restrict access to this medical procedure in a manner which offends the Equal Protection clause of the Fourteenth Amendment.

It is settled that a law "applied and administered by public authority with an evil eye and an unequal hand, so as practically to make unjust and illegal discriminations between persons in similar circumstances, material to their rights [constitutes] the denial of equal justice . . . ." Yick Wo v. Hopkins, 118 U.S. 356, 373-74 (1886) (Matthews, J.). In several respects, the administration of the statute in question has created a patchwork of invidious discriminations.

1. The "Health" Clause Is Interpreted Differently in Every State, Community, and Hospital, and Has Been Demonstrated to Be Without a Reasonably Specific Meaning

Georgia's restriction on reasons for medical abortion, in words, is not so strict as the typical statute remaining in thirty jurisdictions. The standard pre-1967 prohibition forbade a woman to obtain an abortion "unless the same is necessary to preserve her life, or that of the child whereof she is pregnant . . . ." 40A MINN. STAT. ANN. §617.19, at 286 (1964); accord, 2A TEXAS PENAL CODE art. 1196, at 436 (1961). That is, a pregnancy may wreck a woman's physical health, create insuperable psychiatric difficulties, and leave her bedridden in Minnesota and Texas, but the laws require that she accept this burden, unless she aborts spontaneously.

In Georgia the burden is almost as severe. The woman and her physician must conclude that continued pregnancy would "seriously and permanently injure her health . . . ." GA. CRIM. CODE §26-1202(a)(1), at 85 (1969). If pregnancy seriously injures her health, that is not enough. If pregnancy permanently injures her health, that too is insufficient. Like the Eighth Amendment, the statute is in the conjunctive, not the disjunctive. For actual wording of the "health" justifications in the other eleven similar states, see APPENDIX B, infra, Table I-1, at B-1.

To some physicians and laymen, "health" means "physical survival." Permanent and serious injuries to "health" to them may mean inevitable lifetime invalidism, and nothing less.

To other physicians and laymen, "health" means "a state of complete physical, mental and social well-being and not merely the absence of disease or infirmity." Constitution of the World Health Organization, in BASIC DOCUMENTS OF THE WORLD HEALTH ORGANIZATION 1 (Geneva 1969 ed.). A "physically healthy" woman with no classic "mental health" problems such as neurosis, may nonetheless become a victim of rape or contraceptive failure, and find that termination of the pregnancy would enhance some additional category of her "mental health." Indeed, "for the healthy woman with a happy marriage, abortion is most often truly therapeutic." Walter, Psychologic and Emotional Consequences of Elective Abortion, 36 OBSTETRICS & GYNECOLOGY 482, 487 (1970).

It is not so much what "health" can mean, as the way such a term is used, whether as a reason for undertaking surgery, or a reason for declining to do so. With ordinary elective surgery, a physician seeks "health" reasons why the procedure should be done, i.e., "indications," as well as "health" reasons why it should not, i.e., "contra-indications." The two avenues of inquiry, moreover, may not at all overlap and may be altogether unrelated. For example, cosmetic surgery may be indicated as necessary to alleviate irrational self-doubt. However, the procedure may be contra-indicated in an unusual case by likelihood of uncontrollable blood loss.

If valid "indications" for a procedure are found, and these are not overcome by "contra-indications," the surgeon proceeds. The trouble with abortion statutes is that they reveal an understandable, but nonetheless substantial ignorance of how medicine is practiced. As much could be expected if physicians drafted statutes stipulating how attorneys should practice law. Attorneys would be required to do "justice" to their clients, particularly physician-clients, and failure to do so would result in ten years' imprisonment.

The practice of medicine is no more standardized than the practice of law. An instrument as blunt as the criminal law cannot begin to define and regulate "those subtle and mysterious influences upon which life and health depend . . . ." Dent v. West Virginia, 129 U.S. 114, 122 (1889).

Physicians differ widely in their evaluation of indications and contra-indications for medical abortion, probably more so than in any field of practice. Rather than avoiding abortion practice altogether, however, physicians with narrow concepts of indications remain on hospital committees and other bodies which affect or control the interpretation of abortion laws.[45]

A lawyer or judge, after reading the statute, can examine the medical literature to assess how the statute affects medical practice, and whether its implementation is arbitrary or discriminatory. The literature presents an unending array of scholarly medical analysis with careful explanations of how arbitrary, indefinite, and standardless abortion laws have been.

Retired Justice Tom C. Clark set a commendable medico-legal example in his full treatment of the very question presented in this section. According to Justice Clark:

> "The increasing number of abortions subjects physicians to increased dangers of liability for incorrectly interpreting a statute . . . . [D]octors face an uncertain fate when performing an abortion. This uncer> tainty will continue unless the legislatures or courts provide relief from liability." [46]

[45] Amicus Dr. J. Robert Willson, a former president of the American College of Obstetricians, spoke volumes when he stated: "After all, legal abortion is controlled by individual hospitals, not by the state capitol." Abortion—A Medical Responsibility?, 30 OBSTETRICS & GYNECOLOGY 294, 302 (1967).

Indeed, the commentators for the Model Penal Code provision on abortion, which in essence is under attack in this case, foresaw that "[p]sychiatric justifications for abortion are harder to classify and verify, and psychiatrists themselves have expressed concern at the shadowy line between medical and social justification." MODEL PENAL CODE §207.11, Comments, at 153 (Tent. Draft No. 9, 1959). The A.L.I. had "no body of experience," id. at 156, with reform abortion laws at that time and took no position on the need for further modifications of the Code. It appears that the A.L.I. has since been inactive on this subject.

The "body of experience" over the period from 1959 to date has been catalogued in the medical journals with increasing frequency and in growing volume. In response, both the American Medical Association[47] and the American College of Obstetricians and Gynecologists[48] have found Model Penal Code-type policies on abortion to be unworkable. In 1970 both organizations abandoned their previous Code-type approach for policies permitting the physician to consider the patient's entire family setting (without fear of reprimand for defining "health" more generously than his department chairman). Similarly, in 1970, the Second Tentative Draft of the UNIFORM ABORTION ACT eliminated previous listings of "health" reasons for abortion.[49]

One facet of experience has been to understand that concepts such as "health," "physical health," "mental health," "social conditions," and "patient's environment," are flexible abstract constructs, not a part of measurable scientific matter. Not one or two factors enter into a physician's judgment in assessing the "health" justifications for a medical abortion, but many; indeed, more than could be resolved in ten exercises of a state law remedy in state courts. Some of the questions which are not illuminated by the language and history of the Georgia statute are as follows:

(1) To what extent, if any, may "mental health" factors be considered?

(2) If only "physical health" factors are permissible, what kinds of physical injuries are contemplated by the statute?

(3) Are the dangers of physical injury brought on by mental response to unwanted pregnancy, i.e., attempted suicide, self-mutilation, resort to quack or self-abortion, sufficient under the law?

(4) Must the pending physical injury be from a preexisting condition directly associated with the reproductive organs?

(5) If "mental health" factors are cognizable, must these be diagnosed by one or more psychiatric specialists, or is the private physician enough?

(6) To what extent, if any, may the two extra examining physicians rely upon the private physician's evaluation, as contrasted with their independent findings?

(7) By the same token, to what degree must the hospital committee conduct an independent evaluation?

(8) Is a history or pre-existing mental illness with confinement in an institution necessary?

(9) Is any history of prior psychological difficulty necessary?

These are not fine-spun, legalistic distinctions. The examples are taken from the lengthy medical literature on difficulties of administering the twelve A.L.I.-style abortion laws.

Illustrations from principal medical authorities and texts show that hospitals, their committees, department heads, and individual physicians interpret this type of statute in an impermissibly fluctuating manner. The consequence has been arbitrary and discriminatory implementation of access to this medical procedure.

Louis M. Hellman, M.D., co-author of the definitive text on obstetrics and gynecology, reviewed the recent experience as follows:

> "Because concepts are changing rapidly, the definition of therapeutic abortion lacks precision. The word 'health' in particular is variously interpreted. . . .
>
> In a time of rapidly changing laws, concepts, and mores, therapeutic abortion cannot be defined nor can the listing of its indications carry any degree of accuracy or permanence. • • •
>
> The reform of abortion laws along the guidelines drawn by the American Law Institute has not worked well. Although the number of abortions has increased markedly, the poor still find it difficult to obtain abortions even in situations of obvious merit." L. HELLMAN

& J. PRITCHARD, WILLIAMS OBSTETRICS 1085, 1087 (14th ed. 1971).

The then-Chairman of the Department of Obstetrics and Gynecology at the University of California School of Medicine, San Francisco, Edmund W. Overstreet, M.D., related a similar experience under the California therapeutic abortion law, which also is of the Model Penal Code variety:

> "[P]sychiatrists will vary greatly in their diagnosis of mental illness and the nonpsychiatric physician finds it even more difficult to decide whether or not a patient has mental illness to the point of [legally, not medically] justifying therapeutic abortion. . . .
> "[T]he adjudication of therapeutic abortion, especially the mental illness area (and that is 88 per cent of our cases at the present time), is uneven, inequitable, and discriminatory. No one is happy about it in California. No satisfactory guidelines are developing as to how to approach candidates for therapeutic abortion. Several studies going on now in California, and some of the Swedish results, suggest that forcing a woman to carry an unwanted pregnancy to term against her will always impairs her mental health." Overstreet, Abortion and Obstetrics (Panel), in II ABORTION IN A CHANGING WORLD 74-75 (R. Hall ed. 1970).

The intimation by Dr. Overstreet that deeply unwanted pregnancy per se in a "physically" healthy woman might impair her "mental" health has become the focal point of further studies which verify his suggestion. Today, much of the medical literature recognizes "the undeniable effects of sociological factors on an individual's mental health."

Pike, Therapeutic Abortion and Mental Health, 111 CALIF. MEDICINE 318, 319 (1969). See generally Hook, Refused Abortion, 37 ACTA PSYCHIAT 203 (1961).

Nonetheless, in this area of medicine, the physician-patient relationship is non-existent at the hospital committee level. There a woman may find her application blocked by a physician she has never seen who is "convinced that women have a need to give birth and urge[s] that there be no interference with their doing so." Crowley & Laidlaw, Psychiatric Opinion Regarding Abortion: Preliminary Report of a Survey, 124 AM. J. PSYCHIATRY 145, 147 (1967).

It would unduly lengthen this brief for Amici to point out the many additional studies on capricious and discriminatory administration of the type statute involved here. For the Court's reference, and to emphasize this important point, Amici are including excerpts from such studies below.[50]

[50] Materials from medical and psychiatric literature which illustrate the wide-ranging interpretations of language in laws on abortion, and the sometimes arbitrary implementation of these laws include the following authorities:

(1) Hall, Abortion in American Hospitals, 57 AM. J. PUB. HEALTH 1933, 1935 (1967):

"Abortion policies vary not only from hospital to hospital but also from service to service within the same hospital. They also vary widely from doctor to doctor on the same service of the same hospital."

(2) M. CALDERONE, (ed.), ABORTION IN THE UNITED STATES 34-35, 52 (1958):

(3) For a vivid illustration of the variations among California hospitals in assessing the legality of therapeutic abortion on

A final observation, however, should be that even the more prominent opponents of abortion reform acknowledged this statutory uncertainty. Father John T. Noonan, Jr., criticized the A.L.I. proposal's "physical or mental 'health'" terminology because "[t]here is nothing in the statute which would aid the physician in making the determination." Louisell & Noonan, Constitutional Balance, in THE MORALITY OF ABORTION 249 (Noonan ed. 1970). An earlier article by Professor Louisell stated: "'Mental munity to community, and from hospital to hospital within the same community.

(5) R. H. SCHWARZ, SEPTIC ABORTION 11 (1968):

Many factors have contributed to this state of affairs. Some of these are:

"1. A certain vagueness in what is intended, legislatively speaking, by 'mental' and 'physical' health. • • • [T]he definition of mental health is one of the most vague parts of an often vague piece of legislation."

(8) Droegemueller, Taylor & Drose, The First Year of Experience in Colorado With the New Abortion Law, 103 AM. J. OBST. & GYN. 694, 697 (1969):

"There is a great deal of variation in the interpretation of psychiatric indications. . . .

"The hospitals in the small and medium-sized towns are performing very few therapeutic abortions."

In addition to the above authorities, who stress variations from place-to-place and person-to-person, much research and analysis has examined some of the many reasons why physicians and psychiatrists have difficulty with the statutes, including specific aspects of confusion:

(9) Ryan, Humane Abortion Laws and the Health Needs of Society, 17 W. RES. L. REV. 424, 431 (1965):

"Distinctions between physical and mental health are meaningless in terms of modern medical thinking. Health cannot be divorced from socio-economic factors which influence people's lives since health is a product of these conditions."

(10) White, supra no. (4), at 532:

"[T]here are no generally accepted policies, little or no systematically gathered data, and remarkably few well and objectively substantiated points of view among psychiatrists about 'legally' or 'illegally' induced abortions."

(11) Pike, Therapeutic Abortion and Mental Health, 111 CALIF. MED. 318, 319 (Oct. 1969).

Further factors in the implementation of Georgia's law increase its irregular impact. The problem of construing mental health. The stress and consequences of an unwanted pregnancy as they affect mental health must be determined for an individual patient, taking into consideration her total life situation. Factors such as marital status, family support, economic conditions, subcultural attitudes toward the pregnancy, and personality structure all contribute toward her ability to maintain and complete her pregnancy without damage to her mental functioning.

The new law requires physicians to make judgments that are difficult to make, impossible to prove and of crucial importance to the patient's welfare and the welfare of those dependent on her and intimately involved with her."

(12) Sir Dugald Baird, The Obstetrician and Society, 60 AM. J. PUBLIC HEALTH 628, 635 (1970).

"[E]ven in a basically stable woman, emotional health and subsequently physical health can be undermined by adverse social conditions: for example, substandard housing, overcrowding, illness in other children, elderly or bedridden parents, alcoholic husband, and economic necessity for the mother to work outside the home."

(13) Thompson, Cowen & Berris, Therapeutic Abortion: A Two-Year Experience in One Hospital, 213 J.A.M.A. 991, 994 (1970):

"Psychiatric and socioeconomic problems are so intertwined that it is difficult for the Therapeutic Abortion Board to extract the relevant data in order to make a just and lawful decision. . . . In light of the previously stated vagueness of the law, the evaluation of the patient for psychiatric indications has been one of our major problems."

(14) Moyers, Abortion Laws: A Study in Social Change, 7 SAN DIEGO L. REV. 237, 241 (1970):

"Although some hospitals in the state have done away with the requirement, most committees still require psychiatric consultation when a request for abortion is presented on this [mental health] ground."

"health" rests not solely with her personal physician. Two additional examining physicians are required by the statute. Moreover, any conclusion reached by the first three physicians may be overturned by the hospital committee possibly composed of yet three more physicians, at a minimum. All of the uncertainties set out above are multiplied at this stage by the further examining and committee physicians. Putting to one side the extraordinary waste of highly skilled professional time consumed by this cumbersome ritual, the multiple physician evaluation has a common denominator effect. This is a particular problem in Georgia because "[m]aternal mental health indications are more restrictively defined by the medical community in Georgia than in other states with similar laws." Rochat, et al., An Epidemiological Analysis of Abortion in Georgia, 61 Am. J. Public Health 543, 551 (1971).

The victim of this confusion is the patient, the very individual whose health interests should be of prime concern. Throughout the literature on discriminatory implementation of abortion laws, mention of her is slight or nonexistent. Under the statutory language, her health interests are penultimate. In practice, her interests are secondary to state and county lines, hospital quotas, professional disputes among schools of psychiatric philosophy, and a host of sub-conscious motivating factors present in the individuals who stand between her and her private physician. In short, to obtain a medical abortion in Georgia and similar states, a patient must find physician A, sympathetic examining colleagues B and C, cooperative JCAH-accredited hospital D, in county E, a sympathetic committee of physicians F, G, and H at the hospital, and personal patience of an exceptional variety.

2. Widespread discrimination on the basis of a patient's place of abode has resulted from the statute and its uneven administration

None of the barriers described above stand between a physician and patient with respect to any other medical procedure, not even organ transplants or brain surgery. It is no statistical aberration that 67% of the Georgia residents who obtained legal medical abortions between July and December, 1970, did so in another state. APPENDIX B, Figure 1-2, infra, at B-5, 6. A total of 838 Georgia residents obtained legal abortions in New York City alone as of March 31, 1971. Chase, Abortions to Out-of-State Residents (June 29, 1971) (report released by Health Services Administration, City of New York). The figure of 838 for nine months extrapolates to 1,117 for twelve months. This compares with the 1968-1970 in-state Georgia total of 939 legal abortions, for almost three full years (April 12, 1968 to December 31, 1970; 2.72 years), or 1,035 for three years as extrapolated. In short, New York City physicians provided legal medical abortions for more Georgia residents in one year than Georgia itself has permitted in three years.

Abortion may be a recent subject insofar as litigation is concerned, but the data presented here reveal the same kinds of discriminations dealt with forcefully in the past by this Court. One need only review a few of the decisions on jury selection,[51] voting rights,[52] and legislative malapportionment.[53] In every area wherein the rights of any American citizen are abridged for arbitrary reasons, "figures speak and when they do, Courts listen . . . ." Brooks v. Beto, 366 F.2d 1, 9 (5th Cir. 1966). This has increasingly been the case with respect to important personal needs, particularly where the State exercises monopolistic control over access to the means to vindicate the need. E.g., Boodie v. Connecticut, 401 U.S. 371 (1971); Hawkins v. Town of Shaw, Mississippi, 437 F.2d 1286 (5th Cir. 1971).

Data on the availability and distribution of legal medical abortion in Georgia and other A.L.I. states reveal an arbitrary and discriminatory pattern inherent in the statutes themselves. This has been the studied concensus of proponents and opponents of abortion reform alike, and is verified by available data.

Tables I-2, II-A & III-A, supplemented by Figures II-A-1 & II-A-2, APPENDIX B, infra, at B-5, 6, et seq., shows the numbers of legal abortions by county in Georgia, and the distribution within the state.

Georgia is a state with 159 counties. However, only 56 counties have a JCAH-accredited hospital, while 103 (65%) do not. Although only 38% (5/13) of the metropolitan counties[54] lack JCAH-accredited facilities, a full 67% (98/146) of rural counties are without facilities authorized to do legal abortions. Even more significant is the fact that 96% (153/159) of Georgia's counties had 10 or fewer legal abortions in the most recent year, 1970. 54% of the metropolitan counties had fewer than 10 legal abortions in 1970, but a full 100% of the rural counties had fewer than 10. Of the 150 Georgia hospitals which are licensed by the State, 79 (53%) are not JCAH-accredited, and accordingly not permitted to perform legal abortions. 71 of these 79 are in non-metropolitan counties.

[54] The standard definition of "metropolitan county" is one containing at least one city of 50,000 or more inhabitants, or a county integrated with such a city in a neighboring county. Figures are based on the 1960 census data. See I U.S. Bureau of the Census, Census of Population ch. A (1960).

Data from the other A.L.I. states, where available, have been included in the additional tables and charts which make up Appendix B to this brief. These show a comparable state of affairs in other jurisdictions which are operating under the Model Penal Code-type statute. See APPENDIX B, esp. Table 1-2, infra, at B-5, 6.

The ratio of legal abortions to births, which is a rough measure of the availability of abortion, varied from a 4.0 low in Georgia to a 194.2 high in California, although both have essentially the same statute.

The percentages of counties in A.L.I. states wherein fewer than 10 legal abortions were performed in 1970 exceeded 50% in eight of the ten states for which data were available: Georgia (96%), South Carolina (85%), North Carolina (79%), Virginia (91%), Maryland (68%), Colorado (86%), New Mexico (78%), and Oregon (53%).

These figures point to a systematic pattern of discrimination. In practice the A.L.I. statute excludes an extraordinarily disproportionate number of: (1) rural patients; (2) patients lacking sufficient access to any family planning measures at all, and funds for a legal medical abortion when needed; (3) patients lacking access to the few hospitals and physicians who are most sympathetic to legal abortion; (4) black patients who, as a class, are more economically deprived in Georgia, for example, and account there for 88% of the non-medical abortion deaths (1965 to date). Rochat, et al., An Epidemiological Analysis of Abortion in Georgia, 61 Am. J. Public Health 543 (1971).

As to these classes of patients, their entitlement to scrupulous judicial scrutiny of the statute's effects is particularly well-established. Not only do they suffer in the inability to exercise the fundamental personal rights described previously, but they are also denied access to medical abortion on grounds of: (1) place of residence; (2) financial status; (3) lack of information; and (4) race.[55] As physicians, Amici contend that such factors should have no bearing upon an individual's entitlement to medical care.

Discrimination against persons on the basis of place of residence has been uniformly condemned, provided that factor had no relevance to the person's status in relation to the particular law. The medical data in this case show vast disparities in access to medical care from county-to-county and hospital-to-hospital. Patients are the victims of this disparity. In the same way that "white children" had "accredited schools" in Prince Edward County, Griffin v. County School Board, 377 U.S. 218, 230 (1964) (Black, J.), white, urban, and affluent patients have access to JCAH-accredited medical facilities in urban Georgia. The State imposes the JCAH requirement, forbids rural non-JCAH hospitals to offer this single medical procedure, and permits even the JCAH general community hospital governing boards to forbid entirely the medical procedure of abortion.

[55] Other arbitrary classifications in the statute are examined infra, such as the structures on medical justifications for abortion, the limitation to JCAH-accredited hospitals, and the requirement of residency.

In Griffin and the reapportionment cases this Court held that persons "cannot be classified, constitutionally, on the basis of where they live . . . ." Reynolds v. Sims, 377 U.S. 533, 560 (1964). The cumulative effect of the restrictions on medical abortion in Georgia, however, accomplishes this forbidden result. By statute Georgia creates the obstacles which inherently work to the disfavor of rural physicians and their patients.[56] While it is commendable that at least this discrimination may not have been foreseen, or [56] In light of the fact that the rural counties in Georgia have 81% of the State's hospitals, and account for 42% of births, it cannot be maintained that the rural discrimination results from lack of facilities, or other special rural characteristics.

Discrimination based on location within the state has frequently been held to violate the Equal Protection clause. See, e.g., Avery v. Midland County, 390 U.S. 474, 480 (1967) (White, J.):

> "A city, town, or county may no more deny the equal protection of the laws than it may abridge freedom of speech. . . ."

If it be objected that Lane and Reynolds involved the right to vote, and Griffin the right to go to school, then Amici can only respond that the rights to medical care and autonomy of the family are "older than the Bill of Rights—older than our political parties, older than our school system." Griswold v. Connecticut, 381 U.S. 479, 486 (1965).

A second suspect classification resulting from the statute is the discrimination made between the patient with means, and the patient with none. This is a far-reaching defect of most abortion legislation, and appears to be inherent in the statute, rather than an inadvertent consequence of differences in personal wealth. This issue is discussed in the able brief filed by counsel for the OEO National Legal Program on the Health Problems of the Poor. These Amici will not duplicate that effort.

The socio-economic and racially discriminatory aspects of this type of legislation are also covered by the OEO brief. It is sufficient for Amici to confirm that this kind of legislation has built-in hurdles for patients to overcome, which cannot be surmounted without time, information, sophistication, and the ability to pay additional sums for consulting physicians and hospital stays. Georgia makes no such imposition upon patients for any other medical procedure.

In concluding this discussion of the various arbitrary and discriminatory features of Georgia's abortion law, Amici contend that this in itself is adequate justification for invalidating the entire statutory scheme. Georgia could then start anew, with an obligation to avoid regulation, except for overriding reasons, which themselves must be reflected in narrowly drawn statutes. Thus it might be that the State could enact comprehensive family planning legislation, emphasizing thorough public education, extensive programs of contraception and where requested, sterilization. All hospitals could be encouraged to make legal medical abortion available as a back-up measure for contraceptive failure or nonuse, and the State, through administrative action, could make funds and technical assistance available to this end.

Under the present state of affairs, medical abortion in Georgia is available to the individuals with means. Those without knowledge, sophistication, funds, and political power, are also largely without access to legal abortion.

D. The provisions in Georgia Criminal Code §§26-1201, -1202(a) (1)-(3), -1202(b) (1)-(9), -1202(c), and -1202(e) are not narrowly drawn and do not advance a compelling state interest

The previous section established that the Georgia law regulating the medical procedure of induced abortion, as applied and implemented, was inconsistent with the Equal Protection clause of the Fourteenth Amendment. Similarly, the statute favors certain classes of patients, and excludes others, on its face in a manner offensive to Equal Protection concepts.

Four types of classifications appear invalid. These will be taken up seriatim.

1. The limitation of medical justifications to cases in which: (1) continuation of pregnancy would "endanger the life" of the woman, or "seriously and permanently injure her health," or (2) "[t]he fetus would very likely be born with a grave, permanent, and irremediable mental or physical defect," or (3) "[t]he pregnancy resulted from forcible or statutory rape," is neither narrowly drawn nor supported by any compelling state interests

Essentially three reasons are permissible for the medical procedure of abortion under Georgia law. These occur when the patient can persuade three physicians, the JCAH-hospital abortion committee, and other required signatories that:

(1) "continuation of the pregnancy would . . . seriously and permanently injure [their] health . . .", or

(2) "[t]he fetus would very likely be born with a grave permanent and irremedial mental or physical defect," or

(3) "[t]he pregnancy resulted from forcible or statutory rape."

The equal protection inquiry with regard to the reasons said to justify legal medical abortions must begin with asking who are excluded, and why? As seen earlier, the classifications herein are suspect. Moreover, they must be "based on differences that are reasonably related to the purposes of the Act. . . . " Morey v. Doud, 354 U.S. 457, 465 (1957).

The excluded class of legal abortion applicants is difficult to describe, particularly in light of the varying interpretations given to the statute from county-to-county and hospital-to-hospital. However, an approximation of those whose reasons for abortion do not fit into the statutory justifications would be the patients in whose cases:

(1) continuation of pregnancy would seriously, but not permanently injure their health, or

(2) continuation of pregnancy would permanently, but not seriously injure their health, or

(3) continued pregnancy would injure their physical or mental health to some degree not deemed both serious and permanent by the certifying authorities, or

(4) continued pregnancy would have damaging effects upon the family unit, the husband, or other children, or

(5) continued pregnancy would disrupt the family plan of limiting the number of children to those already existing, or

(6) any other case in which both physician and patient agree that no valid medical reasons exist for not going forward with the abortion requested by the patient, in that her overall well-being would be enhanced thereby.

a. The limiting provisions are not rationally related to a public health interest

On pages 10 to 13 of this brief, Amici set forth the data on safety aspects of medical abortion. These data indicated that mortality rates increased with factors such as (i) duration of pregnancy caused by delay in the system or otherwise, (ii) illness in the patient, and (iii) lack of skill in the physician. In particular, the mortality rates in jurisdictions with elective abortion were lowest, primarily because the patients were generally in good physical and mental "health." [58] In comparative samples from Hungary (1964-67), and Denmark (1961-65), the rates respectively were 1.2 and 41 deaths per 100,000 operations. Tietze, supra note 9, at 198, 208. Denmark, somewhat like Georgia, "require[s] the unanimous authorization of a committee of three persons, attached to the local Mothers' Aid, a publicly supported organization, which conducts a thorough medical and social investigation." Id. at 196. The added delay, in addition to the statutory limitations in Denmark, are responsible for the 41 less 1.2 deaths per 100,000. Rather than promoting public health, the Georgia statute is undoubtedly responsible for the death of a substantial number of women who endure the long waiting period for full certification, or who seek an abortion outside the clinical setting. A recent report on this precise problem stated:

> "Of the 205 nonhospital abortion deaths which occurred between 1950 and 1969, 143 or 69 per cent were of black women. Of the 25 women who died as a consequence of abortion in the last five years, 22 or 88 per cent were black." Rochat, et al., An Epidemiological Analysis of Abortion in Georgia, 61 AM. J. PUBLIC HEALTH 543 (1971).

Accordingly, it cannot be argued that this statute serves a public health interest. It appears to do quite the contrary, particularly in sanctioning medical abortion only in the cases wherein the patient already has some physical or mental health problem.

[58] Inadvertent use of the terms "physical and/or mental health" in this brief is not intended to suggest that such terms would be intelligible in a criminal statute carrying severe sanctions. Declaratory expression and statutory proscription are altogether different word usages.

b. The provisions advance no legitimate interest in protecting human life

There is nothing in the legislative history of this statute which explains its purposes and how they relate to the individual provisions. On its face the statute does not purport to bestow value upon an embryo at every stage of development. Indeed, the same legal justifications for an induced abortion in the first week of pregnancy are also applicable at 20 weeks. Yet, at the outset of pregnancy, the fertilized ovum is scarcely visible to the eye, while at stages beyond 26 weeks, a possibility exists that the fetus could be sustained outside the woman's body.

The statutory provisions also do not seem predicated upon any assumption about the value of an embryo. For example, statutory rape (age 14) with consent which results in pregnancy is still a permissible justification for medical abortion, as is forcible rape. This condition, however, relates solely to events which affected the pregnant woman, not to any qualitative aspect of the embryo.

Similarly, the limitation of health justifications for legal abortion is difficult to explain or justify in terms of any principled rationale. Why, for example, must the patient be both seriously and permanently threatened in her health? What justification is there for excluding a woman who is only seriously threatened, or whose health would be permanently damaged, but not seriously? Certainly, the damage to the patient has no logical relation to the quality of the embryo, yet it is the criterion for the abortion.

c. The provisions do not advance any rational moral value

A last possible rationale which some might offer for the restrictions on induced abortion in this law is a moral one, i.e., the deterrence of premarital or extra-marital sexual relations. Nothing in the statute, however, supports such a purpose. No distinction is made between the married and unmarried, even assuming that such a classification could otherwise withstand analysis. See Eisenstadt v. Baird, 429 F.2d 1398 (1st Cir. 1970), prob. juris. noted, 401 U.S. 934 (1971) (No. 70-17, 1971 Term).

No evidence exists that limited access to abortion curtails promiscuity, nor is it conceivable that such a correlation could exist. The widespread availability of contraception would seem to be a more significant factor. In any event, from the physician's standpoint, a patient is no less worthy of medical care simply because she has unfortunately conceived out of wedlock. Moreover, as one prominent physician observed, "[t]he fear that the availability of abortion will lead to promiscuity is sheer nonsense. . . ." Ryan, Humane Abortion Laws and the Health Needs of Society, 17 W. Res. L. Rev. 424, 432 (1965).

Decisions by this Court also indicate that such a justification for a statute must be more carefully tailored, and could be satisfied by enforcement of statutes outlawing adultery and fornication, if the State chose to do so. See King v. Smith, 392 U.S. 309, 320 (1968); Griswold v. Connecticut, 381 U.S. 479, 498 (1965) (Goldberg, J., concurring).

2. The requirement that patients requesting a therapeutic or elective abortion be examined and certified by three physicians, and that certifications be approved further by a hospital committee of three or more physicians, is neither narrowly drawn nor supportive of a compelling state interest

In regard to no other medical procedure does Georgia law require that a patient's case be evaluated or approved by anyone other than her chosen physician. In medicine, as in law, the right to the physician of one's choice, and to privacy in the physician-patient relationship, has not been invaded by state legislation, except in this single area. Not only do the triple examination provision and committee certification procedure impose a burden upon physicians and patients from a policy standpoint, but there appears to be no rational basis whatever for such procedures, other than the impermissible reason of curtailing access to health care.

Three features of the multiple consultation-examination-certification process are unsupportable.

a. The consulting requirement precludes a clinical relationship by creating an adversarial one, which serves no medical purpose

By the time a patient requests aid from her physician in obtaining a medical abortion, she has generally made the decision to go forward unless some overwhelming physical or psychic hazard dictates otherwise. As seen previously, no such hazards exist, particularly in the case of healthy women.

It is an elementary medical proposition that proper treatment requires a relationship of confidence and trust between doctor and patient. The proposition applies more forcefully when examination and treatment are psychiatric in nature. Where the statute requires written approval by consulting physicians regarding prescribed indications, however, the trust relationship is impossible:

> "[A] word should be said about the conditions for making a valid psychiatric evaluation of a woman who presents herself in a state of acute anxiety attendant upon being pregnant, and is determined to find ways and means of aborting. This is a most prejudicial situation for a psychiatric interview, because under such circumstances optimal cooperation from the patient is not obtainable. She has a tendentious purpose which she must pursue; therefore, it is difficult for her to be candid. The psychiatric interview is compromised from the outset. . . . To conduct such an interview with a patient who is committed to the ulterior motive of obtaining consent for an abortion is to do so against odds; too much must be left to the opinion and value judgment of the psychiatrist." Aarons, Therapeutic Abortion and the Psychiatrist, 124 AM. J. PSYCHIATRY 745, 747 (1967).

The state interference with a normal physician-patient relationship is complicated by the statute's listing of legal justifications for a medical procedure. The patient knows this fact, and that she must persuade a line of physicians that she "fits" into the classifications. Advocacy, rather than treatment, is her goal. Rather than imposing trust in her private physician, she realizes that two additional examining physicians and an anonymous hospital committee must also be persuaded, and that the latter will not even see or examine her overall problem. The first defect in the procedure, therefore, is its destruction of the physician-patient relationship. Without the multiple physician procedure, the patient would be more willing to reveal her overall problem, and to request whatever collateral treatment and counseling might be needed in connection with the abortion procedure.

b. Multiple physician consultations have no rational justification where the patient has no specialized medical problem which could complicate the induced abortion procedure

In medicine, as in law, a generalist calls in specialist consultation when the patient (or client) has a specialized problem. For example, without abortion-specific statutes, a gynecologist would have no need to seek consultation unless non-gynecological problems might complicate the procedure. In a case of a potentially complicating heart condition, a gynecologist might call in a cardiologist. For a patient with a kidney condition, the gynecologist might call in an expert on the renal function. For the patient with serious mental problems, a psychiatrist might be called in. Rarely would more than one specialist be called upon. As the medical literature shows, such consultations simply serve no medical purpose. For this reason, the policy statement of the ACOG recommends the following:

> "When abortion is requested by a patient, a consultation is not necessary. When abortion is recommended by a physician, the indication for the procedure should be approved by a consultant knowledgeable in regard to the condition thought to indicate abortion." APPENDIX A, infra, at A-1.

ACOG does not recommend more than one consultation, and that in the limited circumstance of a recommended abortion. Clearly, no multiple examination and certification procedure can be justified, and none is recommended.

Medical texts, and recent studies of abortion law implementation, have pointed out the lack of medical necessity for consultation, and in strong unequivocal language. The text co-authored by Amicus J. Robert Willson, immediate past-president of ACOG, for example, states:

> "When abortion becomes legal in all states there will be no need for 'therapeutic abortion committees' or even for consultation except under unusual circumstances." J. R. WILLSON, et al., OBSTETRICS AND GYNECOLOGY 178 (4th ed. 1971).

Dr. Edmund Overstreet, recently retired chairman of obstetrics and gynecology at the University of California, San Francisco, Medical Center, and also an Amicus, agrees, and has recommended:

> "Determination by the patient's physician alone (private or resident) of the validity of the patient's desire for termination of pregnancy—with resort to consultations only when he is in doubt.
>
> "The Hospital Therapeutic Abortion Committee should be abolished. Current practice shows it to be essentially worthless, almost purely pro forma in operation, an enormous waste of physician time, and a hindrance to prompt, effective abortion practice." Overstreet, in Symposium—Pregnancy Termination: The Impact of New Laws, 6 J. REPRODUCTIVE MEDICINE 274, 285 (June 1971).

In sum, the hospital certification and multiple physician consultation procedures should be recognized for what they are and always have been: devices designed to reduce the numbers of abortions in a hospital, and to avoid possible criminal and administrative sanctions against the institution. There is no evidence that they serve any other function.

c. The committee process is devoid of procedures which remotely resemble those required by the due process clause

Not only is the multiple physician approval system unwarranted by medical or psychiatric considerations, but there is no procedure whereby the physicians' and patients' fundamental claims can be evaluated in an orderly fashion. As previously shown in this brief, the interests asserted by both physician and patient are fundamental and of significant constitutional stature. Yet neither has an opportunity to be heard before the hospital abortion committee, nor any other administrative agency. Indeed, under the law in question, there is no requirement that a hospital even set up such a committee.

A hearing requirement would not eliminate the more fundamental objections to the statutory restrictions, but at least it would permit physician and patient to present facts and argument in support of the application for a therapeutic abortion. Moreover, procedural due process would require that hospital committees articulate more definitive policies than those in the statute, and that reasoned justification be given for the rejection of any patient's application.

The procedural due process decisions by this Court, from Baldwin v. Hale, 68 U.S. (1 Wall.) 223 (1864), to Goldberg

v. Kelly, 397 U.S. 254 (1970), and Boddie v. Connecticut, 401 U.S. 371 (1971), require that the statutory provisions for additional examining physicians, and hospital committee approval, be stricken as contrary to the Fourteenth Amendment due process clause.

The Georgia therapeutic abortion act imposes state control over all medical procedures directed toward interruption of pregnancy. Administration of this act is vested in hospital governing boards, therapeutic abortion committees, and miscellaneous additional consulting physicians. The act establishes "the State's monopoly," over decisions which bear in an important way upon physicians, women, and their families. See Boddie v. Connecticut, 401 U.S. 371, 375 (1971). Under such circumstances, resort to hospital committees and consultation with additional examining physicians "is no more voluntary in a realistic sense than that of the defendant called upon to defend his interests in court." Boddie, supra, at 376-77. As Mr. Justice Harlan stated for the Court in Boddie:

> "Prior cases establish, first, that due process requires, at a minimum, that absent a countervailing state interest of overriding significance, persons forced to settle their claims of right and duty through the [administrative] process must be given a meaningful opportunity to be heard." Id. at 377.

Procedural due process hearings have been held necessary under the due process clause before professional disciplinary sanctions could be imposed, In re Ruffalo, 390 U.S. 544 (1968), before public assistance could be terminated, Goldberg v. Kelly, 397 U.S. 254 (1970), and before wages could be garnished, Sniadach v. Family Finance Corp., 395 U.S. 337 (1969). See also Greene v. McElroy, 360 U.S.

474 (1959). Where, as here, the fundamental right of access to health care is at stake, and a particular form of medical care has been singled out, an administrative system which denies any hearing whatever cannot withstand scrutiny under the concepts of due process enunciated by this Court. Cf. Baxtrom v. Herold, 383 U.S. 107 (1966).

3. The requirement that the medical procedure of abortion be undertaken only in hospitals accredited by the Joint Commission on Accreditation of Hospitals unjustifiably discriminates against a single medical procedure, and seriously limits the availability of medical facilities for abortion, without advancing any compelling state interest

Nothing in the Model Penal Code draft abortion law suggested that all medical abortions be performed in those hospitals accredited by the Joint Commission on Accreditation of Hospitals [JCAH]. The Code, which was innovative when the 1955 first draft was circulated,[59] made the following recommendation with respect to the type of facility:

> "Hospital facilities are overburdened, and in some rural areas inaccessible. It may be assumed that hospitals maintained by some religious groups would not permit abortion under any circumstances. The operation is ordinarily not difficult or dangerous when performed by a competent physician, so that medical considerations alone do not call for hospitalization. Accordingly, Subsection 2(b) leaves it open to the state. . . ."

[59] More recently, in 1970, the second tentative draft of the UNIFORM ABORTION ACT (Aug. 1970), stipulated that the procedure could be performed "in a medical clinic, or in a hospital . . . ."

MODEL PENAL CODE §207.11, Comments, at 157 (Tent. Draft No. 9, 1959).

Eight of the twelve A.L.I. states[60] failed to heed the Code's recommendation, and went even further by requiring that all medical abortions be undertaken in JCAH-accredited facilities. This excluded licensed hospitals which had not sought accreditation, as well as specialized hospital-affiliated medical facilities designed for the abortion procedure and other family planning medical care.

As a preliminary matter, it is necessary to identify the JCAH, its nature, history, and standards, as well as the purpose behind those standards.

The JCAH is not a unit of Georgia government, nor indeed of any governmental unit in the United States. It is a private, nonprofit corporation, with headquarters in Chicago, and is not even within the jurisdiction of any states with accreditation requirements, much less subject to their control.[61]

JCAH was an outgrowth from the Hospital Standardization Program established by the American College of Surgeons in 1918 for the purpose of encouraging uniform medical records. Accreditation Manual for Hospitals 1 (JCAH 1970). See generally L. E. DAVIS, FELLOWSHIP OF SURGEONS: A HISTORY OF THE AMERICAN COLLEGE OF SURGEONS (1960). In 1951 JCAH came into existence to broaden the aforesaid program, and to promulgate standards for voluntary evaluation of "community general hospitals. . . ." Statement by John I. Brewer, M.D., Commissioner, JCAH (July 9, 1971), APPENDIX A, infra, at A-2.

Seven different versions of JCAH Standards have been promulgated since the original December 1953 version, including the more recent which came into effect during the pendency of this litigation. These seven were in January 1956, October 1957, December 1960, January 1964, December 1965, and July 1971. The most recent is a massive, thoroughly revised 152 page document, as contrasted with the previous 10 page standards from 1965.

In at least three respects, the incorporation into Georgia law of the JCAH standards cannot be reconciled with the requirements of the Equal Protection clause.

a. The JCAH itself does not advocate that medical procedures be confined to a given type of facility or limited to particular patient circumstances

The very purpose behind legislative incorporation of JCAH standards has been misconceived from the outset. As shown by the JCAH standards themselves, and the statement of JCAH Commissioner Brewer, "[t]he principal function of the Joint Commission . . . is to develop standards of quality for community general hospitals . . . ." (emphasis added) Id. [hereinafter Brewer Statement]. JCAH is simply not involved in accrediting special purpose institutions at the present time, except for "long term care facilities (such as nursing homes) and for rehabilitation facilities." Id. At some future date, JCAH may well set up a program for this purpose, but the Commission does not now pretend to approve or disapprove specialized family planning facilities.

Ironically, if JCAH were to establish a specialty program in the near future, a JCAH-accredited family planning facility, affiliated with or accessible to a hospital, still could not offer the medical procedure of induced abortion in Georgia. Such a facility would have the JCAH stamp of approval as a specialized facility, but not as "a hospital . . . accredited by the" JCAH. GA. CRIM. CODE §26-1202(b)(4) (1969).

Not only does JCAH expressly disavow application of its standards to specialized medical facilities, but JCAH also has no policies and no procedures with respect to any particular medical treatment. JCAH is concerned with the physical plant and general administrative operation of community hospitals, not with non-hospital medical facilities, nor with the specifics of any given medical treatment. As stated by Commissioner Brewer,

> "The Joint Commission does not now have and has never had a policy or a standard which attempts to limit medical practice or any of its individual components to the confines of an accredited hospital, nor indeed to any specific location." Brewer Statement.

Similarly, with respect to medical practice in a given sphere,

> "The [JCAH] standards do not attempt to establish any indication of the content of medical practice, but rather refrain from imposing any specific national criteria of quality of that nature. . . . The Joint Commission neither advocates nor opposes any particular position with respect to elective abortions." Id.

In light of the JCAH position, the limitation of medical abortions in Georgia to JCAH-accredited facilities cannot be sustained. It is not "based on differences that are reasonably related to the purposes of the [standards incorporated in] the Act in which it is found." Morey v. Doud, 354 U.S. 457, 465 (1957).

Similarly, the provision in GA. CRIM. CODE §26-1202(b)(5) (1969), requiring that hospital therapeutic abortion committees be "established and maintained in accordance with the standards promulgated by the [JCAH] . . . ," is meaningless. The JCAH has no such standards for these committees, and never has. One can search the JCAH Standards and Bulletins in vain for any guidance. The nearest item is an August, 1966 Bulletin, since replaced by the 1971 revision,[63] which recommended consultation in cases of interruption of pregnancy, in particular because of laws "identifying the conditions, if any, under which the procedures may be undertaken." [64] As to "standards promulgated by the [JCAH] . . . " GA. CRIM. CODE §26-1202(b)(5) (1969), the JCAH referred this back to the medical facility:

> "The Joint Commission has no ruling making such [therapeutic abortion approval] committees mandatory. It is expected that each hospital medical staff will include in its by-laws the controls which it considers appropriate for that hospital's practice." [65]

Whatever the result of this circular shifting of responsibility may be, it is clear that with respect to hospital abortion committees, there are no JCAH standards.[66]

[66] In light of this consideration, it is unnecessary to resolve the further problem presented by the fact that JCAH standards change

b. No public health justification can be advanced for confining the medical procedure of abortion to those limited institutions which are JCAH-accredited

What has been found concerning the irrelevance and express inapplicability of JCAH standards to specialized medical facilities and procedures should be sufficient to conclude the argument that the GA. CRIM. CODE §26-1202(b)(4)-(5) (1969), provisions violate the Due Process and Equal Protection clauses of the Fourteenth Amendment. In addition, however, Amici would like to point out other defects in the statutory limitation of medical abortions to JCAH-accredited facilities.

Earlier in this brief, Amici established beyond dispute the comparative safety of induced abortion as contrasted with other medical procedures. See pp. 10-13, supra. If the statutory purpose of confining medical abortions to JCAH hospitals is an interest in patient welfare, the interest is misplaced. Not only may all forms of heart surgery be done in non-accredited facilities, but the same medical procedure performed to interrupt a pregnancy may be done in any other medical facility when there is no suspected pregnancy. Indeed, every medical procedure except induced abortion can lawfully be undertaken in any medical facility selected by the physician and patient, regardless of surgical complexity. It is not even a crime in Georgia from time to time, in a manner entirely beyond the regulatory power of Georgia or other A.L.I. jurisdictions.

In addition, it is not necessary to deal with the fact that Georgia and the other A.L.I. states attempted to delegate regulatory powers to a private corporation outside their jurisdiction, without providing any guidelines for exercise of the regulatory authority. Compare Shuttlesworth v. City of Birmingham, 394 U.S. 147 (1969).

for major surgery to be undertaken in altogether unlicensed and inadequate facilities.

In light of the comparative safety factor, there is no rational basis for setting induced abortion apart from all other medical procedures.

If, however, one assumes arguendo a valid legislative purpose in prohibiting the medical procedure of abortion, except in approved facilities, the limitation to fully accredited general community hospitals is still medically unjustifiable. Not only do data from specialized medical facilities for abortion show acceptable safety, but medical science may be only a matter of years away from the development of abortion-inducing drugs which surely need not be swallowed within a JCAH-accredited general community hospital.

A study based on experience under California's A.L.I.-type statute at the University of California Medical Center, San Francisco, sought to identify complications from abortion procedures and the extent of necessity for full hospitalization. See Margolis & Overstreet, Legal Abortion Without Hospitalization, 36 OBSTETRICS & GYNECOLOGY 479 (1970). The physicians found that "none of [the] post-abortal complications—all of which were handled with minimal therapy—developed earlier than 2 days after the abortion, and most occurred from 3 to 30 days after the procedure." Id. at 480-481. They concluded that "the conventional 12- to 48-hour hospital admission for aspiration abortion patients serves no real purpose either in preventing or discovering post-abortal complications." Id. at 481.[47]

[47] Similar experience has been recorded in England. See Huntingford, Mortality and Morbidity of Abortion, THE LANCET, at 1012 (May 15, 1971):

A more recent study at the same California institution confirmed and strengthened the earlier conclusions. See Goldsmith & Margolis, Aspiration Abortion Without Cervical Dilation, 110 Am. J. Obstetrics & Gynecology 580 (1971). Using a newly developed technique which reduced the need for anesthetic and cervical dilation, the reporting physicians concluded:

> "With well-qualified personnel who are careful to accept only pregnancies early in the first trimester, and who perform the aspiration technique skillfully, out-of-hospital abortion in well-equipped, licensed facilities seems feasible." Id. at 582.

Similar experience was recorded by the Medical Director of Planned Parenthood of Syracuse, in a study of 600 cases of early induced abortion. Penfield, Abortion Under Paracervical Block, 71 N. Y. State J. of Medicine 1185 (1971). Dr. Penfield's scholarly analysis, which included a systematic review of much overlooked literature in the field, concluded:

> "A review of the world literature has demonstrated that dilatation and curettage [the early abortion operative procedure] under paracervical block [local anesthesia] is a safe and usually painless procedure.
> "The author's series of more than 600 first-trimester surgical abortions has also shown the acceptability of this technic when performed in a well equipped outpatient or office facility." Id. at 1189.

"The evidence available does not show that prolonging the duration of stay of women in hospital after abortion prevents complications, although it may serve to increase the detection-rate. But the detection-rate could also be increased by an adequate system of follow-up. . . ."

Comparable observations can be traced back to as early as 1925, and a paper by the famed Howard A. Kelly, M.D., of Johns Hopkins, on non-hospital uterine curettage, 9 Am. J. Obstetrics & Gynecology 78 (1925). See also Israel & Mazer, Safety and Advantage of Office Curettage, 36 Am. J. Obstetrics & Gynecology 445 (1938).

In addition, current research is underway in numerous American medical centers, as well as abroad, to perfect a safe, reliable abortifacient in tablet form. See Anderson & Speroff, Prostaglandins, 171 Science 502 (1971); Speroff & Ramwell, Prostaglandins in Reproductive Physiology, 107 Am. J. Obstetrics & Gynecology 1111 (1970). When developed, however, such a substance would still be unlawful in Georgia unless taken in a JCAH-accredited hospital after the full range of consultant physician approvals and committee certification. This possibility, which may become reality in a very few years, perhaps best illustrates the unjustifiable nature of the legislation under review in this case.

The logic of the most recent findings set out above goes far beyond the position necessary to invalidate the JCAH-accreditation requirement. Amici, however, take no position beyond that necessary to support Appellants' constitutional objections to the JCAH rule. Admittedly, the medical procedure of induced abortion, late in the pregnancy of an unhealthy patient, performed in an inferior facility by an incompetent operator, is a dangerous procedure. Administrative regulations may be thought necessary to establish specific standards of care directly related to this or any other medical procedure. The statute in question, however, is not a finely tailored administrative regulation, but a blunt prohibition. It contravenes the principle so often enunciated by this Court that

> "[l]egitimate legislative goals 'cannot be pursued by means that broadly stifle fundamental personal liberties when the end can be more narrowly achieved.'" Elfbrandt v. Russell, 384 U.S. 11, 18 (1966).

By contrast, the States of Washington and New York, through health department regulations, have promulgated guidelines for medical facilities outside of the JCAH-accredited institution. Abortion Regulations Adopted by the Washington State Board of Health (Dec. 10, 1970); Abortion Services, N.Y.C. HEALTH CODE tit. III, art. 42, 98 CITY RECORD 6313-6315 (Oct. 23, 1970). These illustrate the concept of carefully drawn health regulations for specialized facilities.[68] Reproductions are included in the offset Supplementary Appendix to this brief. SUPPLEMENTARY APPENDIX, at 15, 11.

In sum, the lower court passed lightly over the Appellants' objections to the JCAH-accreditation requirement. A deeper analysis was necessary to a meaningful adjudication. Amici have attempted to provide this Court with the materials and arguments necessary to a full evaluation of this question, and have reached a conclusion in accord with the better reasoned precedent in point. See People

[68] A study of the Hawaii abortion law, which initially required hospitalization, has concluded with the recommendation that:

> "It is possible to perform safe, efficient abortions on an outpatient basis on women pregnant less than twelve weeks. Clinics set up to do this would probably result in significantly lower individual patient costs." R. Smith, et al., Report to the Legislature: State of Hawaii—Hawaii's Abortion Law 15 (Apr. 20, 1971).

See also Recommended Standards for Abortion Services (APHA 1970).

v. Barksdale, —— Cal. App. 3d ——, —— Cal. Rptr. ——, 1 Crim. 9526 (Calif. Dist. Ct. App. July 22, 1971).

4. The Prohibition Further Limiting Access to the Medical Procedure of Induced Abortion to the Single Class of Patients Who Are "Bona Fide Legal Resident[s] of the State of Georgia" Violates the Privileges and Immunities Clause of Article IV, §2, and the Equal Protection Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment by Excluding Non-resident Patients for Reasons Which Are Neither Narrowly Drawn Nor Supportive of Any Legitimate, Compelling State Interest

The final unconstitutional provision of the Georgia abortion law limits this medical procedure to "bona fide legal resident[s] of the State of Georgia." GA. CRIM. CODE §26-1202(b)(1)-(2) (1969). Without discussion, the lower court upheld the requirement. Doe v. Bolton, 319 F. Supp. 1048, 1056 (N.D. Ga. 1970) (per curiam). A contrary view was taken by a three-judge federal district court in North Carolina, with respect to a four month durational residency requirement. Corkey v. Edwards, 322 F. Supp. 1248, 1254 (W.D.N.C.), appeal docketed, 40 U.S.L.W. 3048 (U.S. July 17, 1971) (No. 71-92, 1971 Term).

From the medical standpoint, a patient's needs are not less deserving of care by virtue of his or her residence in any particular city or town. The history of medicine is replete with instances of great medical centers frequented by prominent citizens from other states and nations. Presidents and Justices of this Court have travelled to the Mayo Clinic for decades. See H. CLAPESATTLE, THE DOCTORS MAYO (1941). If the Georgia residency requirement is valid, a like provision limiting medical care in general to state residents would be equally valid.

It requires little analysis, and less data, to demonstrate the arbitrary nature of the residency requirement in this and similar statutes. The requirement of residency is not limited to those patients seeking free medical care at public institutions, in which case different considerations would be involved. Instead, the private patient of a private physician in a private medical facility must present a passport of Georgia state residency in order to be considered as an applicant for the medical procedure of induced abortion. Both she and the physician must certify to her residency under oath.

The provision has no basis in the possibility that Georgia hospital beds will otherwise be utilized beyond capacity. According to the annual report of the American Hospital Association, the 29,872 beds in the State's 153 non-federal hospitals were in use during 1969 only 80.8% of the time. Hospitals (pt. 2), 44 J. Am. Hospital Ass'n 1, 483, Table 3 (1970) (Guide Issue). As previously pointed out, 96% of Georgia's counties had fewer than 10 legal abortions in 1970. Indeed, more Georgia residents obtained legal abortions in New York City from July 1, 1970 to March 31, 1971 than in their State of residence. It is New York, if any state, which has standing to complain of an influx of abortion applicants. Yet, all New York officials agree that both the State and a large part of the nation have been accommodated without sacrificing the quality of medical care. See Chase, Abortions to Out-of-State Residents (June 29, 1971) (Report released by the Health Services Administration, City of New York).

Two traditional constitutional bases can be invoked to invalidate the residency provision.

Article IV, §2 of the Constitution guarantees that "[t]he Citizens of each State shall be entitled to all Privileges and Immunities of Citizens in the several States."

A classical exposition of the purpose of the clause is Justice Washington's opinion in Corfield v. Coryell, 6 Fed. Cas. 546, 550 (C.C.E.D. Pa., 1832) (No. 3,230):

> "The inquiry is, what are the privileges and immunities of citizens in the several states? We feel no hesitation in confining these to those privileges and immunities which are, in their nature, fundamental; which belong, of right, to the citizens of all free governments; and which have at all times been enjoyed by the citizens of the several states which compose this Union, from the time of their becoming free, independent, and sovereign. What these fundamental principles are, it would perhaps be more tedious than difficult to enumerate. They may, however, be comprehended under the following general heads: Protection by the government; the enjoyment of life and liberty, the right to acquire property of every kind, and to pursue and obtain happiness and safety, subject, nevertheless, to such restraints as the government may justly prescribe for the general good of the whole" (emphasis added).

Since that early interpretation, this Court has repeatedly upheld the citizen's right to enter another state for the purpose of engaging in lawful commerce, trade, or business; to acquire personal property; to take and hold real estate; to maintain actions; and to be exempt from any higher taxes or excises than are imposed upon its own citizens. See, e.g., Paul v. Virginia, 75 U.S. (8 Wall.) 168,

180 (1869); Ward v. Maryland, 79 U.S. 418, 430 (1870); Blake v. McClung, 172 U.S. 239, 248-254 (1898); Toomer v. Witsell, 334 U.S. 385, 395-397 (1948). In Blake, a Tennessee statute afforded resident creditors a preference over non-residents in the distribution of assets of insolvent foreign corporations with property in the state. In an action by Tennessee creditors seeking distribution of assets of an insolvent foreign corporation, non-resident creditors who were citizens of other states intervened and resisted the priority given the resident creditors. The Court held the statute to infringe the rights of the intervenors:

> "It was the right of citizens of Tennessee to deal with it [a foreign corporation], as it was their right to deal with corporations created by Tennessee. And it was equally the right of citizens of other states to deal with that corporation. . . . But the enjoyment of these rights is materially obstructed by the statute in question, for that statute, by its necessary operation, excludes citizens of other states from transacting business with that corporation upon terms of equality with citizens of Tennessee." 172 U.S. at 252-253.

Similarly, Ward v. Maryland, supra, struck down a Maryland law which imposed a licensing fee on non-residents for selling goods not produced within the state in certain areas. The Court held that the statute imposed on other states' citizens a discriminatory tax which infringed their rights to trade on equal terms with Maryland citizens.

The Blake and Ward cases both concerned state citizens who entered other states in order to ply their trade. No less deserving constitutional protections, however, are state citizens who enter other states in order to partake of another's business. This was recognized in Valle v. Stengel, 176 F.2d 697 (3d Cir. 1949), which held, alternatively, that New York citizens' rights under the Privileges and Immunities clause were infringed when they were denied access to a swimming pool operated by a private corporation, but open to the public upon payment of a fee.

Here, the residence requirement precludes citizens of other states from seeking particular medical treatment in Georgia, whereas Georgia citizens are not so constrained. Citizens and residents of Florida, Alabama, Tennessee, North Carolina and South Carolina who live near the Georgia border are prohibited from receiving medical care for abortion even if their regular gynecologists are Georgia doctors. Citizens from other states who visit Georgia cannot be aborted even in the most compelling medical emergencies. The statute may not only infringe rights to engage professional services on equal terms with Georgia residents, but may cause severe injury as well.

In order to avoid invalidation under Article IV, §2, a discriminatory statute must be based on a substantial independent justification. The Court in Toomer v. Witsell, 334 U.S. 385 (1948), stated this test:

> "... [T]he privileges and immunities clause is not an absolute. It does bar discrimination against citizens of other States where there is no substantial reason for the discrimination beyond the mere fact that they are citizens of other States. But it does not preclude disparity of treatment in the many situations where they are perfectly valid independent reasons for it. Thus the inquiry in each case must be concerned with whether such do exist and whether the degree of discrimination bears a close relation to them" 334 U.S. at 396.

No substantial reason exists for Georgia to prohibit non-resident women from seeking medical services there to terminate pregnancies. A desire to conserve medical resources for the exclusive use of residents cannot justify the residence requirement; medical resources often are private and are not "common property" of the State. Cf. McCready v. Virginia, 94 U.S. 391 (1877), as limited by Toomer v. Witsell, 334 U.S. 385 (1948), and Mullaney v. Anderson, 342 U.S. 415 (1952). At the same time, any such conservation policy is invidiously underinclusive: non-residents are prohibited from seeking medical services only if they seek to terminate pregnancy through abortion. Neither can a desire to conserve state funds for the use of state residents justify this section, for it applies equally to private and public hospitals, physicians, and patients. Cf. American Commuters Ass'n v. Levitt, 279 F. Supp. 40 (S.D.N.Y. 1967). Without a substantial justification, the residence requirement violates Article IV, §2.

For substantially the same reasons, the residency requirement cannot withstand analysis under the Equal Protection clause of the Fourteenth Amendment. In this context, Article IV, §2, and the Equal Protection clause run together. See Graham v. Richardson, 402 U.S. —— (June 14, 1971); Shapiro v. Thompson, 394 U.S. 618, 638 (1969).

CONCLUSIONS

For the reasons set forth, this Court should modify the judgment below by affirming the District Court's decision that certain portions of Georgia Criminal Code §26-1202 violate Appellants' federal constitutional rights, reversing the decision below to the extent that other portions were held valid, and reversing the decision to deny injunctive and declaratory relief to the class of physician appellants.

POLICY ON ABORTION

Policies covering abortions should be designed by the medical staff to safeguard the patient's health or improve her family life situation. They should have due regard for local legal statutes and judicial decrees. Abortion should only be performed in facilities that are administered by a hospital approved by the Joint Commission on Accreditation of Hospitals and/or licensed by a state or province.

It is recognized that abortion may be performed at a patient's request, or upon a physician's recommendation. No physician should be required to perform, nor should any patient be forced to accept an abortion.

When abortion is requested by a patient, the request should be obtained in writing from the patient, or, in the case of a minor, from her parent or guardian. The patient should be informed of the medical nature of the procedure and of its potential consequences. When abortion is recommended by a physician, the indications should be stated in the patient's record, and informed consent obtained from the patient and her husband, or herself if she is unmarried, or from her nearest relative or guardian if she is under the age of consent. When abortion is requested by a patient, a consultation is not necessary. When abortion is recommended by a physician, the indication for the procedure should be approved by a consultant knowledgeable in regard to the condition thought to indicate abortion.

Abortion is an operative procedure and should only be performed: (1) by a physician who has hospital privileges for the care of obstetric-gynecologic patients and (2) in a hospital-facility adequately equipped to care properly for unexpected complications.

In order to assure that adequate facilities will be available for indicated care of other obstetric-gynecologic patients in some communities, consideration should be given by hospitals to (1) providing a room or entirely separate facilities where abortion can be performed with minimal disruption of other hospital procedures and the hospital based educational program, and (2) utilizing hospital personnel who volunteer to care for patients admitted to be aborted.

Dear Doctor Barnes:

It has come to my attention that the origin, background and purposes of the Joint Commission on Accreditation of Hospitals should be more widely and more accurately known. This is particularly true where the actions of the Joint Commission are a factor in judicial considerations. I should like to submit therefore a brief account of the Joint Commission and its purposes.

The Joint Commission on Accreditation of Hospitals was incorporated in late 1951 as a voluntary corporation not for profit. Its corporate members are the American College of Physicians, the American College of Surgeons, the American Hospital Association and the American Medical Association. It was created to continue a program begun by the American College of Surgeons in 1918, the Hospital Standardization Program.

The principal function of the Joint Commission, as was true of its predecessor program, is to develop standards of quality for community general hospitals, to promulgate these standards among health professionals, on invitation to evaluate the condition and procedures of hospitals, and to recognize substantial conformance to its standards by granting a certificate of accreditation. Evaluation is made in a survey visit, requested by the hospital, which must be repeated at least biennially. The survey visit is carried out by a professional team, headed by a physician trained in accreditation methods.

Present hospital accreditation standards were adopted by the Joint Commission Board of Commissioners in 1970. In their formulation extensive use was made of outside expert advisors, some 250 in all. Before adoption, the standards were also submitted to formal and informal review by substantial numbers of interested individuals and organizations.

The standards address themselves to the safety and maintenance of the physical plant of the hospital; to the organization and functioning of the hospital's governing authority and its medical staff; to the provision of adequate and efficient space, equipment and personnel for the necessary diagnostic and therapeutic resources; and to the continuing exercise of appropriate controls to assure effective performance, among which most particularly shall be a regular, critical review by the medical staff of the calibre of clinical work being done by each of its members.

The standards do not attempt to establish any indication of the content of medical practice, but rather refrain from imposing any specific national criteria of quality of that nature. Instead the organized medical staff of each hospital seeking voluntary accreditation is expected to define, in its bylaws, rules and regulations, those clinical policies which identify the essential factors of good medical practice. The Joint Commission neither advocates nor opposes any particular position with respect to elective abortions. Each physician's practice must be measured by his hospital's medical staff against the clinical policies adopted in that hospital.

While the standards are written for and the program is directed primarily toward community general hospitals, many special hospitals - such as psychiatric, orthopedic, pediatric and others - have sought, and frequently have obtained, accreditation within this program, in lack of a comparable program for the particular specialty. A criterion for eligibility for accreditation survey is registration as a hospital with the American Hospital Association. The Joint Commission does not therefore offer accreditation to clinics or group practice situations as such.

Recently, the Joint Commission has agreed to an organization relationship with groups of national associations wishing to develop special accreditation programs in fields of health-related services. Presently, by this arrangement, accreditation programs are available for long term care facilities (such as nursing homes) and for rehabilitation facilities. Standards are currently being developed by other associated groups for psychiatric facilities and for facilities for the mentally retarded.

The Joint Commission does not now have and has never had a policy or a standard which attempts to limit medical practice or any of its individual components to the confines of an accredited hospital, nor indeed to any specific location. It concerns itself only with the institutional setting of medical practice and does not presume to concern itself with medical practice in any setting outside the purview of its formally organized programs.

A much more detailed description of the work of the Joint Commission is available upon request to its office at 645 North Michigan Avenue, Chicago, Illinois 60611.

EXPLANATORY NOTES

SECTION I. This Section contains information in summary form on therapeutic abortion in the United States. In particular, it focuses on the implementation in ten states of the therapeutic abortion provisions of the American Law Institute's Model Penal Code as enacted in varying forms. Little data could be obtained from the two other states, Arkansas and Kansas, which have adopted this type of statute.

SECTION II. This Section consists of state summaries in table and map form on trends in therapeutic abortion in the ten A.L.I. states for which data was available. The data in Table II is presented in a manner that draws distinctions between metropolitan and non-metropolitan areas. This format, it was thought, most clearly demarcates the trends in the implementation of the therapeutic abortion statutes.

A "metropolitan county" as it is used herein is one which is located within Standard Metropolitan Statistical Area (SMSA) as calculated in Bureau of the Census, 1960 Census of the Population, Vol. 1, Ch. A.

SECTION III. The final Section consists of tables presenting the actual distribution of therapeutic abortions by county and hospital of occurence for the A.L.I. states. The data is by county only for Georgia, Virginia, Oregon and California where a hospital by hospital breakdown was not available.

1. "TA Ratio" is the therapeutic abortion ratio, the number of therapeutic abortions per 1000 live births. It is the standard measure of abortion frequency. E.g., the ratio of 15 therapeutic abortions to 50 live births is 300.

2. Statistics on therapeutic abortion, including frequencies, places of occurrence, and indications, were obtained from the appropriate state agencies, infra. The source for the numbers of births for each year was Guide Issue- Journal of the American Hospital Association (August, 1968, 1969, 1970). Because the 1971 issue, which contains the 1970 births, was not available when the tables were being prepared, the 1970 issue was used for the 1969 and 1970 statistics.

State sources for therapeutic abortion data:
Georgia: Department of Public Health (unpublished material).
South Carolina: State Board of Health (personal communication from Dr. J.E. Padgett, Jr., Chief, Bureau of Maternal and Child Care). (Time period for therapeutic abortion is February, 1970 to May, 1971; births have been adjusted accordingly).
North Carolina: State Office of Vital Statistics (unpublished material, January 28, 1971). (Represents 75% of all therapeutic abortions performed in North Carolina to that date. J. May, Therapeutic Abortion Experience in North Carolina under the Liberalized 1967 Law, N.C. Med. J. 186, 194 (May, 1971)).
Virginia: Bureau of Maternal Health, Department of Health (unpublished material). (Time period for therapeutic abortion is July to December, 1970; the number of therapeutic abortions was adjusted accordingly).
Maryland: Maternity and Family Planning Section, Department of Health (unpublished material). (Therapeutic abortion data is for fiscal years).
Delaware: Division of Physical Health, Department of Health and Social Services, Report of Abortions, 1970.
Colorado: Statistics Section, Department of Health, Summary Statistics Therapeutic Abortions, March 4, 1971.
New Mexico: Data gathered by Professor Robert Munsick for Conference on Abortion, Sterilization, and Population, (University of New Mexico, February, 1971). (Time period for therapeutic abortion is five, six or seven months period, depending upon the hospital; the number of therapeutic abortions was adjusted accordingly).
Oregon: State Board of Health, Therapeutic Abortions Occurring in Oregon Hospitals, 1969; and 1970, February 26, 1970; and February 25, 1971.
California: Department of Public Health and personal communication from Mrs. T. Hunt.

3. "Out-of-State Abortions" are those performed outside of the woman's state of residence. The "% of Residents' Abortions Received Out-of-State" was calculated from data in C. Tyler, J. Bourne, S. Conger, and J. Kahn, Reporting and Surveillance of Legal Abortions in the United States, 1970 (Center for Disease Control, HEW) (June 3, 1971) Figure 2.

The "Number of Residents Received Abortions in New York City, July, 1970 - March, 1971" is based on statistics issued by the Health Services Administration, The City of New York, June 29, 1971.

4. "Counties Lacking Facilities Required by Law for Therapeutic Abortion" are those counties which lack the medical facilities specified by the particular state statute for the legal performance of therapeutic abortion.

All twelve A.L.I. Model Penal Code-type states require that abortions be performed in state licensed hospitals. The sources for state licensed hospitals was obtained from the state when possible.

Georgia: Licensure Service, Department of Public Health, Licensed Hospitals in Georgia, April 1, 1971.
Virginia: Bureau of Medical and Nursing Facilities Services, State Department of Health, Virginia Hospitals, January, 1971.
New Mexico: Health Facilities Services Division, Health and Social Services Department, Hospital Facilities in New Mexico, March, 1970.
California: Bureau of Health Facilities Licensing Certification, State Department of Public Health, Hospitals, Homes, and Related Health Facilities, March 31, 1970.
Otherwise, the Guide Issue's "general" hospital classification was used.

Of all twelve states, all but South Carolina, North Carolina, New Mexico and Oregon require that the procedure occur in an accredited hospital as well. Of these eight states, the group which accredits the hospital must be the Joint Commission on Accreditation of Hospitals, except in Delaware, where accreditation must be "by a nationally recognized hospital accrediting authority". The source of accreditation of hospitals was the Guide Issue, (1970).

5. The source for "Unmet Family Planning Needs by County" ("Per cent Medically Indigent Women Without Family Planning Program" and "Illegitimate Births per 1000 Live Births") is Family Planning Program, Office of Economic Opportunity, Need for Subsidized Family Planning Services: United States, Each State and County, 1968. "Medically indigent women" as defined by this source are those women of child bearing age who are unable to afford private medical care. The county-by-county statistics from this source are based on the county of residence of the woman. The therapeutic abortion data used herein (See note 2) are based on the county of occurence of abortions and births. This difference accounts for the apparent inconsistencies in Table III (such as illegitimate birth rates for counties in which no births took place).

6. The figures in Tables II-A to II-J have been percentagized vertically; that is, under the appropriate column, "Metropolitan County" or "Non-Metropolitan County." E.g., if a state consisted of ten counties (5 metropolitan and 5 non-metropolitan) of which only one metropolitan county had no therapeutic abortions in 1970, the percentage listed in the "Metropolitan County" column for "No.

T.A.'s in 1970" would be 20%, meaning that one county of the five metropolitan counties fit this category. However, the two key rows "Number of Metrop. and Non-Metrop. Counties" and "Number of Licensed General Hospitals" have been percentagized horizontally.

7. The abbreviation "NA" in Table III indicates that a hospital is not accredited by the Joint Commission on Hospital Accreditation. All other listed hospitals, in the states which require accreditation, are accredited.

SUPPLEMENTARY APPENDIX TO BRIEF:
MATERIALS ON LEGAL, MEDICAL, AND SOCIAL IMPACT OF ABORTION LAW
RESTRICTIONS IN THE UNITED STATES

This Supplementary Appendix consists of offset reproductions of particularly relevant legal, medical, and social science publications, all of which are in the public domain.

Legal materials and commentary include a table showing in simplified form the types of statutes regulating the medical procedure of induced abortion in the United States. Also set out are the most recent versions of proposals by the Commissioners on Uniform State Laws, and the American Law Institute, as well as statutes and regulations from the State of Washington and New York.

Similarly included, for the Court's convenience, are offset copies of all major court decisions, both state and federal, which passed upon significant substantive and procedural points in cases which questioned the validity of restrictions on medical abortion.

Finally, the principal medical and social science publications concerning relevant aspects of medical abortion incidence, safety, and need, have also been offset and included in this Appendix. None of the materials are highly technical, and several have been noticed judicially in support of state and federal decisions. E.g., California v. Belous, 71 Cal. 2d 954, 965, 458 P.2d 194, 200, 80 Cal. Rptr. 354, 360 (1969), cert. denied, 397

915 (1970); McCann v. Babbitz, 310 F. Supp. 293, 301 (E.D. Wis.) (per curiam), appeal dismissed, 400 U.S. 1 (1970)(per curiam). These materials are included to ensure that the Court will not be without what Judge Learned Hand denominated as "the aid of unpartisan and authoritative scientific assistance in the administration of justice" in this case. Parke-Davis & Co. v. H.K. Mulford Co., 189 Fed. 95, 115 (C.C.S.D.N.Y. 1911).

The subject matter of this case - restrictions on the medical procedure of abortion - is particularly susceptible to predisposition. What in scientific circles is accepted fact may in other circles be heresy. The folklore on abortion, contraception, and human fertility in general is not likely to rest on firm scientific foundations. Only a few short years ago, an examination of texts used in medical schools revealed that "[t]wo thirds of the texts (25 texts) contained either no mention of contraception or only isolated reference to it, with no complete discussion." Tietze, et al., Teaching of Fertility Regulation in Medical Schools, 196 J. American Medical Ass'n 20, 23 (1966). If the medical profession only recently began to examine and understand contraception, with abortion lagging years behind, it is not to be expected that lawyers, judges, and the public at large would be fully knowledgeable in either or both fields.

As indicated above, the lower state and federal courts have taken judicial notice of non-record scientific materials needed for a full understanding of the subject matter of abortion. This practice has firm foundations in decisions dating back throughout this century. Facts pertaining to the discriminatory impact of laws fair on their face have been noticed in Reynolds v. Sims, 377 U.S. 533 (1964)(voter distribution); social and economic conditions in West Coast Hotel Co. v. Parrish, 300 U.S. 379, 399 (1936); studies by public and private agencies in Muller v. Oregon, 208 U.S. 412, 419-21 (1908); published statistics in Parker v. Brown, 317 U.S. 341, 363 (1942); and even letters from knowledgeable citizens, as in American Federation of Labor v. American Sash & Door Co., 335 U.S. 538, 551 (1949)(Frankfurter, J. concurring).

Much of the scientific data relevant to this case was not in assembled or published form until recent months. Other items were not unearthed from medical libraries until recently. All of what is included has been carefully sifted in order to present the most directly relevant materials. It is the hope of the parties that these materials will be of use to the Court in reaching an informed and just decision.

II. FEDERAL AND STATE COURT DECISIONS

A. CASES BEFORE THE SUPREME COURT OF THE UNITED STATES

United States v. Vuitch, 402 U.S. 62 (April 21, 1971). 39 [38

Roe v. Wade, 314 F. Supp. 1217 (N.D. Tex., June 17, 1970) (per curiam) (GOLDBERG, Cir. J. and HUGHES & TAYLOR, D.JJ.), juris. postponed, 402 U.S. ___(No. 808, 1970 Term; renumbered No. 70-18, 1971 Term). (Decision of a three-judge Federal court granting standing to a pregnant woman and a physician, and holding the Texas anti-abortion statute unconstitutional as an infringement of the right to privacy, unsupported by a compelling state interest; and void for vagueness. The court declined to grant injunctive relief.) 77 [9]

Doe v. Bolton, 319 F. Supp. 1048 (N.D. Ga., July 31, 1970; Supplemental Opinion, Oct. 14, 1970) (per curiam) (MORGAN, Cir. J. and SMITH & HENDERSON, D.JJ.) juris. postponed, 402 U.S. ___(No. 971, 1970 Term; renumbered No. 70-40, 1971 Term). (Decision of a three-judge Federal court granting standing to plaintiffs and holding portions of the Georgia Therapeutic Abortion Act unconstitutional. The court held that the state cannot limit the reasons for which an abortion is sought, although it can regulate abortion procedures beyond the basic requirement that they be performed by licensed physicians. In a Supplemental Opinion the court held that 87 [1 hospital committees cannot adopt strict abortion standards similar to those struck down in the statute.)

B. DECISIONS BY HIGHEST STATE COURTS

California v. Belous, 71 Cal. 2d 954, 458 P.2d 194, 80 Cal. Rptr. 354 (Sept. 5, 1969) (per PETERS, 4-3 decision), cert. denied, 397 U.S. 915 (1970). (Landmark decision of California Supreme Court striking down pre-1967 anti-abortion statute, permitting abortion only when "necessary to preserve her life," as void for vagueness. The Court also found "a fundamental right of the woman to choose whether to bear children" following from "right to privacy" decisions. The Court argued that the compelling state interest, based on the medical dangers of abortion in an earlier time, which would be required before such a strict abortion statute could be held constitutional, no longer exists today.) 99 [19

State v. Jamieson, 480 P.2d 87 (Kan., Jan. 23, 1971). (Decision of Kansas Supreme Court overturning conviction of a physician under anti-abortion statute on grounds that the information was invalid for failing to negate the exception to the definition of criminal abortion, "unless necessary to preserve the life of said woman.") 119 [5]

C. DECISIONS BY FEDERAL DISTRICT COURTS

1) DECISIONS INVALIDATING ABORTION LAWS IN WHOLE OR IN PART

Doe v. Scott, 321 F. Supp. 1385 (N.D. Ill., Jan. 29, 1971) (SWYGERT Cir. J. and ROBSON & CAMPBELL, D.JJ.) (2-1 decision, Campbell dissenting), appeal docketed sub nom. Hanrahan v. Doe, 39 U.S.L.W. 3438 (U.S. Mar. 29, 1971) (No. 1522, 1970 Term; renumbered No. 70-105, 1971 Term). (Decision of a three-judge Federal court granting standing to women seeking abortions and to certain physicians, declaring Illinois anti-abortion statute unconstitutional, and granting permanent injunction. The court held that the statute (permitting abortion only to preserve the woman's life) was unconstitutionally vague and a violation of a woman's right to life and privacy. No legitimate or compelling state interest in fetal life permitted the state to prohibit first trimester abortions performed by licensed physicians in licensed medical facilities.) 125 [13]

Doe v. Rampton, No. C-234-70 (D. Utah, Sept. 14, 1970) (per curiam) (RITTER, D.J.). (Order of a single Federal district judge temporarily restraining enforcement of Utah anti-abortion statute in light of its probable unconstitutionality.) 139 [2]

Doe v. Bolton, supra.

Roe v. Wade, supra.

Babbitz v. McCann (I), 310 F. Supp. 293 (E.D. Wis., March 5,1970) (per curiam) (KERNER, Cir. J. and REYNOLDS & GORDON, D.JJ.), appeal dismissed, 400 U.S. 1 (1970) (per curiam). (Decision of a three-judge court declaring Wisconsin's anti-abortion statute unconstitutional as an invasion of a woman's right to privacy guaranteed by the Ninth Amendment. The court held that any state interest in the fetus was out-weighed by the rights of the pregnant woman.) 141 [1

Babbitz v. McCann (II), 320 F. Supp. 219 (E.D. Wis., Nov. 18, 1970) (per curiam) (KERNER, Cir. J. and REYNOLDS & GORDON, D.JJ.), vacated, 402 U.S. 903 (1971). (Decision of three-judge court granting previously denied injunctive relief, vacated by the Supreme Court for reconsideration in light of Younger v. Harris, 401 U.S. 37 (1971), and companion cases.) 151 [5

Harling v. Department of Health and Social Services, 323 F. Supp. 899 (E.D. Wis., March 11, 1971) (GORDON, D.J.). (Decision of district court judge setting aside conviction of a non-physician for violation of abortion law, in light of Babbitz v. McCann (I), supra.) 157 [3

Kennan v. Nichol, No. 71-C-118 (W.D. Wis., April 27, 1971) (DOYLE, D.J.). (Decision of district judge enjoining prosecution of doctor for violations of Wisconsin abortion statute in light of Babbitz v. McCann (I), supra, on the ground that the federal proceeding pre-dated the state criminal proceeding and was therefore not precluded by the "anti-injunction" statute.) 161 [5

Kennan v. Warren, No. 71-C-132 (W.D. Wis., May 5, 1971; Supplemental Opinion, May 6, 1971) (DOYLE, D.J.). (Decision of district judge enjoining additional civil proceedings taken against same physician as in Kennan v. Nichol, supra.) 167 [

2) FEDERAL DECISIONS UPHOLDING ABORTION LAWS

Corkey v. Edwards, 322 F. Supp. 1248 (W.D. N.C., Feb 1, 1971) (CRAVEN, Cir. J. and JONES & McMILLAN, D.JJ.), appeal docketed, 40 U.S.L.W. 3048 (U.S. July 17, 1971) (No. 71-92, 1971 Term). (Decision of three-judge court upholding North Carolina's Therapeutic Abortion Act. The court held that a state interest in the fetus was sufficient to support the statute against constitutional challenge. The court struck down a four month residency requirement for abortion as a violation of the right to travel.) 181 [8]

Steinberg v. Brown, 321 F. Supp. 741 (N.D. Ohio, Dec. 18, 1970) (WEICK, Cir. J. and GREEN & YOUNG, D.JJ.) (2-1 decision, Green dissenting) (not appealed). (Decision of a three-judge court upholding Ohio anti-abortion statute by finding the statute not vague and a legitimate exercise of state power to protect the fetus. In a dissenting opinion Judge Green found the statute in violation of the Fourteenth Amendment and the right to privacy. In addition, he challenged the majority's interpretation of the statute's legislative history.) 189 [21]

Rosen v. Louisana, 318 F. Supp. 1217 (E.D. La., Aug. 7, 1970) (AINSWORTH, Cir. J. and CASSIBRY & BOYLE, D.JJ.) (2-1 decision, Cassibry dissenting), appeal docketed, 39 U.S.L.W. 3247 (U.S. Nov. 27, 1970) (No. 1010, 1970 Term; renumbered No. 70-42, 1971 Term). (Decision of three-judge court upholding Lousiana statute authorizing revocation of medical doctor's license for performing abortions. The court found the statute not vague and a valid exercise of power to protect the fetus. In his dissent Judge Cassibry held the statute constitutionally infirm on numerous grounds including violation of the right to privacy, and denial of equal protection to the poor.) 211 [29]

D. STATE LOWER COURT DECISIONS

1) STATE LOWER COURT DECISIONS INVALIDATING ABORTION LAWS IN WHOLE OR IN PART

Rogers v. Danforth, No. 315512 (Mo. Cir. Ct. St. Louis, June 7, 1971) (LASKY, J.). (Decision of trial court finding Missouri anti-abortion statute void for vagueness and in violation of the First, Fourth, Fifth, Ninth, and Fourteenth Amendments. 241 [3]

People v. Gwynne, No. 173309 (Central Orange Cnty. Mun. Ct., Calif., June 16, 1970) (THOMPSON, J.). (Decision of a trial judge that California statute goes beyond legitimate health purposes and is an unconstitutional infringement of the rights to life and liberty protected by the Fourteenth Amendment.) 245 [5

People v. Robb, Nos. 149005 and 159061 (Central Orange Cnty. Mun. Ct., Calif., Jan. 7, 1970) (MAST, J.). (Decision of trial judge finding California statute in violation of U.S. Constitution on various grounds including: improper delegation of legislative authority (accreditation and hospital committee provisions), vagueness, denial of equal protection, and interference with the right to privacy.) 251 [8

People v. Barksdale, No. 33237C (San Leandro-Hayward Mun. Ct., Alameda Cnty., Calif., March 24, 1970) (FOLEY, J.). (Decision of trial judge indicating his concurrence in People v. Robb, supra.) 259 [9

People v. Barksdale, ___Cal.App. 3d__, __ Cal. Rptr. ___, 1 Crim. 9526 (Calif. Dist. Ct. App. July 22, 1971). (Decision of intermediate appellate court invalidating major portions of A.L.I.-type therapeutic abortion act, in particular a provision limiting abortions to hospitals accredited by the private Joint Commission on Accreditation of Hospitals.) 268-1 [

Shively v. Board of Medical Examiners, No. 590333 (Calif. Super. Ct. San Francisco Cnty., Sept. 24, 1968) (HYMAN, J.) on remand from 65 Cal. 2d 475, 421 P.2d 65, 55 Cal. Rptr. 217 (1968). (Decision of a trial judge that defendant physician was not guilty of performing criminal abortion under pre-1967 statute in performing therapeutic abortion in conformity with accepted medical practice on women who had contracted rebella. The court held that a woman's right to therapeutic abortion in these circumstances was protected by the Eighth and Fourteenth Amendments. The court also held that the state must prove that the exception ("necessary to preserve her life") had not been met.) 269

People v. Anast, No. 69-3429 (Ill. Cir. Ct. Cook Cnty., July 29, 1970) (DOLEZAL, J.) (Decision of trial judge holding Illinois anti-abortion statute unconstitutionally vague and in violation of a woman's right to privacy. The court also held that the indictment failed to state the crime of "soli- 275 tation" in alleging only that the defendant encouraged women to procure abortions.)

4. Commonwealth v. Page, No. 1968-353 (Pa. Ct. Comm. Pl., Centre Cnty., July 23, 1970) (CAMPBELL, J.). (Decision of a trial court holding Pennsylvania statute unconstitutional as violative of due process and equal protection standards of the Fourteenth Amendment and as an infringement of a woman's right to privacy.) 279

5. State v. Munson, No. 24949 (S. Dak. 7th Cir. Ct., Pennington Cnty., April 6, 1970) (COOPER, J.). (Decision of trial court holding South Dakota statute unconstitutionally vague and an invasion into private conduct unsupported by vital interests of the state.) 283

6. State v. Ketchum, (Mich. Dist. Ct., March 30, 1970) (REID, J.). (Decision of a trial judge holding Michigan anti-abortion law void for vagueness and in violation of the right to privacy.) 287

2) STATE LOWER COURT DECISIONS UPHOLDING ABORTION LAWS

7. State v. Hodgson, No. 23789 (Minn. Dist. Ct., Ramsey Cnty., June 29, 1970) (HACKEY, J.). (Decision of trial court upholding Minnesota anti-abortion statute in prosecution of a physician for performing a therapeutic abortion in a hospital. The court held that the state's interest in the fetus was sufficient to support the law.) 289

Commonwealth v. Brunelle, No. 83879 (Mass. Super. Ct., Middlesex Cnty., Dec. 1970) (MOYNIHAN, J.). (Decision of trial judge upholding the constitutionality of the Massachusetts anti-abortion statute. The court found no establishment of religion by the statute and no interference with the woman's right to privacy in light of the state's interest in the fetus.) 307

C – Consultant; B – Therapeutic Abortion Board; RA – Hospital Review Authority

*Non-Viable Fetus

[1] Abortion must be "performed in a hospital or other facility approved for the purpose by the Department of Health and Welfare or a hospital operated by the federal government or an agency of the federal government . . ." Abortion may not be performed unless "consent has been received from the parent or guardian of an unmarried woman less than 18 years of age . . ."

[2] Two-member abortion board required through the 12th week of pregnancy, three-member board thereafter

[3] The 16-week time limit applies to rape and incest only.

[4] After 20 weeks a pregnancy may be terminated to preserve the women's life or where the fetus is dead

[5] Residency requirement does not apply if the woman or her husband works in Delaware or if she has previously been a patient of a Delaware physician or if her life is in danger.

[6] "The affidavit [re residency] of such a woman shall be prima facie evidence of compliance with the requirement."

[7] Abortion must be done in a hospital "or other place as may be designated by law . . ."

[8] After 26 weeks a pregnancy may be terminated to preserve maternal life or when the fetus is dead.

[9] The statute prohibits "unlawful" abortion, or abortion which is "malicious" or performed "without lawful justification." Case law, however, sanctions abortion to preserve maternal life and protect maternal health. COMMONWEALTH V. WHEELER (1968).

[10] Statute does not specify whether forcible or statutory rape (or either) is meant.

[11] The statute forbids abortions done "maliciously or without lawful justification." Case laws provide that abortions are permitted at least to preserve the life of the woman. GLEITMAN V. COSGROVE (1967).

[12] After 24 weeks pregnancy may be terminated only to preserve women's life.

[13] "In determining whether or not there is substantial risk [to her physical or mental health] account may be taken of the mother's total environment, actual or reasonably foreseeable."

[14] The 150-day time limit does not apply in cases of danger to life.

[15] "Unlawful" abortion is proscribed but not defined.

[16] Residency may be proved by affidavit.

Second Tentative Draft
(Third Working Draft)

UNIFORM ABORTION ACT

SECTION 1. [Abortion defined; Prohibited; Exceptions.]

(a) "Abortion" means the intentional termination of human pregnancy other than by live birth.

(b) No abortion shall be performed in this state unless it is performed:

(1) by a physician licensed to practice medicine [or osteopathy] in this state or by a physician practicing medicine [or osteopathy] in the employ of the government of the United States or of this state, [and the abortion is performed in the physician's office or in a medical clinic, or in a hospital approved by the [Department of Health] or operated by the United States, this state or any department, agency, or political subdivision of either;] or

(2) by a female upon herself upon the advice of a licensed physician [; and in either case]

(3) within 24 weeks after the commencement of the pregnancy; or if after 24 weeks, the physician believes there is a substantial risk that continuance of the pregnancy would endanger the life of the mother or would gravely impair the physical or mental health of the mother, or that the child would be born with grave physical or mental defect, or that the pregnancy resulted from rape or incest, or illicit intercourse with a girl under 16 years of age.]

(c) Any person who violates this section is guilty of a [felony] and, upon conviction thereof, may be sentenced to pay a fine not exceeding [$1,000] or to imprisonment [in the state penitentiary] not exceeding [5 years], or both.

SECTION 2. [Uniformity of Interpretation]. This Act shall be construed to effectuate its general purpose to make uniform the law of those states which enact it.

SECTION 3. [Short Title.] This Act may be cited as the Uniform Abortion Act.

SECTION 4. [Severability.] If any provision of this Act or the application thereof to any person or circumstances is held invalid, the invalidity does not affect other provisions or applications of this Act which can be given effect without the invalid provision or application, and to this end the provisions of this Act are severable.

SECTION 5. [Repeal.] The following acts and parts of acts are repealed:

(3)

SECTION 6. [Time of Taking Effect.] This Act shall take effect _____.

Model Penal Code (Proposed Official Draft, 1962)

Section 230.3. Abortion.

(1) Unjustified Abortion. A person who purposely and unjustifiably terminates the pregnancy of another otherwise than by a live birth commits a felony of the third degree or, where the pregnancy has continued beyond the twenty-sixth week, a felony of the second degree.

(2) Justifiable Abortion. A licensed physician is justified in terminating a pregnancy if he believes there is substantial risk that continuance of the pregnancy would gravely impair the physical or mental health of the mother or that the child would be born with grave physical or mental defect, or that the pregnancy resulted from rape, incest, or other felonious intercourse. All illicit intercourse with a girl below the age of 16 shall be deemed felonious for purposes of this subsection. Justifiable abortions shall be performed only in a licensed hospital except in case of emergency when hospital facilities are unavailable. [Additional exceptions from the requirement of hospitalization may be incorporated here to take account of situations in sparsely settled areas where hospitals are not generally accessible.]

(3) Physicians' Certificates; Presumption from Non-Compliance. No abortion shall be performed unless two physicians, one of whom may be the person performing the abortion, shall have certified in writing the circumstances which they believe to justify the abortion. Such certificate shall be submitted before the abortion to the hospital where it is to be performed and, in the case of abortion following felonious intercourse, to the prosecuting attorney or the police. Failure to comply with any of the requirements of this Subsection gives rise to a presumption that the abortion was unjustified.

(4) Self-Abortion. A woman whose pregnancy has continued beyond the twenty-sixth week commits a felony of the third degree if she purposely terminates her own pregnancy otherwise than by a live birth, or if she uses instruments, drugs or violence upon herself for that purpose. Except as justified under Subsection (2), a person who induces or knowingly aids a woman to use instruments, drugs or violence upon herself for the purpose of terminating her pregnancy otherwise than by a live birth commits a felony of the third degree whether or not the pregnancy has continued beyond the twenty-sixth week.

(5) Pretended Abortion. A person commits a felony of the third degree if, representing that it is his purpose to perform an abortion, he does an act adapted to cause abortion in a pregnant woman although the woman is in fact not pregnant, or the actor does not believe she is. A person charged with unjustified abortion under Subsection (1) or an attempt to commit that offense may be convicted thereof upon proof of conduct prohibited by this Subsection.

(6) Distribution of Abortifacients. A person who sells, offers to sell, possesses with intent to sell, advertises, or displays for sale anything specially designed to terminate a pregnancy, or held out by the actor as useful for that purpose, commits a misdemeanor, unless:

(a) the sale, offer or display is to a physician or druggist or to an intermediary in a chain of distribution to physicians or druggists; or

(b) the sale is made upon prescription or order of a physician; or

(c) the possession is with intent to sell as authorized in paragraphs (a) and (b); or

(d) the advertising is addressed to persons named in paragraph (a) and confined to trade or professional channels not likely to reach the general public.

(7) Section Inapplicable to Prevention of Pregnancy. Nothing in this Section shall be deemed applicable to the prescription, administration or distribution of drugs or other substances for avoiding pregnancy, whether by preventing implantation of a fertilized ovum or by any other method that operates before, at or immediately after fertilization.

N. Y. Penal Law §125.05(3), at 79 (McKinney Supp.1970-1971)

* * * * *

3. "Justifiable abortional act." An abortional act is justifiable when committed upon a female with her consent by a duly licensed physician acting (a) under a reasonable belief that such is necessary to preserve her life, or, (b) within twenty-four weeks from the commencement of her pregnancy. A pregnant female's commission of an abortional act upon herself is justifiable when she acts upon the advice of a duly licensed physician (1) that such act is necessary to preserve her life, or, (2) within twenty-four weeks from the commencement of her pregnancy. The submission by a female to an abortional act is justifiable when she believes that it is being committed by a duly licensed physician, acting under a reasonable belief that such act is necessary to preserve her life, or, within twenty-four weeks from the commencement of her pregnancy.

As amended L.1970, c. 127, eff. July 1, 1970.

INTRODUCTORY NOTES

Article 42 was enacted by resolution of the Board of Health adopted on September 17, 1970 to provide public health standards of care in the performance of abortions, with proper regard for the health, safety and well-being of the patient. This article requires that abortions be performed only by physicians operating in a place or facility where there is qualified supervision in obstetrics or surgery, and where equipment, staff and facilities are provided to handle hemorrhage, shock, cardiac arrest and other emergencies, as well as to apply aseptic procedures. The article further protects the health of the patient by providing that abortions performed on women pregnant 12 weeks or less may be performed on an ambulatory basis; that pregnancies of longer duration or those involving medical, surgical, gynecological or psychiatric conditions, or complications occurring during or after the abortion, require inpatient facilities. The article also requires that family planning services should be made available to patients.

The article follows the enactment of a new abortion law (Chapter 127, Laws of 1970, effective July 1, 1970) by the State Legislature. The new law amended subdivision 3 of Section 125.05 of the State Penal Law to generally provide that an abortion performed within twenty-four weeks from the commencement of pregnancy by a physician with the consent of the pregnant female shall be a justifiable abortional act and, therefore, not subject to criminal prosecution under related provisions of the Penal Law.

§ 42.01 Definitions

When used in this article:

(a) Abortion service means a place or facility in which abortions are performed.

(b) Hospital means a hospital as defined in Section 700.2 (5) of the State Hospital Code.

(c) Affiliated abortion service means an abortion service which is located within a total transport time of ten minutes from a hospital with which such service has a written affiliation agreement for the treatment of its patients requiring care on an inpatient basis.

(d) Total transport time means the total elapsed time between the diagnosis, at an affiliated abortion service, of a complication requiring emergency care and the delivery of the patient and the transfer of responsibility for the patient's care to appropriate medical personnel at a hospital.

(e) Unaffiliated abortion service means an abortion service which is not located in a hospital and is not an affiliated abortion service.

(f) Qualified obstetrician means:

(1) A licensed physician who is a diplomate of the American Board of Obstetrics and Gynecology, or who submits evidence to the Department that his training and experience qualify him for admission to the examination by such Board; or,

(2) A licensed physician who is a fellow of the American College of Surgeons in the specialty of obstetrics and gynecology; or,

(3) A licensed physician who has the rank of associate attending obstetrician or higher at a voluntary or municipal hospital approved for residency training in obstetrics by the Council on Medical Education and Hospitals of the American Medical Association; or,

(4) A licensed physician who has the rank of assistant professor of obstetrics or gynecology or higher in a medical school approved by the Board of Regents of the University of the State of New York; or,

(5) A Doctor of Osteopathy who holds a license to practice medicine in the State of New York and who is certified by the American College of Osteopathic Obstetricians and Gynecologists, or who submits evidence to the Department that his training and experience qualify him for admission to the examination by such Board, or who submits evidence of completion of a residency in obstetrics and gynecology.

(g) Qualified surgeon means:

(1) A licensed physician who is a diplomate of the American Board of Surgery, or who submits evidence to the Department that his training and experience qualify him for admission to the examination by such Board; or

(2) A licensed physician who is a fellow of the American College of Surgeons; or

(3) A licensed physician who has the rank of associate attending surgeon or higher at an accredited voluntary or governmental hospital.

(h) Registered professional nurse means a person who is registered as a registered professional nurse by the State Department of Education pursuant to Article 139 of the Education Law.

NOTES: This section is new. It was enacted by resolution adopted on September 17, 1970.

§ 42.03 Requirements and standards

An abortion shall be performed in an abortion service operated in accordance with the provisions of this article and related provisions of this Code.

NOTES: This section is new. It was enacted by resolution adopted on September 17, 1970.

§ 42.05 Filing of staff and service regulations

An abortion service shall be maintained in accordance with a set of formal standards which define the professional qualifications of its obstetric, gynecological, surgical, nursing and administrative staff, and which govern the conduct of the service. These standards shall be prepared by the physician in charge of such service and a copy of such standards and any change or modification thereof shall be filed with the Department.

NOTES: This section is new. It was enacted by resolution adopted on September 17, 1970.

§ 42.07 Records and reports; inspection

(a) An abortion service shall keep records including admission and discharge notes, histories, results of tests and examinations, nurse's work sheets, social service records and other progress notes of patients, and it shall submit such records to the Department when the Department shall so require.

(b) An abortion service shall prepare reports which shall be submitted to the Department when it shall so require. Such reports shall include the number of:

(1) Patients requesting abortions;

(2) Patients on whom abortions were performed according to the period of gestation and method of termination of pregnancy;

(3) Patients for whom abortions were refused and the reasons therefor; and

(4) Patients referred to other abortion services.

NOTES: This section is new. It was enacted by resolution adopted on September 17, 1970.

§ 42.09 Compliance with Title V, Vital Statistics

Abortion services shall comply with applicable requirements of Title V of this Code.

NOTES: This section is new. It was enacted by resolution adopted on September 17, 1970.

§ 42.11 Facilities, equipment and supplies generally

Facilities, equipment and supplies in an abortion service shall be maintained in proper working order. Necessary solutions, drugs and medications shall be supplied and maintained pursuant to related provisions of Article 75. Knee or foot controlled sinks shall be provided in or immediately adjacent to the room where the abortion is performed. The abortion service facilities and equipment shall be maintained in a clean and sanitary condition.

NOTES: This section is new. It was enacted by resolution adopted on September 17, 1970.

§ 42.13 Transportation facilities for affiliated service

An affiliated abortion service shall have immediately available organized transportation facilities capable of insuring that a patient requiring emergency care at the hospital with which such service is affiliated will be transported to such hospital within the total transport time of ten minutes.

NOTES: This section is new. It was enacted by resolution adopted on September 17, 1970.

§ 42.15 Elevators

Any building of more than one story in height and of which an abortion service is a part shall be provided with an elevator for the use of non-ambulatory abortion patients. The elevator shall be of sufficient size to accommodate a standard stretcher. When a non-ambulatory abortion patient is moved from one floor to another, she shall be accompanied by attending medical or nursing personnel.

NOTES: This section is new. It was enacted by resolution adopted on September 17, 1970.

§ 42.17 Admission and examination facilities

An abortion service shall provide facilities for registration, medical evaluation, examination and referral, equipped with suitable furnishings and accommodations, including waiting and dressing rooms and other appurtenances for the physical comfort and convenience of patients and personnel. Sufficient, suitably equipped examining rooms shall be provided for the daily caseload. Nothing contained herein shall prohibit registration, interviewing, history-taking, medical examination and appropriate referral from being conducted in an existing prenatal, gynecology and/or family planning clinic.

NOTES: This section is new. It was enacted by resolution adopted on September 17, 1970.

§ 42.19 Laboratory facilities

(a) An unaffiliated abortion service or an abortion service located in a hospital shall have on its premises a blood bank maintained and operated pursuant to the requirements of Articles 17 and 19, a clinical laboratory maintained pursuant to Article 13 of this Code, and an X-ray laboratory which meets the requirements of Article 175. The clinical laboratory shall be qualified to perform urinalysis, hematocrit and other hematological tests including cross-matching and determinations of blood group and Rh type. The examination of surgically removed tissue, tests for pregnancy, and infrequently performed tests, or those not included within specialties or subspecialties stated on its permit, or those requiring specialized equipment and skill, may be forwarded to another laboratory approved by the Department.

(b) The affiliation agreement of an affiliated abortion service shall include provision for use in the hospital of those facilities required in subsection (a). However, the affiliated abortion service shall have on its premises such facilities as are necessary to perform clinical tests specified in the agreement.

NOTES: This section is new. It was enacted by resolution adopted on September 17, 1970.

§ 42.21 Operating facilities

(a) An unaffiliated abortion service or an abortion service located in a hospital shall have available on its premises a standard operating room capable of accommodating abdominal as well as vaginal surgical procedures. An affiliated abortion service shall include in its affiliation agreement provision for the use of a standard operating room in the treatment of its patients requiring care on an innatient basis.

(b) For abortions specified in Section 42.35(a), existing outpatient operating facilities may be utilized or new outpatient operating facilities created, if the policies established by the physician in charge of the abortion service and the patient load warrant. If it is found necessary to add to existing outpatient operating facilities, a standard sized treatment room may be converted to an operating facility.

(c) All rooms in which abortions are performed shall be adequately equipped, supplied and staffed and shall include the following in addition to the instruments and equipment needed for the performance of abortions.

(1) Anesthesia equipment and such other equipment as is necessary to treat patients for hemorrhage, shock, cardiac arrest, and other emergencies.

(2) In an unaffiliated abortion service or an abortion service located in a hospital an adequate supply of drugs, compatible whole blood, blood fractions, blood concentrates, plasma expanders and parenteral fluids immediately available at all times with appropriate refrigeration equipment therefor; in an affiliated abortion service an adequate supply of drugs, plasma expanders and parenteral fluids shall be available at all times with appropriate refrigeration equipment therefor;

(3) Dressing room and scrub-up facilities which are suitably located;

(4) A utility room with facilities for sterilization of bedpan and enema equipment.

(5) A utility room with facilities for sterilization of supplies, except in an abortion service which receives sterile supplies from a central supply service.

(d) The operating facilities and equipment shall be constructed and maintained so as to be free from sanitary hazards and safety hazards likely to cause a fire or explosion.

(e) Environmental controls to prevent infection, including the control of personnel and patient traffic, shall be maintained in the operating facilities.

NOTES: This section is new. It was enacted by resolution adopted on September 17, 1970.

§ 42.23 Recovery room or rooms

An adequately sized and separate recovery room or rooms in proximity to the operating facilities shall be provided. The recovery room shall contain adequate monitoring equipment, suction oxygen and other related equipment. Such room shall be staffed by qualified nursing personnel. An adequate number of recovery beds and/or rooms shall be provided to insure a minimum of three (3) hours for the recovery of each patient.

NOTES: This section is new. It was enacted by resolution adopted on September 17, 1970.

§ 42.25 Staff; physician in charge of abortion service; duties

(a) An abortion service shall be staffed so as to provide on the premises adequate medical, nursing, and ancillary personnel.

(b) The abortion service shall be supervised by a physician in charge who shall be a qualified obstetrician or, in a service which does not have a qualified obstetrician, by a qualified surgeon.

(c) The physician in charge of the abortion service shall be responsible for:

(1) Setting the policies and procedures pertaining to abortions and the implementation thereof; and

(2) Designating a licensed physician or physicians whom he deems qualified to supervise directly the care of all patients undergoing abortion, including their post-operative care and follow-up.

(3) Establishing standards for the observation of patients by nursing personnel during the post-operative period.

(d) A physician shall be present on the premises of the abortion service at all times during the operative and post-operative period.

NOTES: This section is new. It was enacted by resolution adopted on September 17, 1970.

§ 42.27 Staff; nursing supervision of abortion patients

(a) At least one registered professional nurse with post-graduate education or experience in obstetric or gynecologic nursing shall supervise and direct the nursing personned and care and shall be on duty in an abortion service at all times while in use.

(b) Student nurses, practical nurses, attendants and other ancillary personnel assigned to give nursing care in an abortion service shall be adequately trained in observational and emergency techniques for pre-operative and post-operative care of abortion patients and shall be supervised by registered professional nurses.

NOTES: This section is new. It was enacted by resolution adopted on September 17, 1970.

§ 42.29 Staff; social service

An abortion service shall have a social service unit available to serve its patients adequately.

NOTES: This section is new. It was enacted by resolution adopted on September 17, 1970.

§ 42.31 Admission and examination procedures

(a) Every woman seeking to terminate her pregnancy shall be registered as expeditiously as possible and, whenever possible, on the same day of registration she shall be seen by a physician and staff for history-taking, physical examination and necessary laboratory tests.

(b) If the patient cannot be accepted for registration and examination within a reasonable period of time, the abortion service shall refer her to an appropriate resource or to a central registry, and shall make every effort to secure treatment for her.

(c) Pregnancy testing should be available at the patient initial visit and may precede actual registration. The result and type of pregnancy test shall be available to the examining physician before the performance of the abortion. The diagnosis of pregnancy shall be the responsibility of the examining physician.

(d) A complete medical history shall be obtained and the physical examination shall be complete and not confined solely to a pelvic examination. The following laboratory tests shall be performed on every patient; hematocrit, complete urinalysis, blood grouping and Rh typing. The blood specimen used for blood grouping and typing shall be retained by the blood bank in the event a cross-matching test for transfusion is required.

(e) Interviewing and counseling by social service staff shall be made available to patients before and after abortions are performed.

(f) Family planning counseling by such personnel as may be prescribed by the physician in charge of the service shall be made available to patients before and after abortions are performed.

(g) Where medical evaluation, examination and referral are made from a private physician's office, hospital, clinic or other abortion service pertinent records thereof shall be made available at the time the patient is registered and admitted to the abortion service. Proper policies and procedures for coordination or referral from various sources shall be established by the physician in charge of the abortion service and adhered to by all members of the staff.

(h) There shall be an interval of not less than two days between initial examination and termination of pregnancy to permit the reporting to and review of all laboratory tests by the examining physician and to permit and encourage thorough consideration and a firm decision by the patient regarding termination of pregnancy. No patient shall be coerced in any manner by the staff of the abortion service in arriving at her decision.

NOTES: This section is new. It was enacted by resolution adopted on September 17, 1970.

§ 42.33 Operative and post-operative requirements

(a) Abortions on patients with a gestation up to and including twelve weeks as determined by the physician may be performed on an ambulatory basis if the patient's medical condition permits.

(b) The following patients shall be treated on an inpatient basis for the abortion:

(1) Patients pregnant more than twelve weeks as determined by the physician;

(2) Patients having such medical, surgical, gynecological or psychiatric conditions or complications as specified in the rules of the chief of staff of the abortion service and filed with the Department pursuant to Section 42.05; and

(3) Patients having a sterilization procedure immediately following the abortion.

(c) Only physicians shall be permitted to perform abortions. Termination of pregnancies involving more than twenty weeks gestation shall not be performed by the physician without appropriate medical consultation.

(d) Where general or local anesthesia is administered to abortion patients it shall be administered pursuant to the requirements of Section 41.61.

(e) Pathologic examination of all tissue removed from the uterus shall be performed routinely.

(f) Patients shall receive the following post-operative care:

(1) Patients whose pregnancy was terminated on an ambulatory basis shall be observed in the abortion service for a reasonable number of hours, not less than three, to ensure that no immediate post-operative complications are present and thereafter such patients may be discharged if their course has been uneventful;

(2) Patients in whom any adverse condition exists or in whom a complication is known or suspected to have occurred during or after the performance of the abortion shall remain in the abortion service or the back-up hospital for a minimum of twenty-four hours.

(g) Written instructions shall be issued to all patients in accordance with the rules of the physician in charge of the abortion service and shall include the following:

(1) Symptoms of complications to be looked for;

(2) Activities to be avoided;

(3) Specific telephone number to be used by the patient should any complication occur or question arise;

(4) Date for follow-up or return visit after the performance of the abortion, which shall be scheduled within two to six weeks as indicated by the condition of the patient; and

(5) Information on the availability of family planning services when desired by the patient. When, in the opinion of the physician it is in the best interests of the patient, family planning services may be initiated, with the consent of the patient, prior to leaving the abortion service.

NOTES: This section is new. It was enacted by resolution adopted on September 17, 1970.

§ 42.35 Modification by Board

When the strict applicability of any provision of this article presents practical difficulties or unusual hardships, the Board, in a specific instance, may modify the application of such provision consistent with the general purpose of this article and upon such condition as are necessary, in the opinion of the Board to protect the health of abortion patients.

NOTES: This section is new. It was enacted by resolution adopted on September 17, 1970.

Resolved further, that this resolution shall take effect immediately.

Item No. 6

Rev. Code Wash. Ann., tit. 9, §§9.02.060 to 9.02.090 (Supp.1970) (Laws 1970, c.3):

§9.02.060. Neither the Termination by a physician licensed under Chapters 18.71 or 18.57 RCW of the pregnancy of a woman not quick with child nor the prescribing, supplying or administering of any medicine, drug or substance to or the use of any instrument or other means on, such woman by a physician so licensed, nor the taking of any medicine, drug or substance or the use or submittal to the use of any instrument or other means by such a woman when following the directions of a physician so licensed, with the intent to terminate such pregnancy, shall be deemed unlawful acts within the meaning of this act.

§9.02.070. A pregnancy of a woman not quick with child and not more than four lunar months after conception may be lawfully terminated under this act only: (a) with her prior consent and, if married and residing with her husband or unmarried and under the age of eighteen years, with the prior consent of her husband or legal guardian, respectively; (b) if the woman has resided in this state for at least ninety days prior to the date of termination; and (c) in a hospital accredited by the Joint Commission on Accreditation of Hospitals or at a medical facility approved for that purpose by the State Board of Health, which facility meets standards prescribed by regulations to be issued by the State Board of Health for the safe and adequate care and treatment of patients: PROVIDED, that if a physician determines that termination is immediately necessary to meet the medical emergency the pregnancy may be terminated elsewhere. Any physician who violates this section of this 1970 act or any regulation of the State Board of Health issued under authority of this section shall be guilty of a gross misdemeanor.

§9.02.080. No hospital, physician, nurse, hospital employee nor any other person shall be under any duty, by law or contract, nor shall such hospital or person in any circumstances be required, to participate in a termination of pregnancy if such hospital or person objects to such termination. No such person shall be discriminated against in employment or professional privileges because he so objects.

§9.02.090. If any provision of this act, or its application to any person or circumstance, is held invalid, the remainder of the act, or the application of the provision to other persons or circumstances, is not affected.

Item No. 7

ABORTION REGULATIONS ADOPTED

BY THE WASHINGTON STATE BOARD OF HEALTH

DECEMBER 10, 1970

WAC 248-140

Section 010 PURPOSE. It is the purpose of the Washington State Board of Health to establish guidelines to assure the safe and adequate care of patients undergoing termination of pregnancy, by means of rules and regulations setting standards for medical facilities at which pregnancies are terminated, in accordance with Chapter 3, Laws of 1970.

Section 020 DEFINITIONS. Unless the context clearly indicates otherwise, the following terms, whenever used in this chapter, shall be deemed to have the following meanings:

(1) "Board" means the Washington State Board of Health.

(2) "Department" means the Washington State Department of Social and Health Services, which shall serve as agent of the board.

(3) "Secretary" means the secretary of the Department of Social and Health Services or his designee or authorized representative.

(4) "Certificate of Approval" means a certificate issued in behalf of the board by the department to a facility approved for the performance of abortion procedures.

(5) "Clean" when used in reference to a room or area means space and/or equipment for storage and handling of supplies and/or equipment which are in a sanitary or sterile condition.

(6) "Facility" means any institution, place, building or agency or portion thereof in which an abortion procedure is performed.

(7) "Physician" means a doctor of medicine or a doctor of osteopathy duly licensed in the state of Washington.

(8) "Physical barrier" means a partition or similar space divider designed to prevent splash or spray between room areas.

(9) "Recovery unit" means a room or rooms for the segregation and close or continuous observation and care of patients immediately following an abortion procedure.

(10) "Soiled" when used in reference to a room or area, means space and equipment for collection and/or cleaning of used or contaminated supplies and equipment and/or collection and/or disposal of wastes.

Section 030 APPLICABILITY OF THESE RULES AND REGULATIONS. These standards, rules and regulations apply to any facility which is not an accredited hospital as set forth in Chapter 3, Laws of 1970, in which any drug, substance, instrument, or other means is administered or used to terminate the pregnancy of a woman, except that Section 12 shall apply to all accredited hospitals.

Section 040 CERTIFICATE OF APPROVAL REQUIRED. No person shall establish, maintain, or operate a facility in which any means are employed or actions taken for the purpose of terminating the pregnancy of a woman without a certificate of approval from the department: PROVIDED, that this provision shall not apply to accredited hospitals as set forth in Chapter 3, Laws of 1970.

Section 050 APPLICATION FOR CERTIFICATE OF APPROVAL. An application for a certificate of approval may be made to the department by nonaccredited, licensed hospitals and all other facilities upon forms provided by the department and shall contain such information as the department reasonably requires and which may include affirmative evidence of ability to comply with these standards, rules and regulations. An application for renewal of license shall be made to the department upon forms provided by it and submitted thirty days prior to the date of expiration of the certificate of approval.

Section 060 ISSUANCE, DURATION AND ASSIGNMENT OF CERTIFICATE OF APPROVAL. (1) Upon receipt of an application for a certificate of approval, the department shall issue a certificate of approval if the applicant and the facility meet the requirements, standards, rules and regulations established herein. Each certificate of approval shall be issued for the premises and persons named in the application and no certificate of approval shall be transferrable or assignable.

(2) If there be failure to comply with the standards, rules and regulations, the secretary may, when, in his judgment, the well-being and safety of patients would not be jeopardized, issue to an applicant for an initial or renewed certificate of approval, a provisional certificate of approval which will permit the operation of the facility for a specific, determined period of time. A provisional certificate of approval may be issued only when, after thorough investigation, it has been determined that time can be allowed for the facility to correct existing deficiencies without placing in jeopardy the safety or health of women who receive services for the termination of pregnancy. In no case shall provisional approval exceed six months without review and sanction by the secretary.

Section 070 FORM OF APPLICATION FOR CERTIFICATE OF APPROVAL AND INSPECTION. The secretary shall prescribe the form upon which applications for approval shall be made, shall prior to the approval, within a reasonable time after application, evaluate the findings of inspections and issue a certificate of approval if the findings demonstrate conformity to the law and to these rules and regulations. A certificate of approval shall be valid immediately and for twelve months following the first day of the month following issuance, unless revoked for cause, and may be renewable. The secretary shall have access at any reasonable time, to the premises for which approval has been requested or has been issued, for purposes of ascertaining conformance to the law or to these rules and regulations.

Section 080 PROCEDURE UPON DENIAL OF APPLICATION FOR CERTIFICATE. Applicants denied approval shall have recourse to review of the decision of the secretary in conformance with the Administrative Procedure Act.

Section 090 HOSPITAL FACILITIES APPROVED FOR TERMINATING PREGNANCY. A hospital facility approved for the purpose of terminating a pregnancy lawfully shall be:

(1) A hospital accredited by the Joint Commission on Accreditation of Hospitals; or

(2) Any other hospital licensed under chapter 70.41 RCW: PROVIDED, That such licensed hospital meets, at a minimum, the standards set forth in these regulations with the exception of Section 10 (1), (8), and (9).

Section 100 NON-HOSPITAL FACILITIES APPROVED FOR TERMINATING PREGNANCY. Any facility not an integral organizational part of an accredited or licensed hospital and not located within its premises, must meet the following requirements to be approved for termination of pregnancy.

(1) Has an agreement with an accredited or licensed hospital for medical consultation and for the transfer of patients in need of immediate hospitalization because of medical emergencies such as hemorrage, shock, perforation or infection, and is located so that it would ordinarily be practical to transport a patient from the outpatient facility to a hospital in ten minutes or less.

Has a surgical operating room with a minimum dimension of at least ten feet and a minimum area of at least one hundred and twenty square feet; which must be well-lighted, with adequate illumination; with a suction outlet or suction machine, an oxygen outlet or oxygen tank, intravenous stand, a resucitator, storage for surgical supplies, and equipment for collection of surgical linens and wastes.

Has adequate facilities available for patients for short periods of rest and recuperation and due regard to the patient's dignity and privacy.

Has sufficient sanitary toilet facilities for patients within the premises of the facility.

Has a soiled area which includes a clinic service sink, a work-counter, a double compartment sink, storage cabinet and adequate space for linen hampers and waste containers. Soiled areas shall be separated from clean areas by a physical barrier.

Has an autoclave, with a recording thermometer, of sufficient size to accomodate medical supplies and equipment to be sterilized. If the practice of sterilizing unwrapped trays of instruments and other equipment is followed, the autoclave must be located to provide direct access to the operating room from the autoclave. The autoclave may be in either a clean or soiled room area wherein the arrangement and workflow is such that separation of contaminated items from sterile items is maintained.

There shall be sufficient storage units and clean areas to provide for storage of linens, drugs, anesthesia, solutions, instruments, utensils and other clean or sterile supplies and equipment.

No pregnancy more than ten weeks after conception may be terminated in such a facility.

Flammable anesthesia shall not be used in any terminations.

) Each patient receiving services within the facility shall be under the care of a physician. Administration of anesthesia to the patient shall be by a physician or a certified registered nurse anesthetist.

(11) A patient who has undergone a procedure which is producing hemorrhage, shock, respiratory depression or other serious complication shall be transferred to a hospital, when in the judgment of the attending physician, it is deemed medically feasible. All other patients shall be retained in a recovery unit for a period of observation and care until it has been determined that the patient's condition has stabilized to a point where she may be released without jeopardy to her health and safety.

(12) The secretary may modify or exempt an applicant from one or more of the requirements of this section when in his judgment, the well-being and safety of patients would not be jeopardized thereby: PROVIDED, That such action is taken only after thorough inspection and evaluation of all relevant circumstances and conditions.

Section 110 DISCLOSURE OF INFORMATION. Information received by the board or the department through filed reports, inspections or as otherwise authorized, shall not be disclosed publicly in such a manner as to identify any individual without her consent, except by subpoena, nor in such manner as to identify any facility except in a proceeding involving issues of certificates of approval.

Section 120 REPORTING OF PREGNANCY TERMINATIONS. In order for the board and the department to evaluate the effect of the board's rules and regulations in assuring safe and adequate care and treatment of patients, each hospital where lawful abortions are performed in accordance with chapter 3, Laws of 1970, and these rules and regulations shall, on forms prescribed and supplied by the secretary, report to the department during the following month the number and dates of abortions performed during the previous month, giving for each abortion the age and marital status of the patients, the duration of the pregnancy, the method of abortion, any complications such as perforations, infections, and incomplete evacuations, the name of the physician performing the abortion and such other relevant information as may be required by the secretary. All physicians performing abortions in other facilities approved for that purpose shall report in the same manner. All physicians performing abortions in non-approved facilities, when the physician has determined that termination of the pregnancy was immediately necessary to meet a medical emergency shall also report in the same manner, and shall additionally provide a clear and detailed statement of the facts upon which he based his judgment of medical emergency.

POLICY ON ABORTION

Policies covering abortions should be designed by the medical staff to safeguard the patient's health or improve her family life situation. They should have due regard for local legal statutes and judicial decrees. Abortion should only be performed in facilities that are administered by a hospital approved by the Joint Commission on Accreditation of Hospitals and/or licensed by a state or province.

It is recognized that abortion may be performed at a patient's request, or upon a physician's recommendation. No physician should be required to perform, nor should any patient be forced to accept an abortion.

When abortion is requested by a patient, the request should be obtained in writing from the patient, or, in the case of a minor, from her parent or guardian. The patient should be informed of the medical nature of the procedure and of its potential consequences. When abortion is recommended by a physician, the indications should be stated in the patient's record, and informed consent obtained from the patient and her husband, or herself if she is unmarried, or from her nearest relative or guardian if she is under the age of consent. When abortion is requested by a patient, a consultation is not necessary. When abortion is recommended by a physician, the indication for the procedure should be approved by a consultant knowledgeable in regard to the condition thought to indicate abortion.

Abortion is an operative procedure and should only be performed: (1) by a physician who has hospital privileges for the care of obstetric-gynecologic patients and (2) in a hospital-facility adequately equipped to care properly for unexpected complications.

In order to assure that adequate facilities will be available for indicated care of other obstetric-gynecologic patients in some communities, consideration should be given by hospitals to (1) providing a room or entirely separate facilities where abortion can be performed with minimal disruption of other hospital procedures and the hospital based educational program, and (2) utilizing hospital personnel who volunteer to care for patients admitted to be aborted.

RECOMMENDED STANDARDS FOR ABORTION SERVICES

I. INTRODUCTION:

Since 1967, 15 states have responded to the increasing public demand for changes in the legal restriction of abortion practice by passing new laws. Moreover, at least 14 states have had the constitutionality of their abortion laws challenged in court. Public health agencies must be prepared, therefore, to respond to an increasing need for abortion services.

Abortion services are an integral part of comprehensive family planning and maternal and child health care. As such, abortion and contraceptive counseling and services should be available together.

Contraception should be encouraged as a means of minimizing the need for abortion. Counseling and services for abortion and contraception should receive full administrative and financial support as part of maternal and child health programs.

When there is a large demand for a service that is in limited supply, a situation exists in which human needs can be exploited for economic gain. The public interest requires that health agencies recognize this fact and make very effort to provide safe, accessible abortion services at reasonable fees for all who are in need of such services.

I. SPECIFIC RECOMMENDATIONS:

A. Referral and Counseling

1. Abortion referral services should be available through state and local health departments, in collaboration with medical societies and voluntary agencies. These services should make both private and public care known and available to women seeking abortion.

2. Counseling is an integral part of abortion services. The manner in which referral and counseling are carried out plays a major role in determining whether the abortion patient is treated in a safe, humane and dignified manner, and protected against exploitation.

3. The APHA therefore recommends the following five standards:

   a. Rapid and simple abortion referral must be readily available through state and local public health departments, medical societies, or other nonprofit organizations.

   b. An important function of counseling should be to simplify and expedite the provision of abortion services; it should not delay the obtaining of these services.

   c. Psychiatric consultation should not be mandatory. As in the case of other specialized medical services psychiatric consultation should be sought for definite indications and not on a routine basis.

d. A wide range of individuals from appropriately trained, sympathetic volunteers to highly skilled physicians may qualify as abortion counselors.

e. Contraception and/or sterilization should be discussed with each abortion patient.

B. Public Education

Education about abortion procedures and services is a public responsibility. Public health agencies should take a leadership role in providing information to the public. They should educate the public so that there is a general awareness of the current status concerning a woman's legal right to abortion, and so that women desiring abortion know of the circumstances under which this procedure is most safely performed. The importance of having an abortion before the end of the third month of pregnancy should be stressed as a safety factor to every woman at risk of pregnancy who might want to have a pregnancy terminated. Effective education in contraceptive use is an essential part of an abortion service program and will help women seeking abortion to minimize subsequent unwanted pregnancies.

C. Surgical Care

1. While comprehensive information is not available on all factors determining the risks to life and health associated with the performance of an abortion, three such factors are recognized as important:

a. the skill of the physician,

b. the environment in which the abortion is performed, and above all

c. the duration of pregnancy, as determined by uterine size and confirmed by menstrual history.

It stands to reason that the risks to a woman having an abortion are smaller when in the hands of a well-trained obstetrician-gynecologist than in the hands of a physician with little training or experience. It is also clear that a well equipped hospital offers a wider range of specialized personnel and equipment to cope with unforeseen difficulties than an office or clinic without such resources. It has been abundantly documented that risks to life and health increase steeply with each additional week of gestation. The factor of gestational age is of overriding importance.

2. The APHA recommends therefore that abortions in the second trimester and early abortions in the presence of pre-existing medical complications be performed in hospitals as in-patient procedures.

3. For pregnancies prior to the end of the 12th week, as measured by gestational size, abortion in the hospital with or without overnight stay is probably the safest practice. The performance of abortions in an extramural treatment facility, however, is an acceptable alternative to abortion in a hospital provided arrangements exist in advance to admit patients promptly if unforeseen complications develop. Standards for any abortion facility should include the following essentials:

a. An operating table, or conventional gynecologic examining table with accessories, which is located in a room which is adequately lighted and ventilated and meets all other environmental standards for surgical procedures.

b. Surgical instruments sufficient in number to permit individual sterilization for each patient and which are adequate to perform conventional cervical dilatation and curettage, and electrically safe equipment for vacuum aspiration.

c. Drugs, parenteral fluid and electrolyte solutions (including plasma volume expander) in sufficient supply for emergency use.

d. Anesthesia equipment, including oxygen and equipment for artificial ventilation and administration of anesthetic gases, and resuscitation equipment.

e. Capability to transfer a patient immediately to an operating room in a hospital.

f. Supporting laboratory equipment and personnel, or immediate access to same, for preoperative and emergency laboratory determinations.

g. Special arrangements for patient emergency care including diagnostic and therapeutic contacts for postoperative follow-up on examination.

4. The APHA is concerned with the high prices charged for abortions in many areas and with the inadequate coverage of these services by Medicaid and private insurance carriers, and by the fact that in many places the burden of performing abortions appears to fall on a minority of physicians. The APHA feels that qualified physicians who do not have religious or philosophic objections to abortions are professionally obliged to make their services available at a reasonable cost.

5. The APHA is also concerned with the hostile and punitive attitudes toward women seeking abortion which are manifested by some members of the health professions and ancillary personnel. Women in need of abortion frequently have requirements for counseling, health education, tenderness, and understanding that are even greater than those of other patients.

6. At present, abortions should be performed by physicians or osteopaths who are licensed to practice in their state.

Abortions performed in hospitals should be carried out with adherence to the policies established by the chief of the hospital staff or his delegate.

7. Physicians doing abortions should have adequate training. Such training should be available to all physicians doing abortions. Abortion training should be a part of medical school education and residency training in obstetrics and gynecology and family practice.

8. New developments in the delivery of abortion services and techniques need to be explored in a way that is consonant with the same safeguards which govern all other research involving human subjects.

D. Reporting

1. Reporting of abortions performed is essential to planning for, providing, and improving abortion services. State health departments should assume the responsibility for collecting abortion reports, delegating the responsibility and authority to local health departments when appropriate. The collection of state data nationally is essential to national health planning by the federal government.

2. Confidentiality is essential to abortion reporting. Medical records must identify individuals, but reports to state and local health departments need not do so.

3. The following items are recommended for inclusion in an abortion reporting system:

   a. Date of abortion.

   b. Place of abortion (city and state).

   c. Type of facility (hospital, extramural clinic, doctor's office, other).

   d. Gestational age.

   e. Age of woman.

   f. Ethnic group.

   g. Technique of abortion.

   h. Type of care (inpatient, outpatient).

   i. Residence of woman.

   j. Number of prior pregnancies.

   k. Number of prior deliveries (20 weeks or more) (live birth + fetal deaths).

   l. Number of prior abortions (under 20 weeks)- spontaneous or induced.

   m. Marital status.

   n. Education (years of schooling).

ABORTION

The AMA policy regarding abortion as determined by its House of Delegates, June 25, 1970 is:

> Whereas, Abortion, like any other medical procedure, should not be performed when contrary to the best interests of the patient since good medical practice requires due consideration for the patient's welfare and not mere acquiescence to the patient's demands; and
>
> Whereas, The standards of sound clinical judgment, which together with informed patient consent should be determinative according to the merits of each individual case; therefore be it
>
> Resolved, That abortion is a medical procedure and should be performed only by a duly licensed physician and surgeon in an accredited hospital after consultation with two other physicians chosen becuase of their professional competency, acting only in conformance with standards of good medical practice and within the Medical Practice Act of his State; and be it further
>
> Resolved, That no physician or other professional personnel shall be compelled to perform any act which violates his good medical judgment. Neither physician, hospital, nor hospital personnel shall be required to perform any act violative of personally-held moral principles. In these circumstances good medical practice requires only that the physician or other professional personnel withdraw from the case so long as the withdrawal is consistent with good medical practice.

The AMA's Judicial Council said:

> "The Judicial Council is charged with interpreting the Principles of Medical Ethics as adopted by the House of Delegates of the AMA.
>
> The Principles of Medical Ethics of the AMA do not prohibit a physician from performing an abortion that is performed in accordance with good medical practice and under circumstances that do not violate the laws of the community in which he practices.
>
> In the matter of abortions, as of any other medical procedure, the Judicial Council becomes involved whenever there is alleged violation of the Principles of Medical Ethics as established by the House of Delegates."

Item No. 11

TEXT OF THE CONSTITUTION OF THE WORLD HEALTH ORGANIZATION

THE STATES Parties to this Constitution declare, in conformity with the Charter of the United Nations, that the following principles are basic to the happiness, harmonious relations and security of all peoples:

Health is a state of complete physical, mental and social well-being and not merely the absence of disease or infirmity.

The enjoyment of the highest attainable standard of health is one of the fundamental rights of every human being without distinction of race, religion, political belief, economic or social condition.

The health of all peoples is fundamental to the attainment of peace and security and is dependent upon the fullest co-operation of individuals and States.

The achievement of any State in the promotion and protection of health is of value to all. Unequal development in different countries in the promotion of health and control of disease, especially communicable disease, is a common danger.

Healthy development of the child is of basic importance; the ability to live harmoniously in a changing total environment is essential to such development.

The extension to all peoples of the benefits of medical, psychological and related knowledge is essential to the fullest attainment of health.

Informed opinion and active co-operation on the part of the public are of the utmost importance in the improvement of the health of the people.

Governments have a responsibility for the health of their peoples which can be fulfilled only by the provision of adequate health and social measures.

ACCEPTING THESE PRINCIPLES, and for the purpose of co-operation among themselves and with others to promote and protect the health of all peoples, the Contracting Parties agree to the present Constitution and hereby establish the World Health Organization as a specialized agency within the terms of Article 57 of the Charter of the United Nations.

FEDERAL AND STATE COURT DECISIONS

SUPREME COURT OF THE UNITED STATES

No. 84.—October Term, 1970

United States, Appellant, v. Milan Vuitch.	On Appeal From the United States District Court for the District of Columbia.

[April 21, 1971]

Mr. Justice Black delivered the opinion of the Court.*

Appellee Milan Vuitch, a licensed physician, was indicted in the United States District Court for the District of Columbia for producing and attempting to produce abortions in violation of 22 D. C. Code 201. Before trial, the district judge granted Vuitch's motion to dismiss the indictments on the ground that the District of Columbia abortion law was unconstitutionally vague. 305 F. Supp. 1032 (DCDC 1969). The United States appealed to this Court under the Criminal Appeals Act, 18 U. S. C. § 3731. We postponed decision on jurisdiction to the hearing on the merits, 397 U. S. 1061, and requested the parties to brief and argue specified questions on that issue. 399 U. S. 923. We hold that we have jurisdiction and that the statute is not unconstitutionally vague. We reverse.

I

The first question is whether we have jurisdiction under the Criminal Appeals Act to entertain this direct appeal from the United States District Court for the

*The Chief Justice, Mr. Justice Douglas, Mr. Justice Stewart, and Mr. Justice White join in Part I of this opinion. The Chief Justice, Mr. Justice Harlan, Mr. Justice White, and Mr. Justice Blackmun join in Part II of this opinion.

District of Columbia. That Act [1] gives us jurisdiction over direct appeals from district court judgments "in all criminal cases . . . dismissing any indictment where such decision is based upon the invalidity . . . of the statute upon which the indictment is founded." 18 U. S. C. § 3731. The decision appealed from is a dismissal of an indictment on the ground that the District of Columbia abortion law, on which the indictment was based, is unconstitutionally vague. This abortion statute, 22 D. C. Code 201, is an Act of Congress applicable only in the District of Columbia and we suggested that the parties argue whether a decision holding unconstitutional such a statute is appealable directly to this Court under the Criminal Appeals Act. The literal wording of the Act plainly includes this statute, even though it applies only to the District. A piece of legislation so limited is nevertheless a "statute" in the sense that it was duly enacted into law by both Houses of Congress and was signed by the President. And the Criminal Appeals Act contains no language that purports to limit or qualify the term "statute." On the contrary, the Act authorizes government appeals from district courts to the Supreme Court in "all criminal cases" where a district court judgment dismissing an indictment is based upon the invalidity of the statute on which the indictment is founded.

[1] The Act states in pertinent part:

"An appeal may be taken by and on behalf of the United States from the district courts direct to the Supreme Court of the United States in all criminal cases in the following instances:

"From a decision or judgment setting aside, or dismissing any indictment or information, or any count thereof, where such decision of judgment is based upon the invalidity or construction of the statute upon which the indictment or information is founded. . . ." 18 U. S. C. § 3731.

An examination of the legislative history of the Criminal Appeals Act and its amendments suggests no reason why we should depart from the Act's literal meaning and exclude D. C. statutes from its coverage. The committee reports and floor debates contain no discussion indicating that the term "statute" does not include statutes applicable only to the District of Columbia.[2] We therefore conclude that we have jurisdiction over this appeal under the Criminal Appeals Act.

Our Brother HARLAN has argued in dissent that we do not have jurisdiction over this direct appeal. He suggests that such a result is supported by the decision in United States v. Burroughs, 289 U. S. 159 (1933), the policy underlying the Criminal Appeals Act, and the canon of construction that statutes governing direct appeals to this Court should be strictly construed.

It is difficult to see how the Burroughs decision lends much force to his argument, since that case held only that the term "district court" in the Criminal Appeals Act did not include the then-existing Supreme Court of the District of Columbia. Id., at 163–164. The dissent goes on to suggest the Act should be construed in light of the Congressional purpose of "avoiding inconsistent enforcement of criminal laws." Post, at 12. This purpose would not be served by our refusing to decide this case now after it has been orally argued. In the last several years, abortion laws have been repeatedly attacked as unconstitutionally vauge in both state and federal courts with widely varying results. A number of these cases are now pending on our docket. A refusal to accept jurisdiction here would only compound confusion for doctors, their patients, and law enforcement officials. As this case makes abundantly clear, a ruling on the validity of a statute applicable only to the District can contribute to great disparities and confusion in the enforcement of criminal laws. Finally, my Brother HARLAN'S dissent also appears to rely on the fact that this Court has never accepted jurisdiction over a direct appeal under the Criminal Appeals Act involving the validity of a District of Columbia statute. Post, at 13. Since this Court has never either accepted or rejected jurisdiction of such an appeal, it is difficult to see how the complete absence of precedent in this Court lends any weight whatever to his argument. Neither previous cases nor the purpose behind the Criminal Appeals Act provides any satisfactory reason why the term "statute" should not include those statutes applicable only in the District of Columbia.

One other procedural problem remains. We asked the parties to brief the question whether the Government could have appealed this case to the Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia under 23 D. C. Code 105, and, if so, whether we should refuse to entertain the appeal here as a matter of sound judicial administration. That D. C. Code provision states:

> "In all criminal prosecutions the United States . . . shall have the same right of appeal that is given to the defendant . . . ."

The relationship between the Criminal Appeals Act and this Code section was considered in Carroll v. United States, 354 U. S. 394, 411, where the Court concluded:

> "[C]riminal appeals by the Government in the District of Columbia are not limited to the categories set forth in 18 U. S. C. 3731 [the Criminal Appeals Act], although as to cases of the type covered by that special jurisdictional statute its explicit direc> tions will prevail over the general terms of [23 D. C. Code 105]."

Since we have concluded above that this appeal is covered by the Criminal Appeals Act, it would seem to follow from Carroll that the Act's provisions control and no appeal could have been taken to the Court of Appeals. Although Carroll seems to be dispositive, it has been suggested that it may now be limited by United States v. Sweet, 399 U. S. 517 (1970), which contains some language suggesting that the Government may be empowered to take an appeal to the Court of Appeals under 23 D. C. Code 105, even when a direct appeal would be proper here under the Criminal Appeals Act. Id., at 518. We do not elaborate upon that suggestion. We only hold that once an appeal is properly here under the Criminal Appeals Act, we should not refuse to consider it because it might have been taken to another court.

II

We turn now to the merits. Appellee Milan Vuitch was indicted for producing and attempting to produce abortions in violation of 22 D. C. Code 201. That Act provides in part:

> "Whoever, by means of any instrument, medicine, drug or other means whatever, procures or produces or attempts to procure or produce an abortion or miscarriage on any woman, unless the same were done as necessary for the preservation of the mother's life or health and under the direction of a competent licensed practitioner of medicine, shall be imprisoned in the penitentiary not less than one year or not more than ten years; . . ."

Without waiting for trial, the District Judge dismissed the indictment on the ground that the abortion statute was unconstitutionally vague. In his view, set out substantially in full below,[3] the statute was vague for two principal reasons:

1. The fact that once an abortion was proved a physician "is presumed guilty and remains so unless a jury

[3] The District Judge stated:

". . . It is suggested that these words [as necessary for the preservation of the mother's life or health] are not precise; that, as interpreted, they improperly limit the physician in carrying out his professional responsibilities; and that they interfere with a woman's right to avoid childbirth for any reason. The word "health" is not defined and in fact remains so vague in its interpretation and the practice under the act that there is no indication whether it includes varying degrees of mental as well as physical health. While the law generally has been careful not to interfere with medical judgment of competent physicians in treatment of individual patients, the physician in this instance is placed in a particularly unconscionable position under the conflicting and inadequate interpretations of the D. C. abortion statute now prevailing. The Court of Appeals established by such early cases as Peckham v. United States, 96 U. S. App. D. C. 312 (1955), cert. denied, 350 U. S. 912, and Williams v. United States, 78 U. S. App. D. C. 147 (1943), that upon the Government establishing that a physician committed an abortion, the burden shifted to the physician to justify his acts. In other words, he is presumed guilty and remains so unless a jury can be persuaded that his acts were necessary for the preservation of the woman's life or health. These holdings, which may well offend the Fifth Amendment of the Constitution, as interpreted in recent decisions such as Leary v. United States, 395 U. S. 89 Sup. Ct. 1532, 23 L. Ed. 2d 658 (1965), and United States v. Gainey, 380 U. S. 63, 85, Sup. Ct. 754, 13 L. Ed. 2d 658 (1965), also emphasize the lack of necessary precision in this criminal statute. The jury's acceptance or nonacceptance of an individual doctor's interpretation of the ambivalent and uncertain word 'health' should not determine whether he stands convicted of a felony, facing ten years' imprisonment. His professional judgment made in good faith should not be challenged. There is no clear standard to guide either the doctor, the jury or the Court. No body of medical knowledge delineates what degree of mental or physical health or combination of the two is required to make an abortion conducted by a competent physician legal or illegal under the Code. . . ." 305 F. Supp. 1032, at 1034.

can be persuaded that his acts were necessary for the preservation of the woman's life or health."

2. The presence of the "ambivalent and uncertain word 'health.'"

In concluding that the statute places the burden of persuasion on the defendant once the fact of an abortion has been proved,[4] the court relied on Williams v. United States, 138 F. 2d 81 (CADC 1943). There the Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia held that the prosecution was not required to prove as part of its case in chief that the operation was not necessary to preserve life or health. Id., at 81, 83. The court indicated that once the prosecution established that an abortion had been performed the defendant was required "to come forward with evidence which with or without other evidence is sufficient to create reasonable doubt of guilt." Id., at 84. The District Court here appears to have read Williams as holding that once an abortion is proved, the burden of persuading the jury that it was legal (i. e., necessary to the preservation of the mother's life or health) is cast upon the physician. Whether or not this is a correct reading of Williams, we believe it is an erroneous interpretation of the statute. Certainly a statute that outlawed only a limited category of abortions but "presumed" guilt whenever the mere fact of abortion was established, would at the very least present serious constitutional problems under this Court's previous decision interpreting the Fifth Amendment. Tot v. United States, 319 U. S. 463 (1943); Leary v. United States, 395 U. S. 6, 36 (1969). But of course statutes should be construed whenever possible so as to uphold their constitutionality.

[4] The trial court also cited Peckham v. United States, 226 F. 2d 34 (CADC 1955), as dealing with the D. C. abortion law. However, the opinion in that case does not discuss the burden of proof under the statute.

The statute does not outlaw all abortions, but only those which are not performed under the direction of a competent, licensed physician, and those not necessary to preserve the mother's life or health. It is a general guide to the interpretation of criminal statutes that when an exception is incorporated in the enacting clause of a statute, the burden is on the prosecution to plead and prove that the defendant is not within the exception. When Congress passed the District of Columbia abortion law in 1901 and amended it in 1953, it expressly authorized physicians to perform such abortions as are necessary to preserve the mother's "life or health." Because abortions were authorized only in more restrictive circumstances under previous D. C. law, the change must represent a judgment by Congress that it is desirable that women be able to obtain abortions needed for the preservation of their lives or health.[5] It would be highly anomalous for a legislature to authorize abortions necessary for life or health and then to demand that a doctor, upon pain of one to ten years' imprisonment, bear the burden of proving that an abortion he performed fell within that category. Placing such a burden of proof on a doctor would be peculiarly inconsistent with society's notions of the responsibilities of the medical profession. Generally, doctors are encouraged by society's expectations, by the strictures of malpractice law and by their own professional standards to give their patients such treatment as is necessary to preserve their health. We are unable to believe that Congress intended that a physician be required to prove his innocence. We therefore hold that under 22 D. C. Code 201, the burden is on the prosecution to plead and prove than an abortion was not "necessary for the preservation of the mother's life or health."

[5] Before 1901 the existing statute allowed abortion only "for the purpose of preserving the life of any woman pregnant . . . ." Abert, The Compiled Statutes in Force in the District of Columbia, c. XVI, pp. 158–159 (1894).

There remains the contention that the word "health" is so imprecise and has so uncertain a meaning that it fails to inform a defendant of the charge against him and therefore the statute offends the Due Process Clause of the Constitution. See, e. g., Lanzetta v. New Jersey, 306 U. S. 451 (1939). We hold that it does not. The trial court apparently felt that the term was vague because there "is no indication whether it includes varying degrees of mental as well as physical health." 305 F. Supp. 1032, at 1034. It is true that the legislative history of the statute gives no guidance as to whether "health" refers to both a patient's mental and physical state. The term "health" was introduced into the law in 1901 when the statute was enacted in substantially its present form. The House Report[*] on the bill contains no discussion of the term "health" and there was no Senate report. Nor have we found any District of Columbia cases prior to this district court decision that shed any light on the question. Since that decision, however, the issue has been considered in Doe v. General Hospital of the District of Columbia, 313 F. Supp. 1170 (DCDC 1970). There District Judge Waddy construed the statute to permit abortions "for mental health reasons whether or not the patients had a previous history of mental defects." Id., at 1174–1175. The same construction was followed by the United States Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia in further proceedings in the same case. Doe v. General Hospital of the District of Columbia, 434 F. 2d 423; 434 F. 2d 427 (CADC 1970). We see no reason why this interpretation of the statute should not be followed. Certainly this construction accords with the general usage and modern understanding of the word "health," which includes phychological as well as physical well-being. Indeed Webster's Dictionary, in accord with that common usage, properly defines health as "the state of being sound in body or mind." Viewed in this light, the term "health" presents no problem of vagueness. Indeed, whether a particular operation is necessary for a patient's physical or mental health is a judgment that physicians are obviously called upon to make routinely whenever surgery is considered.[7]

We therefore hold that properly construed the District of Columbia abortion law is not unconstitutionally vague, and that the trial court erred in dismissing the indictments on that ground. Appellee has suggested that there are other reasons why the dismissal of the indictment should be affirmed. Essentially, these arguments are based on this Court's decision in Griswold v. Connecticut, 381 U. S. 479 (1965). Although there was some reference to these arguments in the opinion of the court below, we read it as holding simply that the statute was void for vagueness because it failed in that court's language to "give that certainty which due process of law considers essential in a criminal statute." 305 F. Supp. 1032, at 1034. Since that question of vagueness was the only issue passed upon by the District Court it is the only issue we reach here. United States v. Borden Co., 308 U. S. 188 (1939); United States v. Petrillo, 332 U. S. 1 (1947); United States v. Blue, 384 U. S. 251, 256 (1966).

[7] Our Brother DOUGLAS appears to fear that juries might convict doctors in any abortion case simply because some jurors believe all abortions are evil. Of course such a danger exists in all criminal cases, not merely those involving abortions. But there are well-established methods defendants may use to protect themselves against such jury prejudice: continuances, changes of venue, challenges to prospective jurors on voir dire, and motions to set aside verdicts which may have been produced by prejudice. And of course a court should always set aside a jury verdict of guilt when there is not evidence from which a jury could find a defendant guilty beyond a reasonable doubt.

The judgment is reversed and the case remanded for further proceedings not inconsistent with this opinion.

Reversed.

SUPREME COURT OF THE UNITED STATES

No. 84.—October Term, 1970

United States, Appellant, v. Milan Vuitch.	On Appeal From the United States District Court for The District of Columbia.

[April 21, 1971]

Mr. Justice White, concurring.

I join the Court's opinion and judgment. As to the facial vagueness argument, I have these few additional words. This case comes to us unilluminated by facts or record. The District Court's holding that the District of Columbia statute is unconstitutionally vague on its face because it proscribes all abortions except those necessary for the preservation of the mother's life or health was a judgment that the average person could not understand which abortions were permitted and which were prohibited. But surely the statute puts everyone on adequate notice that the health of the mother, whatever that phrase means, was the governing standard. It should also be absolutely clear that a doctor is not free to perform abortions on request without considering whether the patient's health required it. No one of average intelligence could believe that under this statute abortions not dictated by health considerations are legal. Thus even if the "health" standard were unconstitutionally vague, which I agree is not the case, the statute is not void on its face since it reaches a class of cases in which the meaning of "health" is irrelevant and no possible vagueness problem could arise. We do not, of course, know whether this is one of those cases. Until we do facial vagueness claims must fail. Cf. United States v. National Dairy Corp., 372 U. S. 29 (1963).

SUPREME COURT OF THE UNITED STATES

No. 84.—October Term, 1970

United States, Appellant, v. Milan Vuitch. | On Appeal From the United States District Court for the District of Columbia.

[April 21, 1971]

Mr. Justice Douglas, dissenting in part.

While I agree with Part I of the Court's opinion that we have jurisdiction over this appeal, I do not think the statute meets the requirements of procedural due process.

The District of Columbia Code makes it a felony for a physcian to perform an abortion "unless the same were done as necessary for the preservation of the mother's life or health." 22 D. C. Code 201.

I agree with the Court that a physician—within the limits of his own expertise—would be able to say that an abortion at a particular time performed on a designated patient would or would not be necessary for the "preservation" of her "life or health." That judgment, however, is highly subjective, dependent on the training and insight of the particular physician and his standard as to what is "necessary" for the "preservation" of the mother's "life or health."

The answers may well differ, physician to physician. Those trained in conventional obstetrics may have one answer; those with deeper psychiatric insight may have another. Each answer is clear to the particular physician. If we could read the Act as making that determination conclusive, not subject to review by judge and by jury, the case would be simple, as Mr. Justice Stewart points out. But that does such violence to the statutory scheme that I believe it is beyond the range of judicial interpretation so to read the Act. If it is to be revised in that manner, Congress should do it.

Hence I read the Act, as did the District Court, as requiring submission to court and jury of the physician's decision. What will the jury say? The prejudices of jurors are customarily taken care of by challenges for cause and by preemptory challenges. But vagueness of criminal statutes introduces another element that is uncontrollable. Are the concepts so vague that possible offenders have no safe guidelines for their own action? Are the concepts so vague that jurors can give them a gloss and meaning drawn from their own predilections and prejudices? Is the statutory standard so easy to manipulate that although physicians can make good-faith decisions based on the standard, juries can nonetheless make felons out of them?

The Court said in Lanzetta v. New Jersey, 306 U. S. 451, 453, that a ". . . statute which either forbids or requires the doing of an act in terms so vague that men of common intelligence must necessarily guess at its meaning and differ as to its application violates the first essential of due process."

A three-judge court in evaluating a Texas statutory standard as to whether an abortion was attempted "for the purpose of saving the life of the mother" said:

> "How likely must death be? Must death be certain if the abortion is not performed? Is it enough that the woman could not undergo birth without an ascertainably higher possibility of death than would normally be the case? What if the woman threatened suicide if the abortion was not performed? How imminent must death be if the abortion is not performed? Is it sufficient if having the child will shorten the life of the woman by a number of years?" Roe v. Wade, 314 F. Supp. 1217, 1223.

The Roe case was followed by a three-judge court in Doe v. Scott, — F. Supp. —, which struck down an Illinois statute which sanctioned an abortion "necessary for the preservation of a woman's life." And see People v. Belous, 71 Cal. 2d 954, 458 Pac. 2d 194.

A doctor may well remove an appendix far in advance of rupture in order to prevent a risk that may never materialize. May he do the same under this abortion statute?

May he perform abortions on unmarried woman who want to avoid the "stigma" of having an illegitimate child? Is bearing a "stigma" a "health" factor? Only in isolated cases? Or is it such whenever the woman is unmarried?

Is any unwanted pregnancy a "health" factor because it is a source of anxiety?

Is an abortion "necessary" in the statutory sense if the doctor thought that an additional child in a family would unduly tax the mother's physical well-being by reason of the additional work which would be forced upon her?

Would a doctor be violating the law if he performed an abortion because the added expense of another child in the family would drain its resources, leaving an anxious mother with an insufficient budget to buy nutritious food?

Is the fate of an unwanted child or the plight of the family into which it is born relevant to the factor of the mother's "health?"

Mr. Justice Holmes, in holding that "unreasonable" restraint of trade was an adequate constitutional standard of criminality, said in Nash v. United States, 229 U. S. 373, 377, that "the law is full of instances where a man's fate depends on his estimating rightly, that is, as the jury subsequently estimates it, some matter of degree. If his judgment is wrong, not only may he incur a fine or a short imprisonment, as here; he may incur the penalty of death."

He wrote in a context of economic regulations which are restrained by few, if any, constitutional guarantees.

Where, however, constitutional guarantees are implicated, the standards of certainty are more exacting.

Winters v. New York, 333 U. S. 507, 514, 519, held void-for-vagueness a state statute which as construed made it a crime to print stories of crime "so massed as to incite to crime," since such a regulatory scheme trenched on First Amendment rights of the press.

The standard of "sacrilegious" can be used in such accordion-like way as to infringe on religious rights protected by the First Amendment. Joseph Burstyn, Inc. v. Wilson, 343 U. S. 495, 505.

The requirement of a "narrowly drawn" statute when the regulation touches a protected constitutional right (Cantwell v. Connecticut, 310 U. S. 296, 311; Thornhill v. Alabama, 310 U. S. 88, 100) is only another facet of the void-for-vagueness problem.

What the Court held in Herndon v. Lowry, 301 U. S. 242, is extremely relevant here. The ban of publications made to incite insurrection was held to suffer the vice of vagueness:

> "The statute, as construed and applied in the appellant's trial, does not furnish a sufficiently ascertainable standard of guilt. . . . Every person who attacks existing conditions, who agitates for a change in the form of government, must take the risk that if a jury should be of opinion he ought to have foreseen that his utterances might contribute in any measure to some future forcible resistance to the existing government he may be convicted of the offense of inciting insurrection. . . . The law, as thus construed, licenses the jury to create its own standard in each case." Id., 261, 262, 263. (Italics added.)

If these requirements of certainty are not imposed then the triers of fact have "a power to invade imperceptibly (and thus unreviewably) a realm of constitutionally protected personal liberties." Amsterdam, The Void-For-Vagueness Doctrine in the Supreme Court, 109 U. Pa. L. Rev. 67, 104 (1960).

Abortion touches intimate affairs of the family, of marriage, of sex, which in Griswold v. Connecticut, 381 U. S. 479, we held to involve rights associated with several express constitutional rights and which are summed up in "the right of privacy." They include the right to procreate (Skinner v. Oklahoma, 316 U. S. 535), the right to marry across the color line (Loving v. Virginia, 388 U. S. 1), the intimate familial relations between children and parents (Meyer v. Nebraska, 262 U. S. 390; Levy v. Louisiana, 391 U. S. 68, 71–72). There is a compelling personal interest in marital privacy and in the limitation of family size. And on the other side is the belief of many that the fetus, once formed, is a member of the human family and that mere personal inconvenience cannot justify his destruction. This is not to say that government is powerless to legislate on abortions. Yet the laws enacted must not trench on constitutional guarantees which they can easily do unless closely confined.

Abortion statutes deal with conduct which is heavily weighted with religious teachings and ethical concepts.[1]

[1] "There remains the moral issue of abortion as murder. We submit that this is insoluble, a matter of religious philosophy and religious principle and not a matter of fact. We suggest that those who believe abortion is murder need not avail themselves of it. On the other hand, we do not believe that such conviction should limit

Mr. Justice Jackson once spoke of the "treacherous grounds we tread when we undertake to translate ethical concepts into legal ones, case by case." Jordan v. De George, 341 U. S. 223, 242 (dissenting). The difficulty and danger are compounded when religion adds another layer of prejudice.[2] The end result is that juries condemn what they personally disapprove.

The subject of abortions—like cases involving obscenity[3]—is one of the most inflammatory ones to reach the freedom of those not bound by identical religious conviction. Although the moral issue hangs like a threatening cloud over any open discussion of abortion, the moral issuses are not all one-sided. The psychoanalyst Erik Erikson stated the other side well when he suggested that 'The most deadly of all possible sins is the mutilation of a child's spirit.' There can be nothing more destructive to a child's spirit than being unwanted, and there are few things more disruptive to a woman's spirit than being forced without love or need into motherhood." VII The Right to Abortion: A Psychiatric View, pp. 218–219 (Group for the Advancement of Psychiatry, 1969).

[2] Mr. Justice Clark recently wrote: "Throughout history religious belief has wielded a vital influence on society's attitude regarding abortion. The religious issues involved are perhaps the most frequently debated aspects of abortion. At the center of the ecclesiastical debate is the concept of 'ensoulment' or 'person-hood,' i. e., the time at which the fetus becomes a human organism. The Reverend Joseph F. Donseel of Fordham University admitted that no one can determine with certainty the exact moment at which 'ensoulment' occurs, but we must deal with the moral problems of aborting a fetus even if it has not taken place. Many Roman Catholics believe that the soul is a gift of God given at conception. This leads to the conclusion that aborting a pregnancy at any time amounts to the taking of a human life and is therefore against the will of God. Others, including some Catholics, believe that abortion should be legal until the baby is viable, i. e., able to support itself outside the womb. In balancing the evils, the latter conclude that the evil of destroying the fetus is outweighed by the social evils accompanying forced pregnancy and childbirth." Religion, Morality and Abortion: A Constitutional Appraisal, 2 Loy. L. Rev. 1, 4 (1969).

[3] I have expressed my views on the vagueness of criminal laws governing obscenity in Dyson v. Stein, decided February 23, 1971 the Court. People instantly take sides and the public, from whom juries are drawn, makes up its mind one way or the other before the case is even argued. The interests of the mother and the fetus are opposed. On which side should the State throw its weight? The issue is volatile; and it is resolved by the moral code which an individual has. That means that jurors may give it such meaning as they choose, while physicians are left to operate outside the law. Unless the statutory code of conduct is stable and in very narrow bounds, juries have a wide range and physicians have no reliable guideposts. The words "necessary for the preservation of the mother's life or health" become free-wheeling concepts, too easily taking on meaning from the juror's predilections or religious prejudices.

I would affirm the dismissal of this indictment and leave to the experts the drafting of abortion laws [4] that protect good-faith medical practitioners from the treacheries of the present law.

(dissenting opinion). And see the dissent of MR. JUSTICE BLACK in Ginzburg v. United States, 383 U. S. 463, 477.

A pregnant female's commission of an abortional act upon herself is justifiable when she acts upon the advice of a duly licensed physician (1) that such act is necessary to preserve her life, or, (2) within twenty-four weeks from the commencement of her pregnancy. SUPREME COURT OF THE UNITED STATES

No. 84.—October Term, 1970

United States, Appellant, v. Milan Vuitch.	On Appeal From the United States District Court for the District of Columbia.

[April 21, 1971]

Mr. Justice Harlan, with whom Mr. Justice Brennan, Mr. Justice Marshall, and Mr. Justice Blackmun join, dissenting as to jurisdiction.

Appellee Vuitch was indicted in the United States District Court for the District of Columbia for violations of 22 D. C. Code 201, the District of Columbia abortion statute. This statute is applicable only within the District of Columbia. On pretrial motion by Vuitch, the indictments were dismissed on the ground that the abortion statute was unconstitutionally vague. The United States appealed directly to this Court under the terms of the Criminal Appeals Act of 1907, 18 U. S. C. § 3731, relying on the provision allowing direct appeal "[f]rom a decision or judgment setting aside, or dismissing any indictment or information, or any count thereof, where such decision or judgment is based upon the invalidity or construction of the statute upon which the indictment or information is founded." [1] It is not contested that, but for this provision of the Criminal Appeals Act, the Government would have a right of appeal to the Court of

[1] The text of 18 U. S. C. § 3731 was as follows:

"An appeal may be taken by and on behalf of the United States from the district courts direct to the Supreme Court of the United States in all criminal cases in the following instances:

"From a decision or judgment setting aside, or dismissing any indictment or information, or any count thereof, where such decision or judgment is based upon the invalidity or construction of the statute upon which the indictment or information is founded.

"From a decision arresting a judgment of conviction for insufficiency of the indictment or information, where such decision is based Appeals for the District of Columbia under 23 D. C. Code 105, which provides:

"In all criminal prosecutions the United States or the District of Columbia, as the case may be, shall upon the invalidity or construction of the statute upon which the indictment or information is founded.

"From the decision or judgment sustaining a motion in bar, when the defendant has not been put in jeopardy.

"An appeal may be taken by and on behalf of the United States from the district courts to a court of appeals in all criminal cases, in the following instances:

"From a decision or judgment setting aside, or dismissing any indictment or information, or any count thereof except where a direct appeal to the Supreme Court of the United States is provided by this section.

"From a decision arresting a judgment of conviction except where a direct appeal to the Supreme Court of the United States is provided by this section.

"The appeal in all such cases shall be taken within thirty days after the decision or judgment has been rendered and shall be diligently prosecuted.

"Pending the prosecution and determination of the appeal in the foregoing instances, the defendant shall be admitted to bail on his own recognizance.

"If an appeal shall be taken, pursuant to this section, to the Supreme Court of the United States which, in the opinion of that Court, should have been taken to a court of appeals, the Supreme Court shall remand the case to the court of appeals, which shall then have jurisdiction to hear and determine the same as if the appeal had been taken to that court in the first instance.

"If an appeal shall be taken pursuant to this section to any court of appeals which, in the opinion of such court, should have been taken directly to the Supreme Court of the United States, such court shall certify the case to the Supreme Court of the United States, which shall thereupon have jurisdiction to hear and determine the case to the same extent as if an appeal had been taken directly to that Court."

As noted in United States v. Weller, No. 77, October Term 1970 (decided Feb. 24, 1971), these provisions were amended by § 14 (a) of the Omnibus Crime Control Act of 1970, 84 Stat. 1890 (1971). But cases begun in the District Court before the new statute took effect are not affected. See United States v. Weller, supra, at n. 1.

> have the same right of appeal that is given to the defendant, including the right to a bill of exceptions: Provided, That if on such appeal it shall be found that there was error in the rulings of the court during a trial, a verdict in favor of the defendant shall not be set aside."

The Court today—relying on the generic reference to "statutes" and "all criminal cases" in the text of 18 U. S. C. § 3731 and the absence of an express exclusion of statutes applicable only within the District of Columbia—concludes that 18 U. S. C. § 3731 rather than 23 D. C. Code 105 provides the proper appellate route for this case. I must disagree.

I

The historical development of the Government's right to appeal in criminal cases both in the District of Columbia and throughout the Nation is surveyed in Carroll v. United States, 354 U. S. 394 (1957). Section 105 of the D. C. Code was passed in 1901 as § 935 of the Code of 1901. 31 Stat. 1341. Prior to the Criminal Appeals Act of 1907, the Government had no right of appeal in criminal cases outside of the District of Columbia. To remedy this situation, a bill was introduced in the House of Representatives. That bill practically tracked the language of the D. C. statute, and made no provision for direct appeal to this Court. 40 Cong. Rec. 5408. The accompanying House Report described the bill as follows: "The accompanying bill will extend [§ 935] of the code of the District of Columbia to all districts in the United States." H. R. Rep. No. 2119, 59th Cong., 1st Sess., at 2 (1906). That bill passed the House, but the Senate Committee on the Judiciary rejected the House approach of simply extending the provisions of the D. C. appeals statute to the rest of the Nation; the Senate Committee instead substituted a more narrowly drawn measure which enumerated specific substantive categories of criminal cases to be appealable by the Government and allocated jurisdiction over these appeals between the Supreme Court and the then Circuit Courts of Appeals according to the allocation of appellate jurisdiction for civil cases established in the Circuit Court of Appeals Act of 1891. S. Rep. No. 3922, 59th Cong., 1st Sess. (1906). See Carroll v. United States, supra, at 402 n. 11. Even that bill as narrowed could not pass the Senate; it provoked extended debate in which the opponents of the measure focused on the potential for abuse of individual rights arising from repeated court proceedings, delays in appeals, and restraints on personal freedom while the Government prosecuted its appeal. See generally United States v. Sisson, 399 U. S. 267 (1970). The upshot of these debates was that Senator Nelson, the bill's floor manager in the Senate, agreed to accept a variety of amendments which further narrowed the categories of cases appealable by the Government and made special provision for the defendant's release on his own recognizance. See 41 Cong. Rec. 2818–2825.[2]

It is at this point that Senator Clarke of Arkansas offered an amendment limiting the Government's right to appeal decisions dismissing indictments or arresting judgments for insufficiency of the indictment to instances where the decision was based upon "the validity or construction of the statute." The purpose of that amendment was described by Senator Clarke as follows:

> "Mr. President, the object of the amendment is to limit the right of appeal upon the part of the General Government to the validity or constitutionality of the statute in which the prosecution is proceeding. It has been enlarged by the addition of another clause, which gives the right of appeal where the construction by the trial court is such as to decide that there is no offense committed, notwithstanding the validity of the statute, and in other respects the proceeding may remain intact. I think that is a broad enough right to concede to the General Government in the prosecution of persons in the court.

[2] The bill had been amended earlier to require the Government to take an appeal within 30 days. 41 Cong. Rec. 2193–2194.

. . . . . .

"In view of the defects that recent years have disclosed, I do not believe it to be sound policy to go beyond the necessities as they have developed defects in our procedure. A case recently occurring has drawn attention to the fact that if a circuit judge or a district judge holding the circuit should determine that a statute of Congress was invalid, the United States is without means of having that matter submitted to a tribunal that under the Constitution has power to settle that question. I do not believe the remedy ought to be any wider than the mischief that has been disclosed. I do not believe that any additional advantages ought to be given to the General Government in the prosecution of persons arraigned in court, but I do believe the paragraph ought to be perfected in that behalf, so as to provide that there shall be an appeal to the court having authority to give uniformity to the practice which shall prevail in all the courts of the United States, and that they shall be ready to say, and say promptly, what the statute means and whether or not it is a valid statute.

"So I think this amendment gives expression to the proposition that the remedy we provide here now should be no wider than the defect that has been disclosed in the preceding criminal procedure; and that is that whenever the validity of a statute has been adversely decided by a trial court, wherever its unconstitutionality has been pronounced by a trial court, the Government ought to have the right to promptly submit that to the tribunal having authority to dispose of such questions in order that there may be a uniform enforcement of the law throughout the entire limits of the United States.

"This is the purpose, I have, Mr. President, and having discussed it with the distinguished Senator from Wisconsin . . . and the distinguished Senator from Minnesota [Mr. Nelson], we agreed that that would probably meet the defect." 41 Cong. Rec. 2819–2820. See generally 41 Cong. Rec. 2819–2822.

The bill as thus amended passed the Senate; the House disagreed to the Senate amendment, but yielded in conference. The bill in conference was amended to provide for direct appeals to the Supreme Court. See H. R. Conf. Rep. No. 8113, 59th Cong., 2d Sess. (1970). No explanation was given in the conference report for the exclusive direct appeal route.

I draw from these legislative materials the following relevant propositons: (1) The Congress was definitely advertent to the existence of a governmental appeal right in criminal cases within the District; (2) the Congress explicitly rejected the simple approach of extending the D. C. provision to the Nation; (3) the particular provision of the Act relied on by the Government as supporting its direct appeal in this case was amended with a view to limiting its reach to a relatively precise defect; i. e., the debilitating effect on the enforcement of criminal laws arising from conflicting judicial intepretations; and (4) the substitution of an exclusive direct appeal to this Court, while not expressly explained, is perfectly compatible with the goal of promptly achieving uniformity in construction of statutes applicable nationwide, while at the same time being wholly unnecessary to the resolution of conflicting district court constructions of local D. C. statutes, given the existence of a right of appeal to the Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia.

II

The question of overlap between the appellate routes available to the Government in criminal cases under the D. C. Code and 18 U. S. C. § 3731 was first dealt with by this Court in United States v. Burroughs, 289 U. S. 159 (1933). In Burroughs the defendants were indicted in the then Supreme Court of the District of Columbia for violation of the Federal Corrupt Practices Act, a statute of nationwide applicability. They successfully demurred on two grounds: one involving the construction of the statute, and the other involving the sufficiency of the indictment as a pleading. The Government took an appeal to the Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia under the D. C. appeals statute. The appellate court certified to this Court the question whether it had jurisdiction over an appeal where a § 3731-type challenge was joined with a challenge to the sufficiency of the indictment as a pleading. The Court disposed of the question by holding that the Criminal Appeals Act is inapplicable to any criminal case appealable under the provision of the D. C. Code:

> "The Criminal Appeals Act, in naming the courts from which appeals may be taken to this court, employs the phrase 'district courts;' not 'courts of the United States,' or 'courts exercising the same jurisdiction as district courts.' We need not, however, determine whether the statute should be construed to embrace criminal cases tried in the Supreme Court of the District if § 935 of the District Code were not in effect. That section deals comprehensively with appeals in criminal cases from all > of the courts of first instance of the District and confers on the Court of Appeals jurisdiction of appeals by the Government seeking review of the judgments of those courts. The Criminal Appeals Act, on the other hand, affects only certain specified classes of decisions in district courts, contains no repealing clause, and no reference to the courts of the District of Columbia or the territorial courts, upon many of which jurisdiction is conferred by language quite similar to that of the Code of Law of the District. We cannot construe it as impliedly repealing the complete appellate system created for the District of Columbia by § 935 of the Code, in the absence of expression on the part of Congress indicating that purpose. Implied repeals are not favored; and if effect can reasonably be given to both statutes, the presumption is that the earlier is intended to remain in force . . . ." 289 U. S., at 163–164.[3]

The holding in Burroughs established a complete separation of the two statutory schemes for Government appeals in criminal cases; the essence of the Court's rationale was a presumption against implied repeals.

In 1942, Congress amended the Criminal Appeals Act to provide for Government appeals to the Courts of Appeals from all decisions dismissing indictments or arresting judgments of convictions except where a right of direct appeal to this Court exists. 56 Stat. 271. The [3] The Court's opinion characterizes Burroughs as having "'held only that the term 'district court' in the Criminal Appeals Act did not include the then-existing Supreme Court of the District of Columbia." Ante, at [3]. As I read the italicized portion of the above-quoted passage, that is the precise question that the Burroughs Court concluded it did not have to decide, in light of its holding that the Criminal Appeals Act could not, by implication, effect the repeal of § 935 of the District Code.

new amendment expressly included the United States Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia as one of the intermediate appellate tribunals to which the Government could appeal;[4] in addition, the Act added a new provision to the Judicial Code establishing appellate jurisdiction in the then circuit courts of appeal "in criminal cases on appeals taken by the United States in cases where such appeals are permitted by law." 56 Stat. 272. The latter provision also expressly incorporated the United States Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia.[5] Ibid.

The legislative history of the 1942 amendment offers no explication of Congressional intent in including the D. C. courts within the Act.[6] It is certain that this amendment generates some form of overlap between the two statutory schemes for Governmental appeals in criminal cases. In Carroll v. United States, 354 U. S. 394, 411 (1957), the Court recognized the new situation created by the 1942 amendment:

> "It may be concluded, then, that even today criminal appeals by the Government in the District of Columbia are not limited to the categories set forth in 18 U. S. C. § 3731, although as to cases of the type covered by that special jurisdictional statute, its explicit directions will prevail over the general terms of [the D. C. statute] . . . ."

[4] These explicit references were subsequently omitted by amendment in 1949, 63 Stat. 97, which altered the language of the statute to conform to the changed nomenclature of the federal courts.

[5] This last provision was an amendment to 28 U. S. C. § 225 (1940 ed.); see 56 Stat. 272 and Carroll v. United States, supra, at n. 5.

[6] The focus was on the decision to accord the Government a right of appeal to the courts of appeal where no direct appeal to this Court lay. See H. R. No. 45, 77th Cong., 1st Sess. (1941); S. Rep. No. 868, 77th Cong., 1st Sess. (1941).

That, however, leaves open the question which cases come within the categories set forth in 18 U. S. C. § 3731.

III

After this Court's holding in Burroughs, it was clear that if Congress wished to effectuate any displacement of the pre-1907 route for Government appeals of criminal cases within the District of Columbia, some express manifestation of its intent was required. The 1942 amendment followed the Burroughs decision. Since Congress then acted to create some overlap between the two statutes without further limiting the categories of directly appealable criminal cases, it may be argued that we should presume Congress intended, as of 1942, to embrace within the very special appeals procedures of 18 U. S. C. § 3731 criminal cases based upon statutes applicable only within the District.

But that presumption from a completely silent legislative record flies in the face of the principle that statutes creating a right of direct appeal to this Court should be narrowly construed. Cf. Swift & Co. v. Wickham, 382 U. S. 111, 128–129 (1965); Florida Lime Growers v. Jacobsen, 362 U. S. 73, 92–93 (Frankfurter, J., dissenting). And, in light of the legislative history of the 1907 Act and this Court's explicit holding in Burroughs that the 1907 Act had no impact on cases appealable under the D. C. provision, it is especially inappropriate to rely on the absence of any further limiting language in the 1942 amendment as a justification for reading the term "statute" as encompassing criminal prosecutions in the District based on local as well as nationwide statutes.

The legislative history of the 1907 Act suggests a perfectly plausible reason for interpreting the language "based upon the invalidity or construction of the statute" as excluding D. C. statutes: that language was put in the Act by Senator Clarke with the express intention of limiting the Act's goal to remedying the precise defect of inconsistent enforcement of criminal statutes arising from the lack of a Government appeal. The Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia constitutes a perfectly adequate appellate tribunal for resolving conflicting interpretations given local statutes by judges within the District of Columbia.[7] Where, however, the Government brings a prosecution in the District of Columbia based on a statute of nationwide applicability, the Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia cannot achieve uniformity in the enforcement of the statute.

As an original proposition, then, a construction of the relevant provisions of the 1907 Act as excluding criminal cases in the District brought under local statutes but including cases brought under nationwide statutes would have been consistent both with the express purpose of Senator Clarke's amendment and the canon of strict construction as applied to direct appeals statutes.[8] But the [7] The Government suggests a construction of the Criminal Appeals Act excluding D. C. statutes would require the Court to exclude other criminal statutes of only limited territorial application, e. g., 18 U. S. C. §§ 1111–1112; (punishing homicide "[w]ithin the special maritime and territorial jurisdiction of the United States"); 18 U. S. C. §§ 1151–1165 regulating offenses within Indian territory). See Gov. Brief, at 15–16. But I would not construe 18 U. S. C. § 3731 as excluding D. C. criminal cases punishable under D. C. statutes because they are of limited territorial application; rather, the point is that given the existence of a prior right of Government appeal, the risks of disuniformity which Senator Clarke described the statute as intended to cure do not exist.

[8] The Government suggests, in its Supplemental Memorandum for the United States, at 6–7, that a construction of the 1907 Act excluding statutes applicable only within the District of Columbia from the scope of the first two provisions leads to the "anomalous consequence" that 18 U. S. C. § 3731 would still allow a direct appeal in a D. C. case where the motion-in-bar provision is concerned. E. g., United States v. Sweet, 399 U. S. 517 (1970). The alleged "anomaly" would seem to argue for the conclusion that D. C. cases

Court in Burroughs took the position that Congress could not displace the pre-existing appellate route to any extent without indicating an express intent to do so; Burroughs, significantly, involved a prosecution under a statute of nationwide applicability. Subsequently, Congress did expressly indicate an intent to displace the alternative appellate route available within the District. The extent of that displacement, I think, should now be measured by the express goal of the relevant provision of the 1907 Act, as limited by Senator Clarke: avoidance of inconsistent enforcement of criminal laws. That theory of legislative purpose—combined with the Burroughs holding that Congress should be required to affirmatively indicate an intent to displace the prior appellate route—yields an interpretation of the 1907 Act as amended in 1942 which is consistent with the canon of strict construction generally applied to direct appeals statutes.[9] involving the motion-in-bar provision are not directly appealable here, either. Certainly, the Court's disposition in Sweet would not foreclose that result.

In any event, the purpose Senator Clarke had in mind in offering his limiting amendment with regard to the first two provisions of 18 U. S. C. § 3731 was rather clearly expressed; that he failed to address himself to the motion-in-bar provision—which, after all, received very little attention in the prolonged debates on the floor of the Senate—hardly justifies an expansive reading of the other provisions of the Act.

[9] The Government relies principally on Shapiro v. Thompson, 394 U. S. 618, 625 n. 4, as supporting its construction of the generic reference to "statutes" in 18 U. S. C. § 3731 to include statutes applicable only within the District of Columbia. Shapiro dealt with 28 U. S. C. § 2282, which requires a three-judge court to hear requests for injunctions against the enforcement of "any Act of Congress" when the ground for the requested relief is the alleged unconstitutionality of the Act. Decisions of such three-judge courts are, under the circumstances set forth in 28 U. S. C. § 1253, directly appealable to this Court. In Shapiro, the Court noted at least one prior instance where the Court had taken jurisdiction over

I have little doubt that, had the Criminal Appeals Act not been recently amended to dispense with direct appeals to this Court, see n. 1 supra, the interpretation of the Act I have suggested would be adopted by the Court. This Court has never taken jurisdiction over a direct appeal from a dismissal of a prosecution brought in the a case involving a statute applicable only within the District and then stated: "Section 2282 requires a three-judge court to hear a challenge to the constitutionality of 'any Act of Congress.' We see no reason to make an exception for Acts of Congress pertaining to the District of Columbia." 394 U. S., at 625 n. 4 (emphasis in original).

The Shapiro approach is obviously inappropriate for the present problem. First, despite the Government's assertion to the contrary, see Gov. Brief, at 15, the phrase "any Act of Congress" is arguably broader than a generic reference to "statutes." Indeed, the Shapiro Court explicitly chose to emphasize the presence of the word "any" in the relevant portion of that statute. Second, while an exercise of jurisdiction in a case where jurisdiction is not challenged is of little precedential value, the Court in Shapiro still chose to take note of such a prior case; in the present context, this Court has never taken jurisdiction of a § 3731 appeal involving a statute applicable only within the District.

Third, and most importantly, Congress at the time of the three-judge court Acts altered the principles of both original and appellate jurisdiction for the substantive categories of litigation involved; the new procedural routes reflect crucial considerations of comity between sovereigns and among the branches of the Federal Government. See generally Currie, The Three-Judge Court in Constitutional Litigation, 32 U. Chi. L. Rev. 1 (1964). There is no legislative history supporting the notion that the new procedures were narrowed to alleviate particular defects of inconsistent constitutional interpretation due to the absence of any appellate route for the substantive categories of cases to be included within the Act.

In these circumstances, it is fair to conclude that the principle of strict construction applicable to such statutes must yield to the "inert language" of the statute. Cf. Florida Lime Growers v. Jacobsen, 362 U. S. 73, 92 (1960) (Frankfurter, J., dissenting).

District of Columbia for violation of a statute applicable within the District. It is worth noting that, given the Court's adherence to the principles of Carroll v. United States, supra, the rather absurd waste of our judicial resources on cases such as United States v. Waters, 175 F. 2d 340, appeal dismissed on motion of the United States, 335 U. S. 869 (1948), and United States v. Sweet, 399 U. S. 517 (1970), see n. 7 supra, could not even be avoided by the exercise of governmental discretion in choosing appellate routes. In light of Carroll, I cannot believe that a pefectly acceptable reading of congressional purpose underpinning the definiton of categories of cases directly appealable under 18 U. S. C. § 3731 which excludes statutes applicable only within the District of Columbia would have been turned down by the Court.

Of course, the recent elimination of the direct appeal route removes a great deal of the incentive to continue the stringent standards of construction with respect to this statute that have traditionally prevailed in this Court. Indeed, at this stage of the game, the canon of strict construction produces the ironic result of compelling a relatively greater expenditure of judicial energies in assessing our jurisdiction over the remainder of the criminal cases pending in the district courts of the Nation at the time of the most recent amendment than would be involved in deciding those cases on the merits. Nonetheless, this very Term we have indicated that we intend to adhere to the rules of construction evolved by this Court during the long and tortuous history of this statute. United States v. Weller, No. 77, October Term 1970 (decided February 24, 1971).

The only response we are offered to the reading of congressional purpose I have suggested is that the interests of avoiding inconsistent enforcement of criminal laws argues for exercising jurisdiction over this case because similar statutes in other jurisdictions are under attack on vagueness grounds. See the Court's opinion, at [3]. Surely those of my Brethren who subscribe to the views on jurisdiction expressed in the opinion of the Court must recognize that we cannot limit the category of appealable cases under this provision of the Act to prosecutions brought under D. C. statutes which are (a) duplicated in other jurisdictions, and (b) under attack on similar federal question grounds in other jurisdictions. The proffered response is, therefore, not truly a reason for concluding we have jurisdiction over the relevant category of cases; rather, it is a reason for exercising our power in this one case to settle Dr. Vuitch's vagueness claim in spite of the absence of the jurisdictional prerequisites which legitimize the exercise of that judicial power.

V

Having concluded that the Government cannot directly appeal the dismissal of the indictment to this Court under the provisions of 18 U. S. C. § 3731, it also follows that we cannot utilize the remand provisions of that statute to reroute the appeal to the Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia. However, we do have jurisdiction to determine our jurisdiction, and, in the analogous three-judge court situation where an alternative appellate route exists but the statute according this Court direct jurisdiction over the certain appeals includes no remand procedure, this Court has vacated the judgment of the court of original jurisdiction and remanded the case to that court for the entry of a fresh decree from which timely appeal may be taken to the proper appellate tribunal. Rockefeller v. Catholic Medical Center of Brooklyn & Queens, 397 U. S. 820 (1970). The instant case, of course, is a criminal prosecution, and there is a consideration not present in the three-judge court situation: i. e., the additonal anxiety caused the defendant by virtue of the Government's erroneous choice of appellate routes. But, while 18 U. S. C. § 3731 cannot empower us to transfer the case, that statute is still relevant as an expression of congressional policy to save the Government's appeal where an erroneous choice of appellate routes is made, even at the expense of additional anxiety to the defendant. Accordingly, I think the proper disposition of this case would be to vacate the judgment of the District Court and remand the case for the entry of a fresh judgment from which the Government could take a timely appeal to the Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia pursuant to 23 D. C. Code § 105.

VI

Notwithstanding the views on jurisdiction expressed above, and speaking only for myself, and not for those of my Brethren who agree with my discussion of the jurisdictional issue in this case, I have concluded, substantially for the reasons set forth in MR. JUSTICE BLACKMUN's separate opinion, that I should also reach the merits. Accordingly, I concur in Part II of the Court's opinion and the judgment of the Court.

SUPREME COURT OF THE UNITED STATES

No. 84.—October Term, 1970

United States, Appellant, v. Milan Vuitch.	On Appeal From the United States District Court for the District of Columbia.

[April 21, 1971]

Mr. Justice Stewart, dissenting in part.

I agree that we have jurisdiction of this appeal for the reasons stated in Part I of the Court's opinion.

As to the merits of this controversy, I share at least some of the constitutional doubts about the abortion statute expressed by the District Court. But, as this Court today correctly points out, "statutes should be construed whenever possible so as to uphold their constitutionality." The statute before us can be so construed, I think, simply by extending the reasoning of the Court's opinion to its logical conclusion.

The statute legalizes any abortion performed "under the direction of a competent licensed practitioner of medicine" if "necessary for the preservation of the mother's life or health." Under the statute, therefore, the legal practice of medicine in the District of Columbia includes the performing of abortions. For the practice of medicine consists of doing those things which, in the judgment of a physician, are necessary to preserve a patient's life or health. As the Court says, "whether a particular operation is necessary for a patient's physical or mental health is a judgment that physicians are obviously called upon to make routinely whenever surgery is considered."

It follows, I think, that when a physician has exercised his judgment in favor of performing an abortion, he has, by hypothesis, not violated the statute. To put it another way, I think the question of whether the performance of an abortion is "necessary for the mother's life or health" is entrusted under the statute exclusively to those licensed to practice medicine, without the overhanging risk of incurring criminal liability at the hands of a second-guessing lay jury. I would hold, therefore, that "a competent licensed practitioner of medicine" is wholly immune from being charged with the commission of a criminal offense under this law.

It is true that the statute can be construed in other ways, as MR. JUSTICE DOUGLAS has made clear. But I would give it the reading I have indicated "in the candid service of avoiding a serious constitutional doubt." United States v. Rumely, 345 U. S. 41, 47.

SUPREME COURT OF THE UNITED STATES

No. 84.—October Term, 1970

United States, Appellant, v. Milan Vuitch.	On Appeal From the United States District Court for the District of Columbia.

[April 21, 1971]

Mr. Justice Blackmun.

Although I join Mr. Justice Harlan in his conclusion that this case is not properly here by direct appeal under 18 U. S. C. § 3731, a majority, and thus the Court, holds otherwise. The case is therefore here and requires decision.

The five Justices constituting the majority, however, are divided on the merits. One feels that 22 D. C. Code § 201 lacks the requirements of procedural due process and would affirm the dismissal of the indictment. One would hold that a licensed physician is immune from charge under the statute. Three would hold that, properly construed, the statute is not unconstitutionally vague and that the dismissal of the indictment on that ground was error.

Because of the inability of the jurisdictional-issue majority to agree upon the disposition of the case, I feel obligated not to remain silent as to the merits. See Screws v. United States, 325 U. S. 91, 134 (1945) (addendum by Mr. Justice Rutledge); United States v. Jorn, 400 U. S. 470, 487–488 (1971) (statement of Black and Brennan, JJ.); Mills v. Alabama, 384 U. S. 214, 222–223 (1966) (separate opinion of Harlan, J.); Kesler v. Department of Public Safety, 369 U. S. 153, 174, 179 (concurring opinion of Stewart, J., and dissenting opinion of Warren, C. J.). Assuming, as I must in the light of the Court's decision, that the Court does have jurisdiction of the appeal, I join Part II of Mr. Justice Black's opinion and the judgment of the Court.

Civ. A. Nos. 3-3690-B, 3-3691-C.

United States District Court,
N. D. Texas,
Dallas Division.
June 17, 1970.

Action for judgment declaring Texas abortion laws unconstitutional and to enjoin their enforcement. The three-judge District Court held that laws prohibiting abortions except for purpose of saving life of the mother violated right secured by the Ninth Amendment to choose whether to have children and were unconstitutionally overbroad and vague, but Court would abstain from issuing injunction against enforcement of the laws.

Order accordingly.

1. Constitutional Law ⇐42

Physician challenging constitutionality of Texas abortion laws had standing to raise rights of his patients, single women and married couples, as well as rights of his own. Vernon's Ann.Tex.P.C. arts. 1191–1194, 1196.

2. Constitutional Law ⇐42

Logical nexus existed between status asserted by plaintiffs, a married couple, single woman and practicing physician challenging constitutionality of Texas abortion laws, and claim sought to be adjudicated, and plaintiffs had standing. Vernon's Ann.Tex.P.C. art. 1196; 28 U.S.C.A. § 2201.

3. Courts ⇐300

Contentiousness between pregnant woman, physician and district attorney of Dallas County was sufficient to establish a "case of actual controversy" with respect to constitutionality of Texas abortion laws. 28 U.S.C.A. § 2201.

See publication Words and Phrases for other judicial constructions and definitions.

4. Courts ⇐280.4

In absence of possibility that adjudication in state courts would eliminate necessity for federal district court to pass upon plaintiffs' Ninth Amendment claim respecting constitutionality of Texas abortion laws or physician's attack on laws for vagueness, abstention as to plaintiffs' request for declaratory judgment was unwarranted. Vernon's Ann.Tex.P.C. arts. 1191–1194, 1196; U.S.C.A.Const. Amend. 9.

5. Abortion ⇐1

Texas laws prohibiting abortions except for purpose of saving life of mother deprived single women and married couples of their right, secured by the Ninth Amendment, to choose whether to have children. Vernon's Ann.Tex.P.C. arts. 1191–1194, 1196; U.S.C.A.Const. Amend. 9.

6. Constitutional Law ⇐48

District attorney had burden to demonstrate that infringement by state abortion laws upon plaintiffs' fundamental right to chose whether to have children was necessary to support compelling state interest. Vernon's Ann.Tex.P.C. arts. 1191–1194, 1196.

7. Constitutional Law ⇐38

Fact that statutory scheme serves permissible or even compelling state interests will not save it from consequences of unconstitutional overbreadth.

8. Abortion ⇐1

While Ninth Amendment right to choose to have abortion is not unqualified or unfettered, statute designed to regulate circumstances of abortions must restrict its scope to compelling state interests. Vernon's Ann.Tex.P.C. arts. 1191–1194, 1196; U.S.C.A.Const. Amend. 9.

9. Abortion ⇐1

Texas laws prohibiting abortions except for purpose of saving life of mother are unconstitutionally overbroad in failing to limit scope to compelling state interests. Vernon's Ann.Tex.P.C. arts. 1191–1194, 1196; U.S.C.A.Const. Amend. 9.

10. Criminal Law ⇐13

Texas laws prohibiting abortions except for purpose of saving life of mother are unconstitutionally vague in failing to provide physicians with proper notice of what acts in their daily practice and consultation will subject them to criminal liability. Vernon's Ann.Tex.P.C. arts. 1191–1194, 1196.

11. Courts ⇐508(7)

Federal policy of noninterference with state criminal prosecutions must be followed except in cases where statutes are justifiably attacked on their face as abridging free expression, or where statutes are justifiably attacked as applied for the purpose of discouraging protected activities. U.S.C.A.Const. Amends. 1, 9.

12. Courts ⇐508(7)

Texas abortion laws, although unconstitutional in depriving single women and married couples of right secured by Ninth Amendment to choose whether to have children and as being vague and overbroad, could not be justifiably attacked on their face as abridging free expression or as being applied for purpose of discouraging protected activities, and federal court would abstain from enjoining enforcement of the laws. Vernon's Ann.Tex.P.C. arts. 1191–1194, 1196; U.S. C.A.Const. Amends. 1, 9.

Linda N. Coffee, Dallas, Tex., Sarah Weddington, Austin, Tex., for plaintiffs.

Fred Bruner, Daugherty, Bruner, Lastelick & Anderson, Ray L. Merrill, Jr., Dallas, Tex., for intervenor.

John B. Tolle, Asst. Dist. Atty., Dallas, Tex., Jay Floyd, Asst. Atty. Gen., Austin, Tex., for defendant.

Before GOLDBERG, Circuit Judge, and HUGHES and TAYLOR, District Judges.

1. On March 3, 1970, plaintiff Jane Roe filed her original complaint in CA-3-3690-B under the First, Fourth, Fifth, Eighth, Ninth, and Fourteenth Amendments to the United States Constitution. She alleged jurisdiction to be conferred upon the Court by Title 28, United States Code, Sections 1331, 1343, 2201, 2202, 2281, and 2284 and by Title 42, United States Code, Section 1983. On April 22, plaintiff Roe amended her complaint to sue "on behalf of herself and all others similarly situated."

On March 23, James Hubert Hallford, M. D., was given leave to intervene. Hallford's complaint recited the same constitutional and jurisdictional grounds as the complaint of plaintiff Roe. According to his petition for intervention, Hallford seeks to represent "himself and the class of people who are physicians, licensed to practice medicine under the laws of the State of Texas and who fear future prosecution."

On March 3, 1970, plaintiffs John and Mary Doe filed their original complaint in CA-3-3691-C. The complaint of plaintiffs Doe recited the same constitutional and jurisdictional grounds as had the complaint of plaintiff Roe in CA-3-3690 and, like Roe, plaintiffs Doe subsequently amended their complaint so as to assert a class action.

Plaintiffs Roe and Doe have adopted pseudonyms for purposes of anonymity.

PER CURIAM:

Two similar cases are presently before the Court on motions for summary judgment pursuant to Rule 56 of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure. The defendant in both cases is Henry Wade, District Attorney of Dallas County, Texas. In one action plaintiffs are John and Mary Doe, and in the other Jane Roe and James Hubert Hallford, M.D., intervenor.[1]

[1] From their respective positions of married couple, single woman, and practicing physician, plaintiffs attack Articles 1191, 1192, 1193, 1194, and 1196 of the Texas Penal Code,[2] hereinafter referred to as the Texas Abortion Laws. Plaintiffs allege that the Texas Abortion Laws deprive married couples and single women of the right to choose whether to have children, a right secured by the Ninth Amendment.

2. Article 1191 Abortion

If any person shall designedly administer to a pregnant woman or knowingly procure to be administered with her consent any drug or medicine, or shall use towards her any violence or means whatever externally or internally applied, and thereby procure an abortion, he shall be confined in the penitentiary not less than two nor more than five years; if it be done without her consent, the punishment shall be doubled. By "abortion" is meant that the life of the fetus or embryo shall be destroyed in the woman's womb or that a premature birth thereof be caused.

Article 1192 Furnishing the Means

Whoever furnishes the means for procuring an abortion knowing the purpose intended is guilty as an accomplice.

Article 1193 Attempt at Abortion

If the means used shall fail to produce an abortion, the offender is nevertheless guilty of an attempt to produce abortion, provided it be shown that such means were calculated to produce that result, and shall be fined not less than one hundred nor more than one thousand dollars.

Article 1194 Murder in Producing Abortion

If the death of the mother is occasioned by an abortion so produced or by an attempt to effect the same it is murder.

Article 1196 By Medical Advice

Nothing in this chapter applies to an abortion procured or attempted by medical advice for the purpose of saving the life of the mother.

Defendant challenges the standing of each of the plaintiffs to bring this action. However, it appears to the Court that Plaintiff Roe and plaintiff-intervenor Hallford occupy positions vis-a-vis the Texas Abortion Laws sufficient to differentiate them from the general public. Compare Pierce v. Society of Sisters, 268 U.S. 510, 45 S.Ct. 571, 69 L.Ed. 1070 (1925), and Griswold v. Connecticut, 381 U.S. 479, 85 S.Ct. 1678, 14 L.Ed.2d 510 (1965),[3] with Frothingham v. Mellon, 262 U.S. 447, 43 S.Ct. 597, 67 L. Ed. 1078 (1923). Plaintiff Roe filed her portion of the suit as a pregnant woman wishing to exercise the asserted constitutional right to choose whether to bear the child she was carrying. Intervenor Hallford alleged in his portion of the suit that, in the course of daily exercise of his duty as a physician and in order to give his patients access to what he asserts to be their constitutional right to choose whether to have children, he must act so as to render criminal liability for himself under the Texas Abortion Laws a likelihood. Dr. Hallford further alleges that Article 1196 of the Texas Abortion Laws is so vague as to deprive him of warning of what produces criminal liability in that portion of his medical practice and consultations involving abortions.

[2] On the basis of plaintiffs' substantive contentions,[4] it appears that there then exists a "nexus between the status asserted by the litigant[s] and the claim[s] [they present]." Flast v. Cohen, 392 U.S. 83, 102, 88 S.Ct. 1942, 20 L.Ed.2d 947 (1968).

[3] Further, we are satisfied that there presently exists a degree of contentiousness between Roe and Hallford and the defendant to establish a "case of actual controversy" as required by Title 28, United States Code, Section 2201. Golden v. Zwickler, 394 U.S. 103, 89 S.Ct. 956, 22 L.Ed.2d 113 (1969).

Each plaintiff seeks as relief, first, a judgment declaring the Texas Abortion Laws unconstitutional on their face and, second, an injunction against their enforcement. The nature of the relief requested suggests the order in which the issues presented should be passed upon.[5] Accordingly, we see the issues presented as follows:

I. Are plaintiffs entitled to a declaratory judgment that the Texas Abortion Laws are unconstitutional on their face?

II. Are plaintiffs entitled to an injunction against the enforcement of these laws?

I.

Defendants have suggested that this Court should abstain from rendering a decision on plaintiffs' request for a declaratory judgment. However, we are guided to an opposite conclusion by the authority of Zwickler v. Koota, 389 U.S. 241, 248–249, 88 S.Ct. 391, 19 L.Ed.2d 444 (1967):

> "The judge-made doctrine of abstention * * * sanctions * * * escape only in narrowly limited 'special circumstances.' * * * One of the 'special circumstances' * * * is the susceptibility of a state statute of a construction by the state courts that would avoid or modify the constitutional question."

The Court in Zwickler v. Koota subsequently quoted from United States v. Livingston, 179 F.Supp. 9, 12–13 (E.D. S.C.1959):

> "Regard for the interest and sovereignty of the state and reluctance

3. By the authority of Griswold, Dr. Hallford has standing to raise the rights of his patients, single women and married couples, as well as rights of his own.

4. "[I]n ruling on standing, it is both appropriate and necessary to look to the substantive issues * * * to determine whether there is a logical nexus between the status asserted and the claim sought to be adjudicated." Flast v. Cohen, 392 U.S. 83, 102, 88 S.Ct. 1942, 20 L.Ed.2d 947 (1968).

5. Zwickler v. Koota, 389 U.S. 241, 254, 88 S.Ct. 391, 19 L.Ed.2d 444 (1967); Cameron v. Johnson, 390 U.S. 611, 615, 88 S.Ct. 1335, 20 L.Ed.2d 182 (1968).

needlessly to adjudicate constitutional issues may require a federal District Court to abstain from adjudication if the parties may avail themselves of an appropriate procedure to obtain state interpretation of state laws requiring construction. * * * The decision in [Harrison v. N.A.A.C.P., 360 U.S. 167, 79 S.Ct. 1025, 3 L.Ed.2d 1152], however, is not a broad encyclical commanding automatic remission to the state courts of all federal constitutional questions arising in the application of state statutes. * * * Though never interpreted by a state court, if a state statute is not fairly subject to an interpretation which will avoid or modify the federal constitutional question, it is the duty of a federal court to decide the federal question when presented to it. Any other course would impose expense and long delay upon the litigants without hope of its bearing fruit."[6]

[4] Inasmuch as there is no possibility that state question adjudication in the courts of Texas would eliminate the necessity for this Court to pass upon plaintiffs' Ninth Amendment claim or Dr. Hallford's attack on Article 1196 for vagueness, abstention as to their request for declaratory judgment is unwarranted. Compare City of Chicago v. Atchison, T. & S. F. R. Co., 357 U.S. 77, 84, 78 S.Ct. 1063, 2 L.Ed.2d 1174 (1958), with Reetz v. Bozanich, 397 U.S. 82, 90 S.Ct. 788, 25 L.Ed.2d 68 (1970).

[5] On the merits, plaintiffs argue as their principal contention[7] that the Texas Abortion Laws must be declared unconstitutional because they deprive single women and married couples of their right, secured by the Ninth Amendment,[8] to choose whether to have children. We agree.

The essence of the interest sought to be protected here is the right of choice over events which, by their character and consequences, bear in a fundamental manner on the privacy of individuals. The manner by which such interests are secured by the Ninth Amendment is illustrated by the concurring opinion of Mr. Justice Goldberg in Griswold v. Connecticut, 381 U.S. 479, 492, 85 S.Ct. 1678, 14 L.Ed.2d 510 (1965):

"[T]he Ninth Amendment shows a belief of the Constitution's authors that fundamental rights exist that are not expressly enumerated in the first eight amendments and intent that the list of rights included there not be deemed exhaustive." * * *

"The Ninth Amendment simply shows the intent of the Constitution's authors that other fundamental personal rights should not be denied such protection or disparaged in any other way simply because they are not specifically listed in the first eight constitutional amendments." (Emphasis added.)[9]

Relative sanctuaries for such "fundamental" interests have been established

6. 389 U.S. at 250–251, 88 S.Ct. at 396–397. (Citations omitted.)

7. Aside from their Ninth Amendment and vagueness arguments, plaintiffs have presented an array of constitutional arguments. However, as plaintiffs conceded in oral argument, these additional arguments are peripheral to the main issues. Consequently, they will not be passed upon.

8. "The enumeration in the Constitution, of certain rights shall not be construed to deny or disparage others retained by the people."

9. At 492, 85 S.Ct. at 1686 the opinion states: "In determining which rights are fundamental, judges are not left at large to decide cases in light of their personal and private notions. Rather, they must look to the 'traditions and [collective] conscience of our people' to determine whether a principle is 'so rooted [there] * * * as to be ranked as fundamental'. Snyder v. [Commonwealth of] Massachusetts, 291 U.S. 97, 105 [54 S.Ct. 330, 78 L.Ed. 674]. The inquiry is whether a right involved 'is of such a character that it cannot be denied without violating those "fundamental principles of liberty and justice which lie at the base of all our civil and political institutions." * * *' Powell v. Alabama, 287 U.S. 45, 67 [53 S.Ct. 55, 77 L.Ed. 158]."

for the family,[10] the marital couple,[11] and the individual.[12]

Freedom to choose in the matter of abortions has been accorded the status of a "fundamental" right in every case coming to the attention of this Court where the question has been raised. Babbitz v. McCann, 312 F.Supp. 725 (E.D. Wis.1970); People v. Belous, 80 Cal. Rptr. 354, 458 P.2d 194 (Cal.1969); State v. Munson, (South Dakota Circuit Court, Pennington County, April 6, 1970). Accord, United States v. Vuitch, 305 F.Supp. 1032 (D.D.C.1969). The California Supreme Court in Belous stated:

> "The fundamental right of the woman to choose whether to bear children follows from the Supreme Court's and this court's repeated acknowledgment of a 'right of privacy' or 'liberty' in matters related to marriage, family, and sex." 80 Cal.Rptr. at 359, 458 P.2d at 199.

The District Court in Vuitch wrote:

> "There has been * * * an increasing indication in the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States that as a secular matter a woman's liberty and right of privacy extends to family, marriage and sex matters and may well include the right to remove an unwanted child at least in early stages of pregnancy." 305 F.Supp. at 1035.

Writing about Griswold v. Connecticut, supra, and the decisions leading up to it, former Associate Justice Tom C. Clark observed:

> "The result of these decisions is the evolution of the concept that there is a certain zone of individual privacy which is protected by the Constitution. Unless the State has a compelling subordinating interest that outweighs the individual rights of human beings, it may not interfere with a person's marriage, home, children and day-to-day living habits. This is one of the most fundamental concepts that the Founding Fathers had in mind when they drafted the Constitution." [13]

[6] Since the Texas Abortion Laws infringe upon plaintiffs' fundamental right to choose whether to have children, the burden is on the defendant to demonstrate to the satisfaction of the Court that such infringement is necessary to support a compelling state interest.[14] The defendant has failed to meet this burden.

13. Religion, Morality, and Abortion: A Constitutional Appraisal, 2 Loyola Univ. L.Rev. 1, 8 (1969). Mr. Justice Clark goes on to write, "* * * abortion falls within that sensitive area of privacy—the marital relation. One of the basic values of this privacy is birth control, as evidenced by the Griswold decision. Griswold's act was to prevent formation of the fetus. This, the Court found, was constitutionally protected. If an individual may prevent contraception, why can he not nullify that conception when prevention has failed?" Id. at 9.

14. "In a long series of cases this Court has held that where fundamental personal liberties are involved, they may not be abridged by the States simply on a showing that a regulatory statute has some rational relationship to the effectuation of a proper state purpose. 'Where there is a significant encroachment upon personal liberty, the State may prevail only upon showing a subordinating interest which is compelling.' Bates v. [City of] Little Rock, 361 U.S. 516, 524 [80 S.Ct. 412, 4 L.Ed.2d 480]." Griswold v. Connecticut, 381 U.S. 479, 497, 85 S.Ct. 1678, 14 L.Ed.2d 510 (1965) (concurring opinion of Mr. Justice Goldberg). See also Kramer v. Union Free School District, 395 U.S. 621, 89 S.Ct. 1886, 23 L.Ed.2d 583 (1969).

To be sure, the defendant has presented the Court with several compelling justifications for state presence in the area of abortions. These include the legitimate interests of the state in seeing to it that abortions are performed by competent persons and in adequate surroundings. Concern over abortion of the "quickened" fetus may well rank as another such interest. The difficulty with the Texas Abortion Laws is that, even if they promote these interests,[15] they far outstrip these justifications in their impact by prohibiting all abortions except those performed "for the purpose of saving the life of the mother." [16]

[7–9] It is axiomatic that the fact that a statutory scheme serves permissible or even compelling state interests will not save it from the consequences of unconstitutional overbreadth. E. g., Thornhill v. Alabama, 310 U.S. 88, 60 S.Ct. 736, 84 L.Ed. 1093 (1940); Buchanan v. Batchelor, 308 F.Supp. 729 (N.D.Tex. 1970). While the Ninth Amendment right to choose to have an abortion is not unqualified or unfettered, a statute designed to regulate the circumstances of abortions must restrict its scope to compelling state interests. There is unconstitutional overbreadth in the Texas Abortion Laws because the Texas Legislature did not limit the scope of the statutes to such interests. On the contrary, the Texas statutes, in their monolithic interdiction, sweep far beyond any areas of compelling state interest.

[10] Not only are the Texas Abortion Laws unconstitutionally overbroad, they are also unconstitutionally vague. The Supreme Court has declared that "a statute which either forbids or requires the doing of an act in terms so vague that men of common intelligence must necessarily guess at its meaning and differ as to its application violates the first essential of due process of law." Connally v. General Construction Co., 269 U.S. 385, 391, 46 S.Ct. 126, 70 L.Ed. 322 (1926). "No one may be required at peril of life, liberty or property to speculate as to the meaning of penal statutes. All are entitled to be informed as to what the State commands or forbids." Lanzetta v. New Jersey, 306 U.S. 451, 453, 59 S.Ct. 618, 83 L.Ed. 888 (1939). See also Giaccio v. Pennsylvania, 382 U.S. 399, 402–403, 86 S.Ct. 518, 15 L.Ed.2d 447 (1966). Under this standard the Texas statutes fail the vagueness test.

The Texas Abortion Laws fail to provide Dr. Hallford and physicians of his class with proper notice of what acts in their daily practice and consultation will subject them to criminal liability. Article 1196 provides:

> "Nothing in this chapter applies to an abortion procured or attempted by medical advice for the purpose of saving the life of the mother."

It is apparent that there are grave and manifold uncertainties in the application of Article 1196. How likely must death be? Must death be certain if the abortion is not performed? Is it enough that the woman could not undergo birth without an ascertainably higher possibility of death than would normally be the case? What if the woman threatened suicide if the abortion was not performed? How imminent must death be if the abortion is not performed? Is it sufficient if having the child will shorten the life of the woman by a number of years? These questions simply cannot be answered.

The grave uncertainties in the application of Article 1196 and the consequent uncertainty concerning criminal liability under the related abortion statutes are more than sufficient to render the Texas Abortion Laws unconstitutionally vague in violation of the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment.

15. It is not clear whether the Texas laws presently serve the interests asserted by the defendant. For instance, the Court gathers from a reading of the challenged statutes that they presently would permit an abortion "for the purpose of saving the life of the mother" to be performed anywhere and quite possibly by one other than a physician.

16. Article 1196.

II.

We come finally to a consideration of the appropriateness of plaintiffs' request for injunctive relief. Plaintiffs have suggested in oral argument that, should the Court declare the Texas Abortion Laws unconstitutional, that decision would of itself warrant the issuance of an injunction against state enforcement of the statutes. However, the Court is of the opinion that it must abstain from granting the injunction.

Clearly, the question whether to abstain concerning an injunction against the enforcement of state criminal laws is divorced from concerns of abstention in rendering a declaratory judgment. Quoting from Zwickler v. Koota,

> "[A] request for a declaratory judgment that a state statute is overbroad on its face must be considered independently of any request for injunctive relief against enforcement of that statute. We hold that a federal district court has the duty to decide the appropriateness and merits of the declaratory request irrespective of its conclusion as to the propriety of the issuance of the injunction." 389 U.S. at 254, 88 S.Ct. at 399.

[11] The strong reluctance of federal courts to interfere with the process of state criminal procedure was reflected in Dombrowski v. Pfister, 380 U.S. 479, 484–485, 85 SCt. 1116, 1120–21, 14 L.Ed. 2d 22 (1965):

> "[T]he Court has recognized that federal interference with a State's good-faith administration of its criminal laws is peculiarly inconsistent with our federal framework. It is generally to be assumed that state courts and prosecutors will observe constitutional limitations as expounded by this Court, and that the mere possibility of erroneous initial application of constitutional standards will usually not amount to the irreparable injury necessary to justify a disruption of orderly state proceedings."

This federal policy of non-interference with state criminal prosecutions must be followed except in cases where "statutes are justifiably attacked on their face as abridging free expression," or where statutes are justifiably attacked "as applied for the purpose of discouraging protected activities." Dombrowski v. Pfister, 380 U.S. at 489–490, 85 S.Ct. at 1122.

[12] Neither of the above prerequisites can be found here. While plaintiffs' first substantive argument rests on notions of privacy which are to a degree common to the First and Ninth Amendments, we do not believe that plaintiffs can seriously argue that the Texas Abortion Laws are vulnerable "on their face as abridging free expression." [17] Further, deliberate application of the statutes "for the purpose of discouraging protected activities" has not been alleged. We therefore conclude that we must abstrain from issuing an injunction against enforcement of the Texas Abortion Laws.

CONCLUSION

In the absence of any contested issues of fact, we hold that the motions for summary judgment of the plaintiff Roe and plaintiff-intervenor Hallford should be granted as to their request for declaratory judgment. In granting declaratory relief, we find the Texas Abortion Laws unconstitutional for vagueness and overbreadth, though for the reasons herein stated we decline to issue an injunction. We need not here delineate the factors which could qualify the right of a mother to have an abortion. It is sufficient to state that legislation concerning abortion must address itself to more than a bare negation of that right.

17. "[T]he door is not open to all who would test the validity of state statutes or conduct a federally supervised pre-trial of a state prosecution by the simple expedient of alleging that the prosecution somehow affects First Amendment rights." Porter v. Kimzey, 309 F.Supp. 993, 995 (N.D.Ga.1970).

JUDGMENT

This action came on for hearing on motions for summary judgment before a three-judge court composed of Irving L. Goldberg, Circuit Judge, Sarah T. Hughes and W. M. Taylor, Jr., District Judges. The defendant in both cases is Henry Wade, District Attorney of Dallas County, Texas. In one action plaintiffs are John and Mary Doe, husband and wife, and in the other Jane Roe and James Hubert Hallford, M.D., intervenor.

The case having been heard on the merits, the Court, upon consideration of affidavits, briefs and arguments of counsel, finds as follows:

Findings of Fact

(1) Plaintiff Jane Roe, plaintiff-intervenor James Hubert Hallford, M.D., and the members of their respective classes have standing to bring this lawsuit.

(2) Plaintiffs John and Mary Doe failed to allege facts sufficient to create a present controversy and therefore do not have standing.

(3) Articles 1191, 1192, 1193, 1194 and 1196 of the Texas Penal Code, hereinafter referred to as the Texas Abortion Laws, are so written as to deprive single women and married persons of the opportunity to choose whether to have children.

(4) The Texas Abortion Laws are so vaguely worded as to produce grave and manifold uncertainties concerning the circumstances which would produce criminal liability.

Conclusions of Law

(1) This case is a proper one for a three-judge court.

(2) Abstention, concerning plaintiffs' request for a declaratory judgment, is unwarranted.

(3) The fundamental right of single women and married persons to choose whether to have children is protected by the Ninth Amendment, through the Fourteenth Amendment.

(4) The Texas Abortion Laws infringe upon this right.

(5) The defendant has not demonstrated that the infringement of plaintiffs' Ninth Amendment rights by the Texas Abortion Laws is necessary to support a compelling state interest.

(6) The Texas Abortion Laws are consequently void on their face because they are unconstitutionally overbroad.

(7) The Texas Abortion Laws are void on their face because they are vague in violation of the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment.

(8) Abstention, concerning plaintiffs' request for an injunction against the enforcement of the Texas Abortion Laws, is warranted.

It is therefore ordered, adjudged and decreed that: (1) the complaint of John and Mary Doe be dismissed; (2) the Texas Abortion Laws are declared void on their face for unconstitutional overbreadth and for vagueness; (3) plaintiffs' application for injunction be dismissed.

v.

Arthur K. BOLTON, as Attorney General of the State of Georgia, Lewis R. Slaton as District Attorney of Fulton County, Georgia and Herbert T. Jenkins, as Chief of Police of the City of Atlanta.

Civ. A. No. 13676.

United States District Court,
N. D. Georgia,
Atlanta Division.
July 31, 1970.
Supplemental Opinion Oct. 14, 1970.

Class action attacking validity of state abortion statute. A Three-Judge District Court held that claims by physicians and nurses that because of state abortion statute they were not free to perform or counsel obtaining of abortions and were therefore unconstitutionally restricted in practice of their professions did not present justiciable controversy and that statute was invalid to extent it limited cases in which abortion could be performed.

Order accordingly.

1. Federal Civil Procedure ⇐9

State Attorney General who was required to represent state in legal proceedings or to give opinion on abortion statute when requested by Governor and who was head of department which was vested with jurisdiction in all matters of law relating to governmental departments, boards and agencies was proper defendant in class action attacking state abortion statute. 28 U.S.C.A. §§ 1343, 2201, 2202; 42 U.S.C.A. § 1983; Code Ga. §§ 26–1201 et seq., 40–1602, 40–1614; Const.Ga. art. 6, § 10, par. 2.

2. Declaratory Judgment ⇐292

Physicians, nurses, ministers and social workers who claimed that because of state statute they were not free to perform or counsel obtaining of abortions and were therefore unconstitutionally restricted in practice of their professions had standing to bring action seeking declaratory judgment as to validity and injunction against enforcement of statute. 28 U.S.C.A. §§ 1343, 2201, 2202; 42 U.S.C.A. § 1983; Code Ga. § 26–1201 et seq.

3. Declaratory Judgment ⇐274

For federal courts to have jurisdiction in declaratory judgment proceeding attacking validity of state statute, there must be actual controversy in which constitutionality of statute is drawn into question in truly adversary context. U.S.C.A.Const. art. 3, § 2.

4. Declaratory Judgment ⇐121

Where plaintiff's request for therapeutic abortion had been denied by hospital committee on ground that her situation did not come within terms of state abortion statute, there was actual interference with claimed constitutional right by decision of body which state had vested with power to grant or deny legal abortions and plaintiff's declaratory judgment action attacking statute presented justiciable controversy. 28 U.S.C.A. §§ 1343, 2201, 2202; 42 U.S.C.A. § 1983; Code Ga. §§ 26–1201, 26–1202, 26–1202(a) (1–3), (b).

5. Declaratory Judgment ⇐123

Claims by physicians and nurses that because of state abortion statute they were not free to perform or counsel obtaining of abortions and were therefore unconstitutionally restricted in practice of their professions did not present justiciable controversy. 28 U.S.C.A. §§ 1343, 2201, 2202; 42 U.S.C.A. § 1983; Code Ga. §§ 26–1201, 26–1202, 26–1202(a) (1–3), (b).

6. Courts ⇐489(1)

There is no requirement that litigant in federal court exhaust state judicial remedies, where he is asserting claim in proceeding other than habeas corpus involving subject over which federal and state courts have concurrent jurisdiction.

7. Abortion ⇐1

State may not unduly limit reasons for which woman may obtain abortion but may legitimately require that decision to terminate her pregnancy be one reached only on consideration of more factors than desires of woman and her ability to find willing physician. U.S.C.A.Const. Amends. 9, 14; Code Ga. § 26–1201 et seq.

8. Constitutional Law ⇐82

Concept of personal liberty embodies right to privacy which apparently is also broad enough to include decision to abort pregnancy. U.S.C.A.Const. Amend. 9.

9. Abortion ⇐1

Once embryo has formed, decision to abort its development cannot be considered purely private one affecting only man and woman and state may assert legitimate area of control short of invasion of personal right of initial decision. U.S.C.A.Const. Amends. 9, 14; Code Ga. § 26–1201 et seq.

10. Constitutional Law ⇐250

Mere fact that physicians and psychiatrists are more accessible to rich people than to poor people, making abortions more available to wealthy than to indigent, is not in itself a violation of equal protection. U.S.C.A.Const. Amend. 14; Code Ga. § 26–1201 et seq.

11. Abortion ⇐1

Reasons for abortion may not be prescribed but quality of decision as well as manner of its execution are properly within realm of state control. U.S.C.A. Const. Amends. 9, 14; Code Ga. § 26–1201 et seq.

12. Abortion ⇐1

Declaratory Judgment ⇐22

State abortion statute to extent it limited cases in which physician could legally perform abortion to cases where continuation of pregnancy would endanger life of woman, fetus would very likely be born with irremediable mental or physical defect or pregnancy resulted from forcible or statutory rape in which case woman must give written statement under oath as to time and place of rape and name of rapist, if known with copy of statement going to law enforcement officials and to extent it provided for declaratory judgment action as to validity of abortion to be performed was unconstitutional. U.S.C.A.Const. Amends. 9, 14; Code Ga. § 26–1202(a) (1–3), (b) (3, 6), (c).

13. Courts ⇐508(7)

Although federal court found that state abortion statute was unconstitutional in certain respects, injunction against state prosecutions which had not been instituted would be denied. 28 U.S.C.A. §§ 1343, 2201, 2202; 42 U.S.C.A. § 1983; Code Ga. § 26–1201 et seq.

Supplemental Opinion

14. Federal Civil Procedure ⇐331

Where hospital which had previously denied application for abortion reconsidered and granted application, motion by party seeking abortion to intervene in class action attacking state abortion statute would be denied.

15. Federal Civil Procedure ⇐331

In absence of showing that pregnant woman who had been denied abortion at one hospital because of state statute could not adequately represent tangential interest of another pregnant woman who had been denied abortion at another hospital, motion by latter woman to intervene in class action attacking state abortion statute would be denied.

16. Abortion ⇐1

Where court declared state abortion statute invalid to extent it limited reasons for granting of abortion but upheld requirement of approval by hospital committee before abortion is performed, any action of committee in adopting same reasons for permitting abortion as had been declared invalid was itself invalid.

PER CURIAM.

This is an action for declaratory and injunctive relief brought pursuant to 28 U.S.C.A. §§ 2201 and 2202, and 42 U.S.C. A. § 1983 and 28 U.S.C.A. § 1343. It is a class action attacking Ga. Code Ann. § 26–1201 et seq. (1969) Georgia's "Abortion Act."

Plaintiffs claim to represent four sub-classes: pregnant women, single or married, wishing legal abortions; licensed physicians who wish to perform or counsel performance of legal abortions; registered nurses who desire to participate in performing or counsel performance of legal abortions; and ministers and social workers who wish to be free to advise abortion in counselling pregnant women.

Plaintiffs seek an order declaring Georgia's Abortion Statute unconstitutional and enjoining its enforcement on various grounds:

(1) the Statute is unconstitutionally vague and indefinite on its face and as applied, failing to provide sufficient warning of the conduct proscribed, in violation of the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment to the United States Constitution;

(2) Georgia's Abortion Statute unconstitutionally abridges a woman's right to decide to terminate an unwanted pregnancy, in restricting that fundamental liberty without an overriding compelling state interest;

(3) the Statute unconstitutionally restricts the right of the physicians, nurses, ministers and social workers to practice their professions;

(4) Georgia's Abortion Statute produces discrimination against poor and non-white women in violation of the Equal Protection Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment to the United States Constitution.

PENDING MOTIONS

Arthur K. Bolton, sued in his official capacity as Attorney General of Georgia has moved for an order dismissing the claim against him on the ground that no relief could be granted against him since he is not charged generally with the enforcement, application or administration of the Georgia criminal statutes.

[1] As plaintiffs observe, Article VI, § X, Par. II of the Georgia Constitution, Ga. Code Ann. § 2-4502 (1933) requires the Attorney General to represent the State in any civil or criminal case when required by the Governor. Furthermore, he may be required to give the Governor advisory opinions on the abortion statute. Ga. Code Ann. § 40-1602 (1933). Finally, the Attorney General is head of the Department of Law, which is vested with authority and jurisdiction in all matters of law relating to governmental departments, boards and agencies. Ga. Code Ann. § 40-1614 (1943). The Attorney General has sufficient connection with enforcement of the statutes attacked to justify retaining him as a party.[1] See Arneson v. Denny, 25 F.2d 993 (W.D.Wash.1928); Jackson v. Colorado, 294 F.Supp. 1065, 1072 (D.Colo.1968); James v. Almond, 170 F.Supp. 331, 341-342 (E.D.Va.1959); International Longshoremen's & Warehousemen's Union v. Ackerman, 82 F. Supp. 65, 124 (D.Haw.1948), rev'd on other grounds 187 F.2d 860 (9th Cir. 1951); Bevins v. Prindable, 39 F.Supp. 708, 710 (E.D.Ill.1941). Accordingly, that motion is denied.

The Attorney General has also objected to interrogatories which plaintiffs served for answer by a witness, Roger Rochat, M. D. In view of the disposition of this case made below, no ruling on this motion is necessary.

The motion of Ferdinand Buckley, Esquire, for reconsideration of the revocation of his appointment as guardian ad litem will be dealt with in connection with the discussion under MERITS below.

The motion of the National Legal Program on Health Problems of the Poor to submit a brief as amicus curiae is granted.

The defendant Lewis R. Slaton, District Attorney of Fulton County, filed motions seeking orders requiring disclosure of plaintiff's identity, granting a continuance for discovery for a reasonable time thereafter, and requiring plaintiff to submit to a physical and mental examination. In view of the reasons for which it is held that the complaint of this plaintiff presented a justi-

JURISDICTION

A. Substantial Constitutional Question.

A three-judge court was convened pursuant to 28 U.S.C.A. §§ 2281 and 2284. Such action is proper where plaintiffs attack the constitutionality of a state statute, raising a substantial constitutional question, and seek equitable relief against its enforcement. Idlewild Bon Voyage Liquor Corp. v. Epstein, 370 U.S. 713, 715, 82 S.Ct. 1294, 8 L.Ed.2d 794 (1962).

Plaintiffs here attack the constitutionality of Ga. Code Ann. § 26-1201 et seq. (1969) on the grounds that it infringes rights protected by various Amendments to the United States Constitution. They seek an injunction against enforcement. In light of recent cases on the subject of the Constitutional right to an abortion, this Constitutional question appears substantial. See Roe v. Wade, 314 F.Supp. 1217 (N.D.Tex., June 17, 1970); Doe v. Randall, 314 F.Supp. 32 (D.Minn., May 19, 1970); Doe v. Scott, 310 F.Supp. 688 (N.D.Ill., March 27, 1970); Babbitz v. McCann, 310 F.Supp. 293 (E.D. Wis.1970); United States v. Vuitch, 305 F.Supp. 1032 (D.D.C.1969), app. docketed, No. 1155 (February 5, 1970); California v. Belous, 71 Cal.2d 954, 80 Cal.Rptr. 354, 458 P.2d 194 (1969), cert. den. 397 U.S. 915, 90 S.Ct. 920, 25 L. Ed.2d 96 (1970).

B. Justiciability.

Standing

By motion to dismiss, Lewis R. Slaton, District Attorney of Fulton County, contends that all plaintiffs other than Mary Doe lack standing to maintain this action. The basis for the claims of these plaintiffs is that because they are not free to perform or counsel the obtaining of abortions, they are unconstitutionally restricted in the practice of their professions.

There are certainly instances in which any of these plaintiffs would have standing to claim a constitutional right to practice his profession, and infringement thereof. For instance, few would dispute that a social worker being prosecuted for conspiracy because he (or she) counselled obtaining an abortion, and referred the client to a physician for the abortion, would have standing to seek a declaratory judgment of his (or her) asserted constitutional right and infringement thereof. See Griswold v. Connecticut, 381 U.S. 479, 85 S.Ct. 1678, 14 L. Ed.2d 510 (1965).

But absent prosecution or indictment, that these plaintiffs do have standing is more difficult to see. Whether their claim is otherwise justiciable is irrelevant. Flast v. Cohen, 392 U.S. 83, 100 n. 21, 99 S.Ct. 1942, 20 L.Ed.2d 947 (1968). The sole issue is whether there is a logical link between the status they assert (physician, nurse) and the claim they seek adjudicated, or between their status and both the type of enactment attacked and the nature of the constitutional infringement alleged. 392 U.S. at 102, 88 S.Ct. 1942.

[2] Under either test, all the plaintiffs have standing. As physicians, nurses, ministers or social workers they attack a criminal statute potentially applicable to them, on the grounds that it unconstitutionally restricts their right to practice. Accordingly, the motion to dismiss for lack of standing is denied.

Collision of Interests

[3] Article III of the United States Constitution limits the jurisdiction of the federal courts to cases and controversies. And it is well established that in actions for declaratory judgments, a District Court may not render an advisory opinion on the constitutionality of a state statute. Rather there must be "exigent adversity," an actual controversy in which the constitutionality of the statute is drawn into question in a truly adversary context. See Golden v. Zwickler, 394 U.S. 103, 108, 89 S.Ct. 956, 22

L.Ed.2d 113 (1969); Poe v. Ullman, 367 U.S. 497, 81 S.Ct. 1752, 6 L.Ed.2d 989 (1961); United Public Workers of America v. Mitchell, 330 U.S. 75, 89, 67 S.Ct. 556, 91 L.Ed. 754 (1947).

Most akin to the instant case is Poe v. Ullman, 367 U.S. 497, 81 S.Ct. 1752, 6 L.Ed.2d 989 (1961). There, a married couple, a married woman and their physician sought a declaratory judgment that Connecticut's statutes prohibiting the use of contraceptive devices and the giving of medical advice in the use of such devices violated plaintiffs' Fourteenth Amendment rights, depriving them of life and liberty without due process of law. None of the plaintiffs had been indicted or prosecuted under the statutes. There had been only one recorded prosecution for violation of the statutes in the seventy-five years since their enactment, and that single instance occurred twenty years before the declaratory judgment action was brought. The Supreme Court suggested that the lack of a pending prosecution or immediate threat of such prosecution against the particular plaintiffs made the claims non-justiciable, citing United Public Workers of America v. Mitchell, 330 U.S. 75, 67 S.Ct. 556, 91 L.Ed. 754 (1947). Poe v. Ullman, 367 U.S. at 501, 81 S.Ct. 1752. But the Justices went on to find that the lack of recorded prosecutions, the unchallenged, open, ubiquitous public sales of contraceptive devices showed a deeply embedded State policy against enforcement, amounting to a tacit agreement not to prosecute violators of the statutes. The majority therefore held:

> "It is clear that the mere existence of a state penal statute would constitute insufficient grounds to support a federal court's adjudication of its constitutionality in proceedings brought against the State's prosecuting officials if real threat of enforcement is wanting." 367 U.S. at 507, 81 S.Ct. at 1758.

However, these three cases seem precedent for the proposition that in the absence of a pending or threatened indictment or prosecution of the particular plaintiffs bringing a declaratory judgment action, a federal court cannot consider the constitutionality of the challenged criminal statute.

However in 1968, the Supreme Court decided Epperson v. Arkansas, 393 U.S. 97, 89 S.Ct. 266, 21 L.Ed.2d 228 (1968), in which a public school teacher argued that the Arkansas statute prohibiting the teaching of evolution was unconstitutional. There was no pending or threatened indictment or prosecution against the teacher. There was no record of any prosecutions under the challenged statute. The teacher's dilemma was solely that (1) the new biology textbooks she was supposed to use in the approaching term contained a chapter on evolution, and (2) her action for a declaratory judgment in state court, granted on the trial level, had been reversed by the Arkansas Supreme Court. The United States Supreme Court majority reached the merits and reversed the decision of the Arkansas Supreme Court in an opinion which summarily brushed aside the question of justiciability. 393 U.S. at 101-102, 89 S.Ct. 266. Apparently, then, the majority felt that the appeal presented a "substantial controversy * * * of sufficient immediacy and reality." Golden v. Zwickler, 394 U.S. 103, 108, 89 S.Ct. 956, 959-960 (1969).

In the instant case, the plaintiff Mary Doe alleges that having properly applied to the Abortion Committee of Grady Memorial Hospital for a legal therapeutic abortion allowed by Ga. Code Ann. § 26-1202 (1969), she was denied an abortion solely on the grounds that her present situation did not come within the terms of Ga. Code Ann. § 26-1202(a) (1) (1969).

Georgia's Abortion Act defines a criminal abortion as the act performed by a person who administers a substance or uses an instrument or other means with intent to produce a miscarriage or abortion. Ga. Code Ann. § 26-1201 (1969). However, Ga. Code Ann. § 26-1202(a) establishes three circumstances under which an abortion shall not be considered a criminal abortion. And Ga. Code Ann. § 26-1202(b) (1969) prescribes procedure which must be followed if an abortion is to be authorized by or performed under 1202(a).

Ga. Code Ann. § 26-1202(b) (1969) provides in relevant part:

"No abortion is authorized or shall be performed under this section unless each of the following conditions is met:

* * * * * *

(5) The performance of the abortion has been approved in advance by a committee of the medical staff of the hospital in which the operation is to be performed. This committee must be one established and maintained in accordance with the standards promulgated by the Joint Commission on the Accreditation of Hospitals, and its approval must be by a majority vote of a membership of not less than three members of the hospital's staff; the physician proposing to perform the operation may not be counted as a member of the committee for this purpose."

[4, 5] Thus, the denial of plaintiff's application for an abortion, on the grounds alleged, was not the decision of a private physician declining to render professional services, occasioned by the mere existence of Georgia's Abortion Act. The statute confers upon the hospital committee power to grant or deny abortions. A decision denying an application for abortion on the ground that the woman's situation does not fall within one of the three enumerated exceptions is an exercise of that power, which allegedly violated plaintiff's constitutional rights. To this extent then, this statute has been invoked against the plaintiff Mary Doe, causing an alleged constitutional deprivation. Here, there has been actual interference with a claimed constitutional right by the decision of a body which the State has vested with power to grant or deny legal abortions. These circumstances put plaintiff and the defendants on opposite sides of a very real and lively controversy, amenable to judicial resolution.

Accordingly, it appears that Mary Doe's complaint, in this context, presents a justiciable controversy. Since the claims of the other plaintiffs do not stand in such a posture, the Attorney General's motion to dismiss must be granted to that extent.

C. Exhaustion.

[6] There is no merit to the defendant Slaton's motion to dismiss for failure to exhaust state remedies. It does not appear that there are any administrative remedies for the denial by a hospital committee of an application for an abortion. And however desirable such a requirement might be for orderly judicial administration, there is no requirement that a litigant in federal court exhaust state judicial remedies, where he is asserting a claim in proceedings other than habeas corpus involving a subject over which the federal and state courts have concurrent jurisdiction. As will appear below, the instant case does not involve granting injunctive relief.

THE MERITS

[7] Plaintiff asserts that certain cases leading up to and following Griswold v. Connecticut, 381 U.S. 479, 85 S. Ct. 1678, 14 L.Ed.2d 510 (1965) establish a Constitutional right to privacy broad enough to encompass the right of a woman to terminate an unwanted pregnancy in its early stages, by obtaining an abortion. See Stanley v. Georgia, 394 U.S. 557, 89 S.Ct. 1243, 22 L.Ed.2d 542 (1969); Loving v. Virginia, 388 U. S. 1, 87 S.Ct. 1817, 18 L.Ed.2d 1010 (1967); Skinner v. Oklahoma, 316 U.S. 535, 62 S.Ct. 1110, 86 L.Ed. 1655 (1942); Olmstead v. United States, 277 U.S. 438, 478, 48 S.Ct. 564, 72 L.Ed. 944 (1928) (dissenting opinion of Mr. Justice Brandeis); Pierce v. Society of Sisters, 268 U.S. 510, 45 S.Ct. 571, 69 L.Ed. 1070 (1925); Meyer v. Nebraska, 262 U.S. 390, 43 S.Ct. 625, 67 L.Ed. 1042 (1923). While the Court agrees that the breadth of the right to privacy encompasses the decision to terminate an unwanted pregnancy, we are unwilling to declare that such a right reposes unbounded in any one individual. Rather, we are of the view that although the state may not unduly limit the reasons for which a woman seeks an abortion, it may legitimately require that the decision to terminate her pregnancy be one reached only upon consideration of more factors than the desires of the woman and her ability to find a willing physician.

In Griswold v. Connecticut, 381 U.S. 479, 85 S.Ct. 1678, 14 L.Ed.2d 510 (1965), the Supreme Court held that the decision to use contraceptive devices is an aspect of a relationship lying within a penumbral zone of privacy created by several fundamental constitutional guarantees, and that a state law forbidding the use of such devices unduly invades that area of protected freedoms with maximum destructive effect upon that relationship. 381 U.S. at 485, 85 S.Ct. 1678. In a concurring opinion, Mr. Justice Goldberg differed with the majority only to the extent stipulating that the right to marital privacy is encompassed in his concept of personal liberty because of the Ninth Amendment, rather than because of penumbral emanations of specific constitutional guarantees.

[8] For whichever reason, the concept of personal liberty embodies a right to privacy which apparently is also broad enough to include the decision to abort a pregnancy.[2] Like the decision to use contraceptive devices, the decision to terminate an unwanted pregnancy is sheltered from state regulation which seeks broadly to limit the reasons for which an abortion may be legally obtained. However, unlike the decision to use contraceptive devices, the decision to abort a pregnancy affects other interests than those of the woman alone, or even husband and wife alone.

[9] Once conception takes place and an embryo forms, for better or for worse the woman carries a life form with the potential of independent human existence.[3] Without positing the existence of a new being with its own identity and federal constitutional rights, we hold that once the embryo has formed, the decision to abort its development cannot be considered a purely private one affecting only husband and wife, man and woman.

A potential human life together with the traditional interests in the health, welfare and morals of its citizenry under the police power grant to the state a legitimate area of control short of an invasion of the personal right of initial decision.

[10] The whole thrust of the present Georgia statute[4] is to treat the problem as a medical one. Such approach is reasonable and seemingly sound inasmuch as medical practitioners are in the best position by virtue of training to judge concurrently the basis as well as the risk inherent in such a decision. In this respect, the state moreover has a legitimate interest in seeing to it that the decisions—personal and medical—is not one

2. We see no connection between this theory and the claimed unlimited right of a woman "to use her body in any way she wishes" read into Griswold by some. There are obvious limitations to the latter such as self abuse, e. g. disease, drugs, suicide, etc. and the rights of others in which the state clearly has an interest. Any such theory in its ultimate is flatly rejected.

3. This view of the impact of conception on the decision not to have children implies that the distinction between a quick and unquick fetus, and even that between embryo and fetus is not relevant here. And since the Court does not postulate the existence of a new being with federal constitutional rights at any time during gestation, the motion of Mr. Ferdinand Buckley for reconsideration of the order revoking his appointment as guardian ad litem for the embryo (or fetus) is denied. Mr. Buckley's motion to intervene in such capacity is also denied. However, he has the Court's appreciation for his participation in this litigation as amicus curiae.

4. Apparently patterned after the American Law Institute, Model Penal Code § 230.3 (Proposed Official Draft, 1962)

undertaken lightly and without careful consideration of all relevant factors, whether they be emotional, economic, psychological, familial or physical. For example, the legislature might require any number of conditions such as consultation with a licensed minister or secular guidance counselor as well as the concurrence of two licensed physicians or any system of approval related to the quality and soundness of the decision in all its aspects. It certainly has a clear right to circumscribe a decision made by a woman alone or by a woman and a single physician and to guard against the establishment of transient "abortion mills" by the occasional opportunistic or unethical practitioner and the concomitant dangers to his patrons and the public. Such controls and requirements, so long as they do not restrict the reasons for the initial decisions and do not violate the Due Process and Equal Protection Clauses of the Fourteenth Amendment, are properly within the sphere of legislative discretion. In that respect, where abortions may be obtained only from licensed physicians and surgeons, and only after psychiatric consultation, the mere fact that physicians and psychiatrists are more accessible to rich people than to poor people, making abortions more available to the wealthy than to the indigent, is not in itself a violation of the Equal Protection Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment to the United States Constitution. Cf. Dandridge v. Williams, 397 U.S. 471, 90 S.Ct. 1153, 25 L.Ed.2d 491 (1970); MacQuarrie v. McLaughlin, 294 F.Supp. 176 (D.Mass. 1968), aff'd 394 U.S. 456, 89 S.Ct. 1224, 22 L.Ed.2d 417 (1969).

Moreover, there is an overriding interest in the manner of performance as well as the quality of the final decision to abort. Obvious need for control through licensing, sanitation requirements and proper medical standards in the execution of a legal abortion are examples. Again such decisions address themselves to legislative decision based upon informed judgment.

[11] Having decided that the reasons for an abortion may not be proscribed, but that the quality of the decision as well as the manner of its execution are properly within the realm of state control, the present statute must be examined in such light.

Rather than regulating merely the quality of the decision to have an abortion, and the manner of its performance, the Georgia statute also limits the number of reasons for which an abortion may be sought. This the State may not do, because such action unduly restricts a decision sheltered by the Constitutional right to privacy. See Griswold v. Connecticut, 381 U.S. 479, 85 S.Ct. 1678, 14 L.Ed.2d 510 (1965); California v. Belous, 71 Cal.2d 954, 80 Cal.Rptr. 354, 458 P.2d 194 (1969), cert. den. 397 U.S. 915, 90 S.Ct. 920, 25 L.Ed.2d 96 (1970). The question becomes a matter of statutory overbreadth.

[12] Based upon the above, the court finds the following portions of Georgia Code § 26–1202 to be in violation of the constitutional rights of petitioner:

A. Section (a) beginning with the word "because" on line 5 and through subsection (a) (3) in its entirety.

B. Section (b) subsection (3) beginning with the word "because" on line 6 and through the end of said subsection.

C. Section (b) subsection (6) in its entirety.

D. Section (c) in its entirety.

There being no showing to the contrary, the court further finds the remainder of said Code § 26–1202 to constitute a proper exercise of state power within the context of this opinion.[5]

5. It is not thereby implied that those provisions constitute the only or best means of state control. On the whole, the present system appears unnecessarily cumbersome, a potential hazard under due process and equal protection considerations.

An appropriate formal declaratory judgment may be presented upon request of any party.

ABSTENTION

[13] It is recognized that there is no pending state court proceeding against which the injunction prayed by plaintiff would operate. Nevertheless, the request for injunctive relief is denied, on the same basis as such a prayer would be denied were a state proceeding actually in progress:

> "* * * the vindication of the defendant's federal rights is left to the state courts except in the rare situations where it can be clearly predicted * * * that those rights will inevitably be denied by the very act of bringing the defendant to trial in the state court." City of Greenwood v. Peacock, 384 U.S. 808, 828, 86 S.Ct. 1800, 1812, 16 L.Ed.2d 944 (1968).

However under the authority of Zwickler v. Koota, 389 U.S. 241, 88 S.Ct. 391, 19 L.Ed.2d 444 (1967), the Court has proceeded to issue the declaratory relief, in spite of its unwillingness to broadly enjoin future prosecutions under the Act. Accordingly, plaintiff's request for a declaratory judgment is hereby granted. Judgment shall issue in the form described above.

It is so ordered.

SUPPLEMENTAL OPINION

Since the Court's opinion of July 31, 1970, several motions have been filed necessitating this opinion and order.

MOTION OF AMICUS CURIAE

Ferdinand Buckley filed a motion on September 3, 1970, to alter or amend the Court's judgment of August 25, 1970, to rule on several of his earlier motions and prayers. Accordingly, that judgment is hereby amended in the following (See FN) respect:

Mr. Buckley's motion for reconsideration of the order revoking his appointment as guardian ad litem for the embryo (or fetus), and his motion to intervene in any representative capacity on behalf of the embryo or fetus is denied. This ruling makes it unnecessary, and the Court declines, to rule on the prayers in the answer and counterclaim Mr. Buckley filed before revocation of his appointment as guardian ad litem.

MOTIONS OF JANE ROE

Jane Roe petitions for leave to intervene as a plaintiff, moves for a temporary restraining order, and asks that the Court clarify and enforce its opinion of July 31, 1970. Said petition, and accordingly also the motion and the request are denied for two reasons.

[14] First, the Court is informed by counsel for all concerned that Georgia Baptist Hospital has reconsidered its earlier decision and subsequently granted Jane Roe's application for an abortion. Said action renders the petition of Jane Roe moot, there now being no sufficient collision of interests between Jane Roe and the defendants.

[15] Second, Jane Roe's petition to intervene makes it clear that her controversy was with Georgia Baptist Hospital, and only tangentially with the defendants in this case. Under such circumstances there is no showing that Mary Doe—representing the class of pregnant women denied abortions because of the Georgia statute attacked—could not adequately represent the tangential interest of Jane Roe in this action. See Allen Calculators, Inc. v. National Cash Register Co., 322 U.S. 137, 141, 64 S.Ct. 905, 88 L.Ed. 1188 (1944); Durkin v. Pet Milk Co., 14 F.R.D. 374 (W.D.Ark.1953).

In spite of the above, the motion presents an aspect of the case which justifies some amplification of the previous declaratory judgment. The court concludes that this should be done by way of amendment sua sponte. Rule 60(b)(6); Klapprott v. United States, 335 U.S. 601, 69 S.Ct. 384, 93 L.Ed. 266 (1948); Bros, Incorporated v. W. E.

Grace Mfg. Co., 320 F.2d 594 (5th Cir. 1963).

The problem relates to the role and function of the "abortion committees" in the several hospitals. Ga. Code § 26-1202b(5). The thrust of the original opinion was to carry out the apparent intent of the Georgia legislature by making the ultimate decision on individual abortions a medical one. However, in line with constitutional principles, the ultimate decision cannot be restricted to the three reasons stated in the statute. This left the abortion committee free to decide whether an abortion was "necessary" on the broader medical basis, namely, the totality of circumstances surrounding each patient.

[16] From the motion it is apparent that those committees who have voluntarily adopted the standards promulgated by the American College of Obstetricians and Gynecologists as controlling have placed themselves in the position of being restricted by the same reasons stated in the statute.[1] What is denied directly cannot be accomplished indirectly. It follows that the abortion committees cannot be limited to the stated reasons as the sole basis for approval of an individual abortion, nor can they so limit themselves by the adoption of such standards. Any such action by a hospital committee is declared to be an unconstitutional exercise of delegated power.

In sum, the statutory processes of approval are left standing. The patient is required to obtain the approval of (1) the certifying physician, (2) the two consulting physicians, and (3) the abortion committee of the admitting hospital. Failure to obtain approval at any level necessarily precludes abortion on that application. A majority of the abortion committee shall control its action, whether for approval or for disapproval.

To the extent stated herein, the original opinion is modified.

It is so ordered.

1. The Georgia statute requires the hospital to apply standards promulgated by the Joint Commission on the Accreditation of Hospitals. No such restrictive reasons for approval of an abortion are contained therein. However, the voluntary standards promulgated by the American College of Obstetricians and Gynecologists in part limit the grounds for abortion to the three stated statutory reasons: injury to health of the mother; danger of grave physical or mental defect to the child; and pregnancy due to rape. Any such limiting restrictions, as seen, must fail. Likewise, lack of consent by the husband, while it may freely be considered by the committee, may not be automatically established as an absolute bar.
By way of additional comment, good faith administration of the statute as now constituted would prohibit a committee from secretly restricting abortions to those statutory reasons, which the court has already deleted. To the contrary, all relevant factors should be considered and an informed medical judgment made.

Cr. 12739.

Supreme Court of California, In Bank.

Sept. 5, 1969.

Rehearing Denied Oct. 1, 1969.

cert. denied, 397 U.S. 915 (1970)

Defendant was convicted in the Superior Court, Los Angeles County, John G. Barnes, J., of abortion and conspiracy to commit an abortion, and he appealed. The Supreme Court, Peters, J., held that statute making a person who performs abortion punishable unless abortion is necessary to preserve mother's life as statute read before amended in 1967 was invalid where term "necessary to preserve" was not susceptible to a construction which, while satisfying legislative intent, was sufficiently certain to satisfy due process requirements without improperly infringing on fundamental constitutional rights of mother to life and to choose whether to bear children, and convictions of abortion and conspiracy to commit abortion could not stand.

Judgment reversed with directions to dismiss indictment.

Burke, McComb, and Sullivan, JJ., dissented.

PETERS, Justice.

Dr. Leon Phillip Belous was convicted in January 1967, after a jury trial, of abortion, in violation of section 274 of the Penal Code, and conspiracy to commit an abortion, in violation of section 182 of the Penal Code, both felonies. The court suspended proceedings, imposed a fine of $5,000, and placed Dr. Belous on probation for two years. He appeals from the order granting probation.

Dr. Belous is a physician and surgeon, licensed since 1931 to practice medicine in the State of California, and specializing in obstetrics and gynecology. He has been on the attending staff of the gynecology department of Cedars of Lebanon Hospital in Los Angeles since 1931, is a fellow of the Los Angeles Gynecology and Obstetrical Society, the American College of Obstetrics and Gynecology, the Abdominal Surgical Society, and the Geriatric Society, and a member of the American Board of Obstetrics and Gynecology. He is on the Board of Directors of the California Committee on Therapeutic Abortion, an organization which seeks to liberalize abortion laws. He is considered by his associates to be an eminent physician in his field.

The prosecution's witnesses, a young woman and her husband, Cheryl and Clifton, testified to the following:

In 1966, Cheryl, then unmarried, believed she was pregnant. A family physician had given her pills which would induce menstruation if she were not pregnant, but the pills did not work. She and Clifton had sometime earlier seen Dr. Belous on television, advocating a change in the California abortion laws. They had never heard of Dr. Belous before. Clifton obtained the doctor's phone number from the television station and phoned Dr. Belous; he explained the problem and that they both were "pretty disturbed," and at their "wits' end" and asked for Dr. Belous' help. Dr. Belous told him there was nothing he could do, but Clifton "continued pleading," and threatened that Cheryl would go to Tijuana for an abortion. Finally the doctor agreed to see them at his office.

Dr. Belous examined Cheryl at his Beverly Hills office and confirmed that she was possibly pregnant. Cheryl was otherwise in good health. The visit lasted about 45 minutes and was very emotional. Both Clifton and Cheryl pleaded for help, cried, insisted they were going to have an abortion "one way or another." The doctor lectured them on the dangers of criminal abortions, and Tijuana abortions in particular, and suggested that they get married. He insisted he did not perform abortions. He refused to recommend anyone in Tijuana. Finally, in response to their pleadings, Dr. Belous gave them a piece of paper with a Chula Vista phone number. He told them an abortion would cost about $500. He gave Cheryl a prescription for some antibiotics and instructed her to return for an examination.

Dr. Belous testified that he was very familiar with the abortion business in Tijuana. He had visited the clinics there to learn about conditions and knew that women who went to Tijuana were taking their lives in their hands. He met Karl Lairtus while in Tijuana and knew from personal observation that Lairtus, licensed to practice in Mexico but not in California, was performing skilled and safe abortions in Mexico. Lairtus wanted to obtain a California license, and sought out Belous' help on a number of occasions. When Lairtus moved from Mexico to Chula Vista, he gave Dr. Belous his address and phone number. When Lairtus moved to Los Angeles, he gave the doctor a Hollywood address, and made it known to the doctor that he was performing abortions. It was Lairtus' number that Belous gave to Cheryl and Clifton. Although he had given out Lairtus' number before, in similar situations, where distraught pregnant women insisted they would do anything, Dr. Belous had no idea how many women actually went to Lairtus.

Cheryl and Clifton made arrangements with Lairtus, and went to the address which Lairtus gave them on the phone. After the abortion was performed, while Cheryl was resting, the police, having been advised by another woman that Lairtus was performing abortions at that address, came to his apartment, followed another couple into the apartment and arrested Lairtus. They found two notebooks containing women's names, ages, dates of last menstruation, and physician's names, including Dr. Belous' name, which the police interpreted as the referring doctor with whom Lairtus was to split his fees. On the basis of this information, Dr. Belous was arrested at his office. Lairtus pleaded guilty. At Dr. Belous' trial, he testified that, although not solicited, he sent Dr. Belous about $100 as a professional courtesy in about half the cases that he had performed abortions on Dr. Belous' patients. Dr. Belous denied receiving any money from Lairtus.

The substance of Dr. Belous' defense was that he gave Lairtus' phone number to Cheryl and Clifton only because he believed that they would, in fact, do anything to terminate the pregnancy, which might involve butchery in Tijuana or self-mutilation; that in face of their pleading and tears, he gave out the phone number of someone whom he knew to be a competent doctor, although unlicensed in this state. The doctor believed that if the young couple carried out their threats, Cheryl's very life was in danger.

Section 274 of the Penal Code, when the conduct herein involved occurred, read: "Every person who provides, supplies, or administers to any woman, or procures any woman to take any medicine, drug, or substance, or uses or employs any instrument or other means whatever, with intent thereby to procure the miscarriage of such woman, unless the same is necessary to preserve her life, is punishable by imprisonment in the State prison not less than two nor more than five years."

The statute was substantially unchanged since it was originally enacted in 1850.[1] In 1967, the statute was amended and sections 25950 through 25954 ("Therapeutic Abortion Act") added to the Health and Safety Code. The act extends the lawful grounds for obtaining an abortion.[2] Section 274 is directed towards the abortionist. Under section 275 of the Penal Code (also amended by the Therapeutic Abortion Act), a woman who solicits or submits to an abortion is punishable by up to five years' imprisonment; similarly, under section 276, any person who solicits a woman to submit to an abortion is punishable by up to five years' imprisonment.

We have concluded that the term "necessary to preserve" in section 274 of the Penal Code is not susceptible of a construction that does not violate legislative intent and that is sufficiently certain to satisfy due process requirements without improperly infringing on fundamental constitutional rights.

"The requirement of a reasonable degree of certainty in legislation, especially in the criminal law, is a well established element of the guarantee of due process of law. 'No one may be required at peril of life, liberty or property to speculate as to the meaning of penal statutes. All are entitled to be informed as to what the State commands or forbids. * * * "a statute which either forbids or requires the doing of an act in terms so vague that men of common intelligence must necessarily guess at its meaning and differ as to its application, violates the first essential of due process of law."' Lanzetta v. New Jersey, 306 U.S. 451, 453, 59 S.Ct. 618, 83 L.Ed. 888; see also Connally v. General Const. Co., 269 U.S. 385, 391, 46 S.Ct. 126, 70 L.Ed. 322. Such also is the law of the State of California. People v. McCaughan, 49 Cal.2d 409, 414, 317 P.2d 974.

1. Stats.1850, ch. 99, § 45, at p. 233: "[E]very person who shall administer or cause to be administered or taken, any medicinal substances, or shall use or cause to be used any instruments whatever, with the intention to procure the miscarriage of any woman then being with child, and shall be thereof duly convicted, shall be punished by imprisonment in the State Prison for a term not less than two years, nor more than five years: Provided, that no physician shall be affected by the last clause of this section, who, in the discharge of his professional duties, deems it necessary to produce the miscarriage of any woman in order to save her life."

2. Penal Code, section 274, as amended reads: "Every person who provides, supplies, or administers to any woman, or procures any woman to take any medicine, drug, or substance, or uses or employs any instrument or other means whatever, with intent thereby to procure the miscarriage of such woman, * * * *except as provided in the Therapeutic Abortion Act * * * of the Health and Safety Code*, is punishable by imprisonment in the state prison * * *." (Stats.1967, ch. 327, § 3, at p. 1523; italics added.)

The Therapeutic Abortion Act (Health & Saf.Code, §§ 25950–25954) authorizes abortions "only" if the abortion takes place in an accredited hospital (§ 25951, subd. (a)); the abortion is approved by a hospital staff committee consisting of at least three licensed physicians and surgeons (§ 25951, subd. (b)); and there is "substantial risk that continuance of the pregnancy would gravely impair the physical or mental health of the mother" (§ 25951, subd. (c) (1)); the pregnancy resulted from rape or incest (§ 25951, subd. (c) (2)); or the woman is under 15 years of age (§ 25952, subd. (c)).

tion. People v. McCaughan, supra, 49 Cal. 2d 409, 414, 317 P.2d 974; Lorenson v. Superior Court, 35 Cal.2d 49, 60, 216 P.2d 859." (In re Newbern, 53 Cal.2d 786, 792, 3 Cal.Rptr. 364, 368, 350 P.2d 116, 120.) The requirement of certainty in legislation is greater where the criminal statute is a limitation on constitutional rights. (See Smith v. California (1959) 361 U.S. 147, 151, 80 S.Ct. 215, 4 L.Ed.2d 205.) On the other hand, mathematical certainty is not required; "some matter of degree" is involved in most penal statutes. (Nash v. United States (1913) 229 U.S. 373, 377, 33 S.Ct. 780, 57 L.Ed. 1232.)

Dictionary definitions and judicial interpretations fail to provide a clear meaning for the words, "necessary" or "preserve." There is, of course, no standard definition of "necessary to preserve," and taking the words separately, no clear meaning emerges. "Necessary" is defined as: "1. Essential to a desirable or projected end or condition; not to be dispensed with without loss, damage, inefficiency, or the like; * * *" (Webster's New International Dictionary (2d ed.), unabridged.) The courts have recognized that "'necessary' has not a fixed meaning, but is flexible and relative." (Westphal v. Westphal, 122 Cal. App. 379, 382, 10 P.2d 119, 120; see also, City of Dayton v. Borchers (Ohio Common Pleas, 1967) 13 Ohio Misc. 273, 232 N.E.2d 437, 441 ["A necessary thing may supply a wide range of wants, from mere convenience to logical completeness."].)

The definition of "preserve" is even less enlightening. It is defined as: "1. To keep or save from injury or destruction; to guard or defend from evil; to protect; save. 2. To keep in existence or intact; * * * To save from decomposition, * * * 3. To maintain; to keep up; * * *" (Webster's New International Dictionary, supra.) The meanings for "preserve" range from the concept of maintaining the status quo—that is, the woman's condition of life at the time of pregnancy—to maintaining the biological or medical definition of "life"—that is, as opposed to the biological or medical definition of "death".

Since abortion before quickening was not a crime at common law (Perkins, Criminal Law (1957) 101; Means, The Law of New York Concerning Abortion and the Status of the Foetus, 1664–1968: A Case of Cessation of Constitutionality (1968) 14 N.Y.L. F. 411, 419–422; Stern, Abortion: Reform and the Law (1968) 59 J.Crim.L.C. & P.S. 84, 85) we cannot rely on common law meanings or common law referents (see Lorenson v. Superior Court, supra, 35 Cal. 2d 49, 60, 216 P.2d 859; People v. Agnello, 259 Cal.App.2d 785, 790–791, 66 Cal.Rptr. 571).[3]

Various possible meanings of "necessary to preserve * * * life" have been suggested. However, none of the proposed definitions will sustain the statute.

Respondent asserts: "If medical science feels the abortion should be performed as it is necessary to preserve her life, then it may be performed; that is, unless it is performed the patient will die."

Our courts, however, have rejected an interpretation of "necessary to preserve" which requires certainty or immediacy of death. (People v. Abarbanel, 239 Cal.App. 2d 31, 32, 35, 48 Cal.Rptr. 336; People v. Ballard, 218 Cal.App.2d 295, 298, 32 Cal. Rptr. 233; People v. Ballard, 167 Cal.App. 2d 803, 807, 335 P.2d 204.) Justice Fourt, in People v. Ballard, supra, 167 Cal.App. 2d 803, 814, 335 P.2d 204, 212, stated: "Surely, the abortion statute (Pen.Code, § 274) does not mean by the words 'unless the same is necessary to preserve her life' that the peril to life be imminent. It ought to be enough that the dangerous condition 'be potentially present, even though its full development might be delayed to a greater or less extent. Nor was it essential that the doctor should believe that the death of the patient would be otherwise certain in order to justify him in affording present relief.' [Citations.]" The above language was quoted in People v. Abarbanel, supra, 239 Cal.App.2d 31, 34, 48 Cal.Rptr. 336.

3. Compare United States v. Harriss (1954) 347 U.S. 612, 634, 74 S.Ct. 808, 820, 98 L.Ed. 989 (dissenting opinion): "Whoever kidnaps, steals, kills, or commits similar acts of violence upon another is bound to know that he is inviting retribution by society, and many of the statutes which define these long-established crimes are traditionally and perhaps necessarily vague."

In People v. Ballard, supra, 167 Cal.App. 2d 803, 813–814, 335 P.2d 204, 211, the evidence established that the woman was "extremely nervous * * * upset, had headaches, was unable to sleep, and thought that she was pregnant. She was agitated, disturbed and had many problems." (Italics omitted.) In People v. Ballard, supra, 218 Cal.App.2d 295, 307, 32 Cal.Rptr. 233, it was established that at the time each of the women went to the defendant doctor she was in a "bad state of health" because of self-imposed abortive practices. And in People v. Abarbanel, supra, 239 Cal.App.2d 31, 48 Cal.Rptr. 336, the obstetrician performed the abortion after receiving letters from two psychiatrists to the effect that abortion was indicated as necessary to save the woman's life from the "possibility" of suicide. In each of the cases the conviction was reversed.

If the fact of ill health or the mere "possibility" of suicide is sufficient to meet the test of "necessary to preserve her life," it is clear that a showing of immediacy or certainty of death is not essential for a lawful abortion. Two other jurisdictions have also rejected an interpretation of "necessary to preserve" which would require certainty or immediacy of death. (State v. Dunklebarger (1928) 206 Iowa 971, 221 N. W. 592, 596; State v. Hatch (1917), 138 Minn. 317, 164 N.W. 1017.)

After the decision in Ballard, the Legislature did not amend the statute to repudiate the rule suggested by that case and to establish a definition requiring certainty of death.[4]

It would be anomalous to uphold a criminal statute against a charge of vagueness by adopting a construction of the statute rejected by the courts of this state as not reflecting legislative intent unless there was a clear showing of a strong public policy or legislative intent requiring adoption of the rejected construction. No such showing has been made with regard to the construction urged by respondent.

Moreover, a definition requiring certainty of death would work an invalid abridgment of the woman's constitutional rights. The rights involved in the instant case are the woman's rights to life and to choose whether to bear children.[5] The woman's right to life is involved because childbirth involves risks of death.[6]

[2, 3] The fundamental right of the woman to choose whether to bear children follows from the Supreme Court's and this court's repeated acknowledgment of a "right of privacy" or "liberty" in matters related to marriage, family, and sex. (See, e. g., Griswold v. Connecticut, supra, 381 U.S. 479, 485, 486, 500, 85 S.Ct. 1678, 14 L.Ed.2d 510; Loving v. Virginia (1967) 388 U.S. 1, 12, 87 S.Ct. 1817, 18 L.Ed.2d 1010 [statute prohibiting interracial marriages, violative of Due Process Clause]; Skinner v. Oklahoma ex rel. Williamson (1942) 316 U.S. 535, 536, 541, 62 S.Ct. 1110, 86 L.Ed. 1655 [sterilization laws; marriage and procreation involve a "basic liberty"]; Pierce v. Society of Sisters (1925) 268 U.S. 510, 534–535, 45 S.Ct. 571, 69 L.Ed. 1070, 39 A.L.R.

4. The definitions suggested by the two Ballard cases and by Abarbanel will be discussed later in this opinion.

5. Dr. Belous' standing to raise this right is unchallenged. (Cf. Griswold v. Connecticut (1965) 381 U.S. 479, 481, 85 S.Ct. 1678, 14 L.Ed.2d 510; Barrows v. Jackson (1953) 346 U.S. 249, 257, 73 S.Ct. 1031, 97 L.Ed. 1586; Parrish v. Civil Service Commission, 66 Cal.2d 260, 264, 57 Cal.Rptr. 623, 425 P.2d 223.)

6. E. g., The maternal death rate in 1966 was 0.5 per 100,000 population and 29.1 per 100,000 births. (Statistical Abstract of the United States (1968) table 73, at p. 58, table 68, at p. 55.) In California in 1966 the maternal death rate was 2.1 per 10,000 live births. (California Statistical Abstract (1968) table E–3, at p. 67.) As to a particular pregnant woman the risk of death may be greater or lesser.

468 [prohibition against nonpublic schools; same]; Meyer v. Nebraska (1923) 262 U.S. 390, 399–400, 43 S.Ct. 625, 67 L.Ed. 1042 [prohibition against teaching children German language; same]; Perez v. Sharp, 32 Cal.2d 711, 715, 198 P.2d 17; see also Custodio v. Bauer, 251 Cal.App.2d 303, 317–318, 59 Cal.Rptr. 463.) That such a right is not enumerated in either the United States or California Constitutions is no impediment to the existence of the right. (See, e. g., Carrington v. Rash (1965) 380 U.S. 89, 96, 85 S.Ct. 775, 13 L.Ed.2d 675 [fundamental but nonenumerated right to vote]; Aptheker v. Secretary of State (1964) 378 U.S. 500, 505–506, 84 S.Ct. 1659, 12 L.Ed.2d 992 and Kent v. Dulles (1958) 357 U.S. 116, 125, 78 S.Ct. 1113, 2 L.Ed.2d 1204 [right to travel]; Bolling v. Sharpe (1954) 347 U.S. 497, 500, 74 S.Ct. 693, 98 L.Ed. 884 [right to attend federal unsegregated schools]; Otsuka v. Hite, 64 Cal.2d 596, 602, 51 Cal.Rptr. 284, 414 P.2d 412 [right to vote]; cf. Finot v. Pasadena City Bd. of Education, 250 Cal. App.2d 189, 199, 58 Cal.Rptr. 520.) It is not surprising that none of the parties who have filed briefs in this case have disputed the existence of this fundamental right.

The critical issue is not whether such rights exist, but whether the state has a compelling interest in the regulation of a subject which is within the police powers of the state (Shapiro v. Thompson (1969), 394 U.S. 618, 89 S.Ct. 1322, 22 L.Ed.2d 600; Sherbert v. Verner (1963) 374 U.S. 398, 403, 83 S.Ct. 1790, 10 L.Ed.2d 965), whether the regulation is "necessary * * * to the accomplishment of a permissible state policy" (McLaughlin v. Florida (1964) 379 U.S. 184, 196, 85 S.Ct. 283, 290, 13 L.Ed.2d 222; see also, N.A.A.C.P. v. Button, 371 U.S. 415, 438, 83 S.Ct. 328, 9 L.Ed.2d 405; Bates v. City of Little Rock (1960) 361 U.S. 516, 527, 80 S.Ct. 412, 4 L.Ed.2d 480; Huntley v. Public Util. Comm., 69 A.C. 62, 69, 69 Cal.Rptr. 605, 442 P.2d 685; Vogel v. County of Los Angeles, 68 Cal.2d 18, 21, 64 Cal. Rptr. 409, 434 P.2d 961; People v. Woody, 61 Cal.2d 716, 718, 40 Cal.Rptr. 69, 394 P.2d 813), and whether legislation impinging on constitutionally protected areas is narrowly drawn and not of "unlimited and indiscriminate sweep" (Shelton v. Tucker (1960) 364 U.S. 479, 490, 81 S.Ct. 247, 5 L.Ed.2d 231; see also, Cantwell v. Connecticut (1940) 310 U.S. 296, 308, 60 S.Ct. 900, 84 L.Ed. 1213; In re Berry, 68 Cal.2d 137, 151, 65 Cal.Rptr. 273, 436 P.2d 273; In re Hoffman, 67 Cal.2d 845, 853–854, 64 Cal.Rptr. 97, 434 P.2d 353).

It is possible that the definition suggested by respondent, requiring that death be certain, was that intended by the Legislature when the first abortion law was adopted in 1850 and that, in the light of the then existing medical and surgical science, the great and direct interference with a woman's constitutional rights was warranted by considerations of the woman's health. When California's first anti-abortion statute was enacted, any surgical procedure which entered a body cavity was extremely dangerous. Surgeons did not know how to control infection, and mortality was high. (Haagensen & Lloyd, A Hundred Years of Medicine (1943) p. 19.) In 1867, Joseph Lister first published his findings on antiseptic surgery (id., at pp. 241–242), but even in 1883 the techniques he developed were condemned (id., at p. 245), and as late as 1895 were not well understood or properly applied by even leaders of the medical profession. (Id., at p. 246; see also, H. Robb (1895) Aseptic Surgical Technique.)

Although development was slow, techniques of antisepsis and asepsis became major general advances in surgery at and after the turn of the century. In due course safe procedures were developed for specific operations. Curettage, used for abortion in the first trimester, became a safe, accepted and routinely employed medical technique, especially after antibiotics were developed in the early 1940's. (Douglas, Toxic Effects of the Welch Bacillus in Postabortal Infections (1956) 56 N.Y.State J.Med. 3673.) It is now safer for a woman to have a hospital therapeutic abortion during the first trimester than to bear a child.[7]

Although abortions early in pregnancy and properly performed present minimal danger to the woman, criminal[8] abortions are "the most common single cause of maternal deaths in California." (Fox, Abortion Deaths in California (1967) 98 Am.J.Obst. & Gynec. 645, 650.) In California, it is estimated that 35,000 to 100,000 such abortions occur each year. (Fox, supra, at p. 645.)

The incidence of severe infection from criminal abortion is very much greater than the incidence of death. The Los Angeles County Hospital alone, for example, in 1961 admitted over 3,500 patients treated for such abortions. (Kistner, Medical Indications for Contraception: Changing Viewpoints (editorial) (1965) 25 Obst. & Gynec. 285, 286.) Possibly more significant than the mere incidence of infection caused by criminal abortions is the result of such infection. "Induced Illegal Abortion * * * is one of the important causes of subsequent infertility and pelvic disease." (Kleegman & Kaufman, Infertility in Women (1966) p. 301; see also Curtis & Huffman, Gynecology (6th ed. 1950) pp. 564–566.)[9]

Amici for appellant, 178 deans of medical schools, including the deans of all California medical schools, chairmen of medical school departments, and professors of medical schools state: "These recorded facts bring one face-to-face with the hard, shocking—almost brutal—reality that our statute designed in 1850 to protect women from serious risks to life and health has in modern times become a scourge."[10]

7. C. Tietze & H. Lehfeldt, Legal Abortion in Eastern Europe (April 1961) 175 J.A.M.A. 1149, 1152; see also V. Kolblova, Legal Abortion in Czechoslovakia (April 1966) 196 J.A.M.A. 371; K.-H. Mehland, Combatting Illegal Abortion in the Socialist Countries of Europe (1966) 13 World Med.J. 84. There are, of course, no comparable data in the United States. However, in California from November 1967 through September 1968, 3,775 therapeutic abortions were reported without a maternal death. (See Annual Report on the Implementation of the Therapeutic Abortion Act, Department of Public Health, Bureau of Maternal and Child Health (January 1969), table 1.)

The only data contrary to the conclusions above is provided by amicus for respondent, relying on Swedish data showing that maternal mortality from abortion is slightly higher than maternal mortality from giving birth. The Swedish figures are, however, explainable by the fact that abortions in Sweden are often performed during late pregnancy. (See Tietze & Lehfeldt, supra, 175 J.A.M.A. 1149, 1152 (e. g., in 1949, 35 percent of Swedish abortions were performed after the first trimester); Hoffmeyer, Medical Aspects of the Danish Legislation on Abortions (1965) 17 W.Res.L.Rev. 529, 544–545.)

8. The phrases "criminal abortion" and "illegal abortion" are used by the medical profession—and by legal commentators—to encompass all abortions obtained other than from a physician in an accepted surgical environment. Any use of the phrase "criminal abortion" or "illegal abortion" in this opinion merely adopts the common phraseology; no legal conclusion is intended.

9. There is considerable literature describing the experience of various hospitals with infected abortion. Hospital experience, however, can be assumed to be only the tip of the iceberg. Many badly infected women will be treated at home or in a doctor's office. (Reid, Assessment and Management of the Seriously Ill Patient Following Abortion (March 1967) 199 J.A.M.A. p. 805.) See, for hospital data, Goodno, Cushner, Molumphey, Management of Infected Abortion (1963) 85 Am.J.Obst. & Gynec. 16 [Baltimore City Hospitals]; Knapp, Platt and Douglas, Septic Abortion (1960) 15 Obst. & Gynec. 344 [The New York Hospital]; Moritz & Thompson, Septic Abortion (1966) 95 Am.J.Obst. & Gynec. 46 [Miami Valley Hospital, Dayton, Ohio]; Stevenson & Yang, Septic Abortion With Shock (1962) 83 Am.J.Obst. & Gynec. 1229 [Detroit Receiving Hospital]; Studdiford & Douglas, Placental Bacteremia: A Significant Finding in Septic Abortion Accompanied by Vascular Collapse (1956) 71 Am.J. [4] Although we may assume that the law was valid when first enacted, the validity of a law in 1850 does not resolve the issue of whether the law is constitutionally valid today. (Compare, e. g., Gray v. Sanders (1963) 372 U.S. 368, 381, 83 S.Ct. 801, 9 L.Ed.2d 821, with South v. Peters (1950) 339 U.S. 276, 277, 70 S.Ct. 641, 94 L.Ed. 834; Baker v. Carr (1962) 369 U.S. 186, 237, 82 S.Ct. 691, 7 L.Ed.2d 663, with Colegrove v. Green (1946) 328 U.S. 549, 556, 66 S.Ct. 1198, 90 L.Ed. 1432; Brown v. Board of Education (1954) 347 U.S. 483, 495, 74 S.Ct. 686, 98 L.Ed. 873; with Plessy v. Ferguson (1896) 163 U.S. 537, 550–551, 16 S.Ct. 1138, 41 L.Ed. 256.)

Constitutional concepts are not static. Our United States Supreme Court said, regarding the equal protection clause of the Fourteenth Amendment: "We agree, of course, with Mr. Justice Holmes that the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment 'does not enact Mr. Herbert Spencer's Social Statics.' [Citation.] Likewise, the Equal Protection Clause is not shackled to the political theory of a particular era. In determining what lines are unconstitutionally discriminatory, we have never been confined to historic notions of equality, any more than we have restricted due process to a fixed catalogue of what was at a given time deemed to be authorized to practice surgery, carried out the limits of fundamental rights. * * *." (Harper v. Virginia State Bd. of Elections (1966) 383 U.S. 663, 669, 86 S.Ct. 1079, 1082, 16 L.Ed.2d 169; see also, Perez v. Sharp, supra, 32 Cal.2d 711, 727, 198 P.2d 17; Galyon v. Municipal Court, 229 Cal. App.2d 667, 671–672, 40 Cal.Rptr. 446, and cases cited therein ["[A] statute valid when enacted may become invalid by change in the conditions to which it is applied."]. See also, Means, supra, 14 N.Y.L.F. 411, 514–515.)

In the light of modern medical surgical practice, the great and direct infringement of constitutional rights which would result from a definition requiring certainty of death may not be justified on the basis of considerations of the woman's health where, as here, abortion is sought during the first trimester.

It is next urged that the state has a compelling interest in the protection of the embryo and fetus[11] and that such interest warrants the limitation on the woman's constitutional rights. Reliance is placed upon several statutes and court rules which assertedly show that the embryo or fetus is equivalent to a born child. However, all of the statutes and rules relied upon require a live birth or reflect the interest of the parents.[12] in unregulated places, will bring injury or even death to the mother."

Authorities recognizing and discussing the tragic health problem created by illegal abortions are legion. (See, e. g., Bates, The Abortion Mill: An Institutional Study (1954) 45 J.Crim.L.C. & P.S. 157; Eastman, Expectant Motherhood (3d ed.1957) 106 et seq.; Gold, Erhardt, Jacobziner & Nelson, Therapeutic Abortions in New York City: A 20-Year Review (1965) 55 Am.J.Pub.Health 964, 970–971; Guttmacher (ed.1967) The Case for Legalized Abortion Now; Lader (1966) Abortion; Leavy & Kummer, Criminal Abortion: Human Hardship and Unyielding Laws (1962) 35 So.Cal.L.Rev. 123; Lucas, Federal Constitutional Limitations on the Enforcement and Administration of State Abortion Statutes (1968) 46 N.C.L.Rev. 730; Niswander, Medical Abortion Practices in the United States (1965) 17 W.Res.L.Rev. 403.)

11. It has been pointed out that "embryo" is more accurately descriptive than "fetus" in the instant case. Webster's New International Dictionary, supra, states: "* * * In mammals * * * embryo is applied only to early stages passed within the mother's body; later (in human embryology, usually after the third month of development) the young is called a fetus. * * *" (Italics in original.)

12. Statutes classifying the unborn child as the same as the born child require that the child be born alive for the provisions to apply. (E.g., Civ.Code, § 29 ["A child conceived, but not yet born, is to be deemed an existing person, so far as may be necessary for its interests in the event of its subsequent birth; * * *"]; Prob.Code, § 250 ["A posthumous child

In any event, there are major and decisive areas where the embryo and fetus are not treated as equivalent to the born child. Probably the most important is reflected by the statute before us. The intentional destruction of the born child is murder or manslaughter. The intentional destruction of the embryo or fetus is never treated as murder, and only rarely as manslaughter but rather as the lesser offense of abortion. (Perkins, Criminal Law, supra, p. 103; Means, supra, 14 N.Y.L.F. at p. 445.)[13]

Furthermore, the law has always recognized that the pregnant woman's right to life takes precedence over any interest the state may have in the unborn. The California abortion statutes, as to the abortion laws of all 51 United States jurisdictions, make an exception in favor of the life of the prospective mother. (See Stern, Abortion: Reform and the Law, supra, 59 J. Crim.L.C. & P.S. 84, 86–87; George, Current Abortion Laws: Proposals & Movements for Reform (1965) 17 W.Res.L.Rev. 366, 375.) Although there may be doubts as to whether the state's interest may ever justify requiring a woman to risk death, it is clear that the state could not forbid a woman to procure an abortion where, to a medical certainty, the result of childbirth would be death. We are also satisfied that the state may not require that degree of risk involved in respondent's definition, which would prohibit an abortion, where death from childbirth although not medically certain, would be substantially certain or more likely than not. Accordingly, the definition of the statute suggested by respondent must be rejected as an invalid infringement upon the woman's constitutional rights.

is considered as living at the death of the parent."]; Prob.Code, § 255 [An illegitimate child is the heir of his mother, "whether born or conceived."].)

Similarly, cases holding that a child can recover for injuries caused before his birth require that the child be born alive. The interest protected is that of the child; and the right attaches, not to the embryo or fetus, but to the living child. (Scott v. McPheeters, 33 Cal.App.2d 629, 637, 92 P.2d 678, 93 P.2d 562 [child injured at birth can bring action for injuries]; see also, Carroll v. Skloff (1964), 415 Pa. 47, 202 A.2d 9, 11; Tomlin v. Laws (1922) 301 Ill. 616, 134 N.E. 24, 25; Prosser, Law of Torts (3d ed.1964) at p. 356 ["The child, provided that he is born alive, is permitted to maintain an action * * *."].)

Where the embryo or fetus is allowed to assert rights before birth it is the prospective mother or parents who are bringing the action; thus it is their interest that the law protects. (Kyne v. Kyne, 38 Cal.App.2d 122, 127–128, 100 P.2d 806 [action on behalf of unborn child for support and to establish paternity]; People v. Sianes, 134 Cal.App. 355, 357–358, 25 P.2d 487 [criminal action for nonsupport against father of unborn child]; People v. Yates, 114 Cal. App.Supp. 782, 788, 298 P. 961 [same].) Similarly, in those jurisdictions which recognize a cause of action for the loss of an unborn child, it is the parents' "distressing wrong in the loss of a child" that the law has recognized. (Prosser, supra, § 56, at p. 357; Torigian v. Watertown News Co. Inc. (1967) 352 Mass. 446, 448, 225 N.E.2d 926.)

In a case involving a pregnant woman who refused a blood transfusion, in ordering the transfusion the court made clear that it was concerned with the woman, rather than the fetus: "* * * Mrs. Jones wanted to live." (Application of President & Directors of Georgetown Col. (1964) 118 U.S.App.D.C. 90, 331 F.2d 1000, 1009, cert. denied, 377 U.S. 978, 84 S.Ct. 1883, 12 L.Ed.2d 746, but see Raleigh Fitkin-Paul Morgan Mem. Hosp. v. Anderson (1964) 42 N.J. 421, 201 A.2d 537, 538, cert. denied, 377 U.S. 985, 84 S.Ct. 1894, 12 L.Ed.2d 1032, suggesting that an 8-month pregnant woman could be required to have blood transfusions to protect the unborn child.)

Although sections 3705 and 3706 of the Penal Code, which provide for suspending the execution of a pregnant woman, reflect an interest in the unborn child, the sections do not affect any other significant private interests and thus furnish no basis to evaluate the interest protected or to conclude that the embryo or fetus is equivalent to a born child.

13. One case has held that, for purposes of the manslaughter and murder statutes, human life may exist where childbirth has commenced but has not been fully completed. (People v. Chavez, 77 Cal.App.2d 621, 624, 626, 176 P.2d 92.)

Another definition of the term "necessary to preserve" is suggested by People v. Abarbanel, supra, 239 Cal.App.2d 31, 32, 34, 48 Cal.Rptr. 336, where the court held that an abortion was not unlawful where the obstetrician performed the abortion based on the "possibility" of suicide. Abarbanel might be understood as meaning that "necessary to preserve" refers to a possibility of death different from or greater than the ordinary risk of childbirth. To so interpret "necessary to preserve" would mean that in nearly every case, if not all, a woman who wished an abortion could have one. A woman who is denied a desired lawful abortion and forced to continue an unwanted pregnancy would seem to face a greater risk of death, because of psychological factors, than the average woman, because the average includes all those women who wish to bear the child to term. The psychological factor alone, which under Abarbanel is a proper consideration, would seem to be decisive. Such a construction of the statute permitting voluntary abortions would render the statute virtually meaningless. Moreover, to determine the right to an abortion solely on the basis of the dangers of childbirth without regard to the relative dangers of the abortion would be contrary to good medical practice.

Nor can the statute be made certain by reading it as "substantially or reasonably" necessary to preserve the life of the mother. In the present context those terms are not sufficiently precise and would be subject to such different interpretations as to add little or nothing to "necessary." Thus, many people may feel that an abortion is reasonably or substantially necessary to preserve life where the risk of death is double or triple the ordinary risk in childbirth. Others may believe that anything which increases the possibility of death is a substantial risk which is not to be undertaken in the absence of countervailing considerations, so that "reasonably necessary" or "substantially necessary" becomes as destructive of the statute as "possibility of death." On the other hand, there may be those who feel that there is no reasonable or substantial necessity until it is more likely than not that the pregnant woman will not survive childbirth. Although in other contexts the implication of words such as "reasonably" and "substantially" may add certainty and avoid other due process objections, in the instant situation the implication of such words would merely increase the uncertainty.

There is one suggested test which is based on a policy underlying the statute and which would serve to make the statute certain. The test is probably in accord with the legislative intent at the time the statute was adopted. The Legislature may have intended in adopting the statute that abortion was permitted when the risk of death due to the abortion was less than the risk of death in childbirth and that otherwise abortion should be denied. As we have seen, at the time of the adoption of the statute abortion was a highly dangerous procedure, and under the relative safety test abortion would be permissible only where childbirth would be even more dangerous. In light of the test and the then existing medical practice, the question whether abortion should be limited to protect the embryo or fetus may have been immaterial because any such interest would be effectuated by limiting abortions to the rare cases where they were safer than childbirth.

The suggested test would involve an application of medical principles. Medical science may be able to tell us the proper method to treat a patient to minimize the risk of death, but without resort to matters outside medical competence, it cannot tell us the circumstances in which the safest treatment should be rejected and a more dangerous treatment followed in order to protect an embryo or fetus.

The new Therapeutic Abortion Act (Health & Saf.Code, §§ 25950–25954), has adopted a test analogous to the suggested one. Under the new statute, abortion is permissible during the first 20 weeks of pregnancy by a licensed physician in an accredited hospital (Health & Saf.Code, §§ 25951, 25953) if it is determined under prescribed procedures either that "There is substantial risk that continuance of the pregnancy would gravely impair the physical or mental health of the mother" (Health & Saf.Code, § 25951, subd. (c) (1)), or that "The pregnancy resulted from rape or incest." (Health and Saf.Code, § 25951, subd. (c) (2).) Mental health includes mental illness to the extent that the woman would be dangerous to herself. (Health & Saf.Code, § 25954.) By limiting the abortion to the first 20 weeks, the Legislature has taken into account the danger to the mother of the later abortion and, by requiring the abortion to be performed by a licensed physician in an accredited hospital, has recognized the danger to the mother of other procedures. The further criteria for determining whether an abortion is permissible is the pregnant woman's physical and mental health. Thus, the test established is a medical one, whether the pregnant woman's physical and mental health will be furthered by abortion or by bearing the child to term, and the assessment does not involve considerations beyond medical competence. There is nothing to indicate that in adopting the Therapeutic Abortion Act the Legislature was asserting an interest in the embryo.

Although the suggested construction of former section 274, making abortion lawful where it is safer than childbirth and unlawful where abortion is more dangerous, may have been in accord with legislative intent, the statute may not be upheld against a claim of vagueness on the basis of such a construction. The language of the statute, "unless the same is necessary to preserve her life," does not suggest a relative safety test, and no case interpreting the statute has suggested that the statute be so construed. None of the parties or numerous amici who have filed briefs in the instant case suggest that the statute applies a relative safety test; to the contrary, the position of the parties and amici, including numerous lawyers, doctors, educators, clergymen and laymen, implies that the statute does not apply that standard. Thus, those claiming the statute is invalid urge that the only valid standard would be a relative safety test and that the statute fails to adopt such a test, and those urging the validity of the statute either state or imply that the standard applied is more restrictive. In the circumstances, we are satisfied that the statute may not be construed to adopt the relative safety test as against a claim of vagueness, because the language does not suggest that test and because of the practical evidence before us that men of "common" intelligence, indeed of uncommon intelligence, have not guessed at this meaning.[14]

14. The practical aspects of the need to guess at the meaning of the abortion statute is shown by Packer & Gampell, Therapeutic Abortion: A Problem in Law and Medicine (1959) 11 Stan.L.Rev. 417. A questionnaire survey directed to 29 San Francisco Bay Area and Los Angeles hospitals (id., at p. 423) based on hypothetical cases involving pregnant women seeking abortions yielded the following results (id., at p. 444):

Case No.	Authors' Evaluation of Legality of Abortion	Hospital Would Perform Abortion
		Yes	No
1	Yes	21	1
2	No	10	12
3	No	6	16
4	No	15	7
5	No	8	13
6	No	8	14
7	Yes	17	4
8	No	5	17
9	Prob. Yes	10	11
10	Maybe	17	4
11	No	1	20

[5] The problem caused by the vagueness of the statute is accentuated because under the statute the doctor is, in effect, delegated the duty to determine whether a pregnant woman has the right to an abortion and the physician acts at his peril if he determines that the woman is entitled to an abortion. He is subject to prosecution for a felony and to deprivation of his right to practice medicine (Bus. & Prof.Code, § 2377) if his decision is wrong. Rather than being impartial, the physician has a "direct, personal, substantial, pecuniary interest in reaching a conclusion" that the woman should not have an abortion. The delegation of decision-making power to a directly involved individual violates the Fourteenth Amendment. (Tumey v. Ohio (1927) 273 U.S. 510, 523, 47 S.Ct. 437, 71 L.Ed. 749; see also State Board of Dry Cleaners v. Thrift-D-Lux Cleaners, 40 Cal.2d 436, 448, 254 P.2d 29 ["[T]he statute assumes to confer legislative authority upon those who are directly interested in the operation of the regulatory rule * * *."]; Blumenthal v. Board of Medical Examiners, 57 Cal.2d 228, 235, 18 Cal.Rptr. 501, 504, 368 P.2d 101, 104.)

The inevitable effect of such delegation may be to deprive a woman of an abortion when under any definition of section 274 of the Penal Code, she would be entitled to such an operation, because the state, in delegating the power to decide when an abortion is necessary, has skewed the penalties in one direction: no criminal penalties are imposed where the doctor refuses to perform a necessary operation, even if the woman should in fact die because the operation was not performed.

The pressures on a physician to decide not to perform an absolutely necessary abortion are, under section 274 of the Penal Code, enormous, and because section 274 authorizes—and requires—the doctor to decide, at his peril, whether an abortion is necessary, a woman whose life is at stake may be as effectively condemned to death as if the law flatly prohibited all abortions.

To some extent the Therapeutic Abortion Act reduces these pressures. The act specifically authorizes an abortion by a licensed physician in an accredited hospital where the abortion is approved in advance by a committee of the medical staff of the hospital, applying medical standards. (Health & Saf.Code, § 25951.) At least in cases where there has been adherence to the procedural requirements of the statute, physicians may not be held criminally responsible, and a jury may not subsequently determine that the abortion was not authorized by statute.

[6] We conclude that the validity of section 274 of the Penal Code before amendment cannot be sustained.[15]

Since section 274 is invalid, Dr. Belous' conviction for violation of section 182 of the Penal Code, conspiracy to commit abortion, must likewise fall. The judgment is reversed with directions to the trial court to dismiss the indictment.

TRAYNOR, C. J., TOBRINER, J., and PIERCE,* J. pro tem., concur.

BURKE, Justice (dissenting).
I dissent.

The defendant was found guilty by jury trial of a wilful violation of the abortion statute as it existed at the time of the offense. That he violated the statute is all but conceded in the briefs filed in his behalf. Although he testified that he directed the young couple to a doctor, unlicensed in California, because he believed that if they carried out their threats of going to Tijuana to procure an abortion the young woman's life would be in danger, he acknowledged upon cross-examination that her life would not have been endangered if she were not aborted. His assertions that he acted in good faith and out of compassion are tainted somewhat by the evidence which showed that he had referred other women to the same unlicensed physician on a number of occasions and that he had participated on at least one-half of those occasions in the fee paid the abortionist.

15. It has been urged that the Therapeutic Abortion Act is unconstitutional because it contains uncertainties similar to those in the repealed statute, because it infringes on the woman's right to choose whether to bear children, and because the act does not expressly permit an abortion where there is a likelihood that a deformed child will be born. Since the act was adopted after the abortion in the instant case, we do not reach the issue of its validity.

Had the doctor truly believed that the young woman's life was in danger he could have done what was the common practice of taking the patient to one of the several hospitals in which therapeutic abortions were being performed. To my knowledge there is not one single instance of a decision of the appellate courts of this state in which a doctor or a hospital has been prosecuted for the performance of an abortion where an independent hospital committee deemed the abortion to be necessary to preserve the woman's life. The plain fact is, as the jury found it to be, that this doctor, whatever his motive, possessed the intent to assist in procuring the miscarriage of the woman for reasons other than to preserve her life. This is the specific intent which the law requires for conviction.

He supplied to the jury the answer an independent hospital committee undoubtedly would have given him had he seen fit to seek its approval for an abortion—the patient could bear the child without endangering her life; therefore, to abort her would violate the law.

The threatened danger to the woman's life arose only from the couple's assertions that they would seek an illegal abortion by an unlicensed person. To assist them in attaining this goal was to flaunt his profession's own standards and to aid in bringing about a direct violation of the law.

The majority would reverse the conviction by declaring the statute unconstitutional because of asserted uncertainty in the phrase, "necessary to preserve [the woman's] life."[1] This phrase has been an integral part of the California law against illegal abortions from the time of its enactment in 1872 until the 1967 amendment to the section, and similar language was in the original statute adopted in 1850.[2] Thus for over a hundred years in this state doctors, hospital committees, judges, lawyers and juries have been called upon to give the phrase the common sense interpretation which the words appear to me to suggest. For this court over a hundred years later to find the language unconstitutionally vague and uncertain is a "negation of experience and common sense." (United States v. Ragen, 314 U.S. 513, 524, 62 S.Ct. 374, 379, 86 L.Ed. 383.)

Not only was the phrase long used in the California statute, it was also employed at common law (see, e. g., Perkins on Criminal Law (2d ed.) p. 145; Clark and Marshall, Crimes 6th ed.) pp. 688-689) and is or has been in the abortion statutes of many states (see, e. g., Am.Jur.2d, Abortion, § 9, p. 192; 153 A.L.R. 1218, 1266; Smith, Abortion and the Law (1967) p. 7). Implicit in the decisions of this court, as well as those of countless other courts, is the view that the phrase does not render such a statute invalid (see, e. g., People v. Davis, 43 Cal.2d 661, 276 P.2d 801; People v. Gallardo, 41 Cal.2d 57, 257 P.2d 29; People v. Powell, 34 Cal.2d 196, 208 P.2d 974; Peo-

1. Section 274 then read: "Every person who provides, supplies, or administers to any woman, or procures any woman to take any medicine, drug, or substance, or uses or employs any instrument or other means whatever, with intent thereby to procure the miscarriage of such woman, unless the same is necessary to preserve her life, is punishable * * *." (Italics added.)

2. The 1850 statute (ch. 99, § 45, p. 233) provided that every person who did any of the enumerated acts with a specified intent shall be punishable "Provided, that no physician shall be affected * * * who, in the discharge of his professional duties, deems it necessary to produce the miscarriage of any woman in order to save her life."

ple v. Wilson, 25 Cal.2d 341, 153 P.2d 720; People v. Rankin, 10 Cal.2d 198, 74 P.2d 71). In State v. Moretti, 52 N.J. 182, 244 A.2d 499, 504 [cert. den. 393 U.S. 952, 89 S.Ct. 376, 21 L.Ed.2d 363] the court stated that when the phrase "lawful justification," as used in a statute prohibiting abortions done maliciously or without lawful justification, is confined "to the preservation of the mother's life," the statute is not subject to constitutional attack on the ground of vagueness. (See also State v. Elliott, 234 Or. 522, 383 P.2d 382, 384–385.)

The proper test as to certainty was stated by this court in People v. Howard, 70 A.C. 659, 665, 75 Cal.Rptr. 761, 764, 451 P.2d 401, 404, to be: "'A statute should be sufficiently certain so that a person may know what is prohibited thereby and what may be done without violating its provisions, but it cannot be held void for uncertainty if any reasonable and practical construction can be given to its language. As stated in Pacific Coast Dairy v. Police Court, 214 Cal. 668, at page 676, 8 P.2d 140, 143, 80 A.L.R. 1217, "Mere difficulty in ascertaining its meaning, or the fact that it is susceptible of different interpretations will not render it nugatory. Doubts as to its construction will not justify us in disregarding it." [Citation.]'"

The meaning of the phrase "necessary to preserve [the woman's] life" was considered in People v. Ballard, 167 Cal.App.2d 803, 814–815, 335 P.2d 204, 212, wherein the court stated, "Surely, the abortion statute (Pen.Code, § 274) does not mean by [this phrase] that the peril to life be imminent. It ought to be enough that the dangerous condition 'be potentially present, even though its full development might be delayed to a greater or less extent. Nor was it essential that the doctor should believe that the death of the patient would be otherwise certain in order to justify him in affording present relief.' (State v. Dunklebarger, 206 Iowa 971, 221 N.W. 592, 596; see also Rex v. Bourne, 1 K.B. 687 * * *; Commonwealth v. Wheeler, 315 Mass. 394, 53 N.E.2d 4; 23 So. Cal.L.Rev. 523.) In State v. Powers * * 155 Wash. 63, 67, 283 P. 439, 440, the court satisfied itself with an interpretation of 'necessity to save life' by stating, '*If the appellant in performing the operation did something which was recognized and approved by those reasonably skilled in his profession practicing in the same community * * * then it cannot be said that the operation was not necessary to preserve the life of the patient.*'" (Italics added.) (See also People v. Abarbanel, 239 Cal.App. 2d 31, 34, 48 Cal.Rptr. 336; People v. Ballard, 218 Cal.App.2d 295, 307, 32 Cal.Rptr. 233.)

Amici for appellant, 178 deans of medical schools, state that the italicized sentence quoted from People v. Ballard, supra, 167 Cal.App.2d 803, 814–815, 335 P.2d 204, is in error because "the medical profession has 'approved' abortions in cases [in which the objective was not to preserve the life of the woman and therefore] clearly outside of Penal Code section 274. Packer & Gampell, Therapeutic Abortion: A Problem in Law and Medicine, 11 Stan.L.Rev. 417, 447. * * *" However, that sentence must be understood to mean recognized and approved by such persons as being required to preserve the life of the patient.

The word "preserve" is defined in the dictionary as "1. To keep or save from injury or destruction; * * * to protect; save. 2. To keep in existence or intact; * * * To save from decomposition * *." (See Webster's New Internat. Dict. (3d ed. 1961).) As used in section 274, the word "preserve" has been regarded as synonymous with "save" (see, e. g., People v. Kutz, 187 Cal.App.2d 431, 436, 9 Cal.Rptr. 626; People v. Malone, 82 Cal.App.2d 54, 59, 185 P.2d 870; Stern v. Superior Court, 78 Cal.App.2d 9, 18, 177 P.2d 308), and to save a life ordinarily is understood as meaning to save from destruction, i. e. dying—not merely from injury. Thus the precipitation of a psychosis in the absence of a genuine threat of suicide is not a threat to life under section 274. (See Packer and Gampell, Therapeutic Abortion: A

That the Legislature used the word "preserve" in the sense of save from destruction also appears from the purpose of the section. The law historically in various contexts has regarded the unborn child as a human being. (See Louisell, Abortion, The Practice of Medicine, and the Due Process of Law, 16 U.C.L.A. L.Rev. 233, 234–244.) Louisell (at p. 244) quotes from Prosser on Torts (3d ed. 1964) that "[M]edical authority has recognized long since that the child is in existence from the moment of conception, and for many purposes its existence is recognized by the law. The criminal law regards it as a separate entity, and the law of property considers it in being for all purposes which are to its benefit, such as taking by will or descent. * * * All writers who have discussed the problem have joined * * in maintaining that the unborn child in the path of an automobile is as much a person in the street as the mother." In Raleigh Fitkin-Paul Morgan Mem. Hosp. v. Anderson, 42 N.J. 421, 201 A.2d 537, 538 [cert. den. 377 U.S. 985, 84 S.Ct. 1894, 12 L.Ed.2d 1032] it was held that an unborn child of a woman who did not wish blood transfusions because they were contrary to her religious convictions was entitled to the law's protection and that an order would be made to insure such transfusions to the mother in the event they are necessary in the opinion of the attending physician.

Several statutes show that the California law has been in accord in regarding the unborn child as a human being for various purposes. (See, e. g., Pen.Code, §§ 3706 and 270; Civ.Code, § 29.)[3] In Scott v. McPheeters, 33 Cal.App.2d 629, 634, 92 P.2d 678, 681, the court declared: "The respondent asserts that the provisions of section 29 of the Civil Code are based on a fiction of law to the effect that an unborn child is a human being separate and distinct from its mother. We think that assumption of our statute is not a fiction, but upon the contrary that it is an established and recognized fact by science and by everyone of understanding."

It is reasonable to believe that section 274, as it read at the time in question, was not an exception to the law's attitude respecting the unborn child as a human being and that it was designed to protect not only the mother's life but also that of the child. In view of that purpose it would appear that the Legislature intended that the child would be deprived of his right to life only if in the absence of an abortion there was a danger of the mother's death—not merely of injury to her.

"'[T]he Constitution does not require impossible standards'; all that is required is that the language 'conveys sufficiently definite warning as to the proscribed conduct when measured by common understanding and practices * * *.' United States v. Petrillo, 332 U.S. 1, 7–8, 67 S.Ct. 1538, 91 L.Ed. 1877." (Roth v. United States, 354 U.S. 476, 491, 77 S.Ct. 1304, 1312, 1 L.Ed.2d 1498.) The phrase in question, when applied according to the standard heretofore stated (namely, whether persons reasonably skilled in their profession practicing in the same community recognized and approved the act as being required to save the patient from dying) clearly gives such warning.

Furthermore, section 274 punishes only those who act with "'* * * the intent to commit a criminal abortion, that is, an abortion for a purpose other than to preserve [i. e. save from destruction] the life of the mother.'" (People v. Abar-

3. Penal Code section 3706 requires that the execution of a death penalty be suspended if the defendant is pregnant and without regard to the stage of pregnancy.
Penal Code section 270 makes punishable a father's wilful failure to provide a minor child with necessary items and provides that "A child conceived but not yet born is to be deemed an existing person in so far as this section is concerned."
Civil Code section 29 provides in part that "A child conceived, but not yet born, is to be deemed an existing person, so far as may be necessary for its interests in the event of its subsequent birth * * *."

banel, supra, 239 Cal.App.2d 31, 34–35, 48 Cal.Rptr. 336, 339; People v. Ballard, supra, 167 Cal.App.2d 803, 817, 335 P.2d 204.) The requirement of such an intent eviscerates much of the majority's claim that the section is impermissibly vague. (See generally Mishkin v. New York, 383 U.S. 502, 507, fn. 5, 86 S.Ct. 958, 16 L.Ed.2d 56; Boyce Motor Lines, Inc. v. United States, 342 U.S. 337, 342, 72 S.Ct. 329, 96 L.Ed. 367.) A person who performs an abortion with such an intent has fair warning that his conduct may violate the law even though he may not be certain where the jury will draw the line on the matter of necessity.

The principal cases relied upon by the majority, in which statutes have been declared unconstitutionally vague, do not support such a finding when applied to the abortion statute. In People v. McCaughan, 49 Cal.2d 409, 317 P.2d 974, the statute prohibited, among other conduct, "harsh" or "unkind" treatment of a mentally ill person. These words were held not to have an established meaning either at common law or as a result of adjudication. They were held unconstitutionally vague. On the other hand, the phrase "neglect of duty" and the word "cruel" were upheld because they did have such well established meanings, just as do the words utilized in the phrase under attack here.

Lanzetta v. New Jersey, 306 U.S. 451, 453, 59 S.Ct. 618, 83 L.Ed. 888, construed a statute defining "gangster" and making it a crime for anyone to be such a person. The phrase "consisting of two or more persons" was all that purported to define "gang," and the word "gang" was held so vague and uncertain as to violate the Fourteenth Amendment.

Connally v. General Const. Co., 269 U.S. 385, 395, 46 S.Ct. 126, 128, 129, 70 L.Ed. 322, involved a statute requiring a contractor to pay his employees "not less than the current rate of * * * wages in the locality where the work is performed," and the court held the italicized words unconstitutionally vague. Unlike the statute involved here, the statute in question was a new statute and the court noted that its application "depends, not upon a word of fixed meaning in itself, or one made definite by statutory or judicial definition * * *."

In contrast to these cases, here the challenged statute has a fixed meaning, frequently applied and impliedly interpreted by the courts in the more than one hundred years of its existence. In addition, the statute requires proof of the specific intent to commit a criminal abortion before a person may be successfully prosecuted under it.

There is, of course, a presumption in favor of constitutionality, and the invalidity of a legislative act must be clear before it can be declared unconstitutional. (In re Anderson, 69 Cal.2d 613, 628, 73 Cal.Rptr. 21, 447 P.2d 117.)

The majority cite no authority holding that the term "necessary to preserve [the woman's] life" is impermissibly vague, and I agree with the conclusion as to the constitutionality of the section that is implicit in the multitude of past decisions affirming convictions for illegal abortion, and for murder where death was the result of such an act.

I would affirm the judgment.

McCOMB and SULLIVAN, JJ., concur.

SULLIVAN, Justice (dissenting).

I concur in the views of Justice BURKE. Reading the majority's attack on Penal Code section 274, one would think that the English language which has been the sensitive instrument of our system of law for over 500 years, has lost, by the mere passage of time, all capacity for clarity of expression. The majority strike down the statute solely because they find so vague and uncertain as to offend constitutional standards of due process, a single brief clause of nine words of long and common usage: "unless the same is necessary to preserve her life." There is no mystique enveloping the statute and, as Justice BURKE points out, the clause now challenged has stood the test of over a hundred years, and presumably of countless human incidents falling within its scope, apparently without evoking a single whimpering cry against it.

The mandate of the section is plain and clear, and simply means this: no one shall intentionally procure the miscarriage of a woman unless it is necessary to save her life. "The criminal intent necessary to support a conviction of illegal abortion must show that it was performed for a purpose other than to save [the abortee's] life." (People v. Abarbanel (1965) 239 Cal.App. 2d 31, 34, 48 Cal.Rptr. 336, 338.) I dare say that the average man in the street, confronted with this law, would have little trouble in extracting its sense (we hold him accountable to much more complicated enactments); and the doctor, with his professional training and expertise would have even less. We have said that "[i]t is a cardinal rule, to be applied to the interpretation of particular words, phrases, or clauses in a statute or a Constitution, that the entire substance of the instrument or of that portion thereof which has relation to the subject under review should be looked to in order to determine the scope and purpose of the particular provision therein of which such words, phrases, or clauses form a part, and in order also to determine the particular intent of the framers of the instrument in that portion thereof wherein such words, phrases, or clauses appear." (Wallace v. Payne (1925) 197 Cal. 539, 544, 241 P. 879, 881). In the case before us, the challenged clause when so examined, is clear in meaning.

Yet the majority, by engaging in a process of elaborate and lavish analysis, transform that which is simple and lucid into something complex and arcane. Actually the analysis is focused on only three words: "necessary to preserve." Their fair equivalent is "necessary to save" (see People v. Abarbanel, supra, 239 Cal.App.2d 31, 34, 48 Cal.Rptr. 336; People v. Ballard (1959) 167 Cal.App.2d 803, 814, 817, 335 P.2d 204). Rather than evaluate these words in the light of "the entire substance" (see Wallace v. Payne, supra, 197 Cal. 539, 544, 241 P. 879), the majority resort to a dissection: "There is, of course, no standard definition of 'necessary to preserve,' and taking the words separately, no clear meaning emerges." (Majority opn., p. 358.) In support of this thesis, it is asserted that the word "necessary" does not have a "fixed meaning." In general, few words do.[1] It is futher insisted that the definition of "preserve" is "even less enlightening." Accordingly, the majority discard its obvious meaning, that is, "save," as used in the context "to save a life." From such analysis, the opinion concludes "that the term 'necessary to preserve' in section 274 of the Penal Code is not susceptible of a construction that does not violate legislative intent and that is sufficiently certain to satisfy due process requirements without

1. "Words, however, do not have absolute and constant referents. 'A word is a symbol of thought but has no arbitrary and fixed meaning like a symbol of algebra or chemistry, * * .' (Pearson v. State Social Welfare Board (1960) 54 Cal.2d 184, 195, 5 Cal.Rptr. 553, 559, 353 P.2d 33, 39.) The meaning of particular words or groups of words varies with the ' * * verbal context and surrounding circumstances and purposes in view of the linguistic education and experience of their users and their hearers or readers (not excluding judges). * * * A word has no meaning apart from these factors; much less does it have an objective meaning, one true meaning.' (Corbin, The Interpretation of Words and the Parole Evidence Rule (1965) 50 Cornell L.Q. 161, 187.)" (Pacific Gas & E. Co. v. G. W. Thomas Drayage Etc. Co. (1968) 69 Cal.2d 33, 38, 69 Cal.Rptr. 561, 564, 442 P.2d 641, 644.)

"Words are used in an endless variety of contexts. Their meaning is not subsequently attached to them by the reader but is formulated by the writer and can only be found by interpretation in the light of all the circumstances that reveal the sense in which the writer used the words." (Universal Sales Corp. v. Cal. etc. Mfg. Co. (1942) 20 Cal.2d 751, 776, 128 P.2d 665, 679, Traynor, J. concurring.)

improperly infringing on fundamental constitutional rights." (Majority opn., p. 357) Actually the gist of this is that the three words "necessary to preserve" are so shrouded in darkness that the average man cannot detect what they mean although average men and men above average have had no trouble with them for a hundred years.

I cannot accept so tortured a conclusion, wrenched from a statute which has had its roots in the law's historic solicitude for the priceless gift of life. The statute plainly prohibits an abortion unless it is necessary to save the mother's life. It strains reason to say that this crystal-clear exception to the law is "so vague that men of common intelligence must necessarily guess at its meaning * * *." (Lanzetta v. New Jersey (1939) 306 U.S. 451, 453, 59 S.Ct. 618, 619, 83 L.Ed. 888—see majority opn., p. 357.) And it strains credulity to assume that this defendant, who under the evidence wilfully violated the statute, had to engage in any such guesswork with respect to the law governing his conduct.

I would affirm the judgment.

STATE of Kansas, Appellee,

v.

Austin Lyrrell JAMIESON, Appellant.

No. 45800.

Supreme Court of Kansas.

Jan. 23, 1971.

Defendant was convicted of procuring an abortion. The Johnson District Court, Division No. 1, Herbert W. Walton, J., rendered judgment, and defendant appealed. The Supreme Court, Hatcher, C., held that information attempting to charge abortion was fatally defective for failure to negative exception of abortion statute providing that "unless the same shall have been necessary to preserve the life of such woman."

Defendant discharged from judgment and sentenced.

1. Indictment and Information ⇐111(1)

Since there is exception in abortion statute providing that statute will not apply if abortion is necessary to preserve life of woman, information charging abortion must negative exception in order to charge offense. K.S.A. 21-437.

2. Indictment and Information ⇐99

If allegations of information may be true, and defendant still is innocent of offense defined by statute on which information is based, information is jurisdictionally defective.

3. Abortion ⇐2

Manner of performance of abortion may be unlawful and still not constitute offense under abortion statute, if abortion is necessary to save life of mother. K.S.A. 21–437.

4. Indictment and Information ⇐111(1)

Information attempting to charge abortion was fatally defective for failure to negative exception of abortion statute providing that "unless the same shall have been necessary to preserve the life of such woman." K.S.A. 21–437.

Syllabus by the Court

1. Where there is an exception in a statute defining abortion, and the exception forms an integral part of the offense defined, the information must negative the exception in order to charge the offense.

2. A governing rule is that if the allegations of an information may be true and the defendant still be innocent of the offense defined by the statute the information is jurisdictionally defective.

3. An information attempting to charge the offense of abortion as defined by K.S.A. 21–437 is examined and found to be fatally defective for failure to negative the exception—"unless the same shall have been necessary to preserve the life of such woman."

Roy Lucas, New York City, argued the cause, and James C. Thompson and Anthony R. Russo, Kansas City, were with him on the brief for appellant.

David Zook, Asst. County Atty., argued the cause, and Kent Frizzell, Atty. Gen., James W. Bouska, County Atty., and Mark L. Bennett, Jr., Asst. County Atty., were with him on the brief for appellee.

HATCHER, Commissioner.

This is an appeal from a verdict and judgment convicting the defendant of the offense of procuring an abortion contrary to the provisions of K.S.A. 21–437.

Defendant's motion for a new trial was overruled and he was sentenced to confinement in the Johnson County jail for one year. He has appealed.

Although the constitutionality of the Kansas Abortion Act is challenged, we need only to consider appellant's first contention which reads:

"The trial court erred in failing to grant defendant's motion to dismiss because the information under which defendant was charged was jurisdictionally defective in that it failed to negatively aver the statutory exception—that the act charged was not 'necessary to preserve the life of such woman'. Omission of an essential element of the offense renders appellant's conviction void for lack of jurisdiction over the subject matter."

We are inclined to agree with appellant's contention. The information, with formal parts omitted, states:

"I, Hugh H. Kreamer the undersigned, Assistant County Attorney of said County, in the name, and by the authority, and on behalf of the State of Kansas, come now here, and give the Court to understand and be informed that on or about the 15th day of June A.D., 1969, in said County of Johnson, and State of Kansas, one Austin Lyrrell Jamieson did then and there Unlawfully and willfully administer to Susan Thoms, a pregnant woman, certain substance and did use or employ certain instruments, commonly known as a catheter tube and others, the names of which are unknown, with the intent thereby to procure an abortion or miscarriage of said woman.

"Contrary to the form of the Statute in such case made and provided, and against the peace and dignity of the State of Kansas, as he is informed and verily believes."

The abortion act (K.S.A. 21-437) in effect at the time of the offense attempted to be charged reads:

"Every physician or other person who shall willfully administer to any pregnant woman any medicine, drug, or substance whatsoever, or shall use or employ any instrument or means whatsoever, with intent thereby to procure abortion or the miscarriage of any such woman, unless the same shall have been necessary to preserve the life of such woman, or shall have been advised by a physician to be necessary for that purpose, shall upon conviction be adjudged guilty of a misdemeanor, and punished by imprisonment in the county jail not exceeding one year, or by fine not exceeding five hundred dollars, or by both such fine and imprisonment." (Emphasis supplied.)

There have been numerous rules stated in an attempt to determine when an exception in a criminal statute must be stated in the information.

One of the earlier rules relied on by appellant placing emphasis on the location of the exception in the statute, was repudiated by this court in State v. Eary, 121 Kan. 339, 246 P. 989, where it is said:

"The rule that exceptions contained in the clause of a statute creating an offense must be negatived, was adopted by this court at a very early day, from Archbold's Criminal Pleading and Evidence, and regarded form rather than substance:

" 'The law on this point is plain and is well stated in Archbold's Criminal Practice and Pleading, page 118, as follows: "If there be any exception contained in the same clause of the act which creates the offense, the indictment must show negatively that the defendant or the subject of the indictment does not arise within the exception. If, however, the exception or proviso be in a subsequent clause or statute, or although in the same section, yet if it be not incorporated with the enacting clause by any words of reference, it is in that case matter of defense for the other party, and need not be negatived in the pleading." ' State of Kansas v. Thompson, 2 Kan. 432, 436 [1864].

"We now regard substance instead of form, and unless the exception, wherever found, inheres so integrally in the offense that liability would necessarily be precluded unless the exception were expressly negatived, it is a matter of defense. * * *" (P. 343, 246 P. p. 991.)

[1] The well established rule in all jurisdictions is that there must be negative averment of an exception where it constitutes an integral part of the offense defined in the statute.

In State v. Hill, 189 Kan. 403, at page 410, 369 P.2d 365, at page 370, 91 A.L.R.2d 750, we stated:

"* * * The office of an exception in a statute is well understood. It is intended to exempt something from the scope of the general words of a statute or to qualify or restrain the generality of the substantive enactment to which it is attached. The relative position of an exception is unimportant since the act must be construed as a whole. It may, as here, appear in a section by itself, and when that is done it has precisely the same meaning that it would have if the exception were appropriately incorporated in the other section. (50 Am.Jur., Statutes, § 431, p. 451.) We conclude that 21-956 is not merely defensive as the state contends, but constitutes an integral part of the offense defined. As thus construed, the burden rests upon the state to allege and prove that the articles sold or exposed to sale on Sunday were of the kind and character included in the statute's prohibition and were not those excepted." (Emphasis supplied.)

The general rule may be found in 1 C.J.S. Abortion § 21, p. 327:

"Following the rules applicable to indictments and informations generally, where there is an exception in the statute defining abortion, which exception forms a part of the description of the offense so that the ingredients thereof cannot be accurately stated if the exception is omitted, the indictment must negative the exception, otherwise the offense defined by the statute is not charged. This averment should be made in terms which are direct and certain, and it should not be set out parenthetically or in ambiguous terms."

[2] There may sometimes be a dispute as to just when an exception constitutes an integral part of the offense. In State v. Ferron, 122 Kan. 845, 253 P. 402, this court announced in a very concise rule for determining just when an exception is an integral part of the offense charged. We stated:

"* * * A governing rule is that if the allegations of the information may be true and the defendant still be innocent, the information is bad. * * *" (P. 847, 253 P. p. 403.)

The defendant in the present case might be found guilty of the abortion and still be innocent under the language of the statute creating the exception.

The appellee in its brief stresses the use of the word "unlawful," stating:

"* * * The information filed herein alleges that the acts performed were performed in an 'unlawful' manner, which although failing to recite all the details, which utmost certainty might require, still fully apprised the defendant of the crime with which he was charged. * * *"

[3] The manner of the performance of the abortion might be unlawful and still not constitute an offense under the statute if necessary to save the life of the mother. It was stated in State v. Bridges, (Mo.) 412 S.W.2d 455, at page 458:

"* * * It does not follow, however, from the fact that the abortion was unlawful and felonious that the abortion was not necessary to save the mother's life. The necessity might exist and the act yet be unlawful and felonious by reason of the manner in which the defendant performed the act. A charge that the act was done unlawfully and feloniously does not supply the missing required allegation that the abortion was not necessary to preserve her life."

It might also be noted here that the appellee cites cases dealing with the burden of proof. We make no comment other than to say that we are now dealing with the allegations of an information.

The appellee also relies on the case of State v. Perello, 102 Kan. 695, 171 P. 630, where this court held that an exception in the intoxicating liquor law need not be stated in the information. In the Perello case this court went to considerable pains to state why the case was an exception to the general rule. It stated at page 697 of the opinion, at page 631 of 171 P.:

"The statute we are considering defines the offense, and in the same clause uses the language, 'except druggists or registered pharmacists as hereinafter provided.' Section 5 of the act enumerates the particular condition under which liquor may be delivered to certain persons engaged in the whole drug business and to registered pharmacists actually and in good faith engaged in the retail drug business, these exceptions being coupled with elaborate provisions designed to prevent evasion of the law. The language in section 1, 'except druggists or registered pharmacists as hereinafter provided,' does not set forth, nor does it purport to state, except in most general terms, the nature of the exceptions in favor of druggists and registered pharmacists. It is a mere parenthetical expression thrown in to show that in another part of the act provisions will be found which except certain classes of persons from the operation of the statute. As held in the Oklahoma case just cited [Smythe v. State, 2 Okl.Cr. 286, 101 P. 611.], we think the rule contended for by the appellant should never apply where the matter of such exception or proviso does not enter into and become a material part of the description of the offense. * * *"

In 1 Am.Jur.2d, Abortion, § 18, p. 198, we find the general rule stated as follows:

"Under statutes which provide in effect for the punishment of anyone who supplies or administers a medicine, drug, or substance to a pregnant woman, or uses or employs any instrument or other means whatever, with intent thereby to procure the miscarriage of such woman, unless such act is necessary to preserve her life, the authorities generally hold that the indictment must allege that production of a miscarriage was not necessary to save her life. * * *"

[4] We are forced to conclude that the exception in KSA 21-437—"unless the same shall have been necessary to preserve the life of such woman"—is an integral part of the definition of the offense of abortion, and the failure to negatively aver the exception in the information constituted a fatal defect.

It necessarily results that the conviction must be set aside and the defendant discharged from the judgment and sentence.

It is so ordered.

Civ. A. No. 70 C 395.

United States District Court, N. D. Illinois, E. D.

Jan. 29, 1971.

Action for declaratory and injunctive relief challenging constitutionality of Illinois abortion statute. The three-judge District Court, Swygert, Chief Circuit Judge, held that the Illinois abortion statute, by forcing the birth of every fetus, no matter how defective or how intensely unwanted by its future parents, displayed no legitimately compelling state interest in fetal life which would justify intrusion on woman's privacy which is involved in forcing her to bear an unwanted child; consequently, during the early stages of pregnancy—at least during the first trimester—the state may not prohibit, restrict or otherwise limit women's access to abortion procedures performed by licensed physicians operating in licensed facilities.

Plaintiffs' motion for summary judgment granted and defendants' motion denied.

Campbell, Senior District Judge, dissented and filed opinion.

Illinois abortion statute, by requiring a woman to risk physical and emotional harm short of death when a therapeutic abortion would remove that risk, did not bear scrutiny as a health measure for the benefit of women. S.H.A.Ill. ch. 38, § 23–1(b).

7. Abortion ⇐1

Illinois abortion statute, by forcing the birth of every fetus, no matter how defective or how intensely unwanted by its future parents, displayed no legitimately compelling state interest in fetal life which would justify intrusion on woman's privacy which is involved in forcing her to bear an unwanted child; consequently, during the early stages of pregnancy—at least during the first trimester—the state may not prohibit, restrict or otherwise limit women's access to abortion procedures performed by licensed physicians operating in licensed facilities. MEMORANDUM OPINION

SWYGERT, Chief Circuit Judge.

This is an action for declaratory and injunctive relief brought to declare that the Illinois abortion statute [1] is violative of the United States Constitution for one or more reasons.[2] After a three-judge district court was convened the parties were ordered to restrict their arguments to the allegations that the statute is unconstitutionally vague and unconstitutionally invades the privacy of pregnant women. Oral argument was heard, and the case is now before us on a multiplicity of motions including cross-motions of plaintiffs and defendants for summary judgment.

Plaintiffs Doe and Roe, suing anonymously on behalf of themselves and all other women similarly situated, assert that they were unable to obtain legal, medically safe abortions in Illinois because their physicians reasonably believed that they could not perform such an operation upon the plaintiffs without fear of prosecution by defendant law enforcement officials pursuant to the challenged statute. Plaintiff Doe, a woman of means, subsequently had a successful abortion performed in Great Britain, while plaintiff Roe, who is indigent, was compelled to bear an unwanted child since the option of a foreign abortion was economically foreclosed. Plaintiffs Danforth, Fields, Wynn and Zuspan, all licensed physicians, sue on behalf of themselves, and all other similarly situated physicians, alleging that the existence of the challenged statute interferes with and adversely affects their ability to conduct their medical practices with proper regard for their patients' best interests. Intervening plaintiff Poe is a high school girl who was pregnant as a result of a forcible rape and sues anonymously by her mother as next friend, asserting the same claims as Doe and Roe.[3]

The principal defendants are William J. Scott, Attorney General of the State of Illinois, and Edward V. Hanrahan, State's Attorney of Cook County, Illinois. Both are law enforcement officials of the State of Illinois who are charged with enforcing its laws, including the challenged statute. Intervening defendant Heffernan is a licensed physician who has been granted leave to appear herein as guardian ad litem for those conceived but not yet born.

[1] Defendant Scott asserts that he is not a proper party to this action. Although the Illinois statutes do not make the attorney general the chief prosecutor pursuant to the state's criminal statutes, the leading Illinois case clothes his office with the same authority as attorneys general at the common law. In Fergus v. Russel, 270 Ill. 304, 110 N.E. 130 (1915), the Illinois Supreme Court held that, although the state legislature may confer powers additional to those inherent in the common law office of attorney general, it may not deprive the office of any of its historical powers and duties as chief legal representative of the state.[4] The court further stated, "[A]t common law the Attorney General was the law officer of the crown and its chief representative in the courts."[5] Furthermore, the attorney general has conceded that he is required to represent the people of the state before the supreme court in all matters in which their interests are apparent and to assist in the prosecution of any criminal trial when he believes the people's interest requires it.[6] Indeed, the overlap of the powers and duties of the state's attorneys of the several counties and the attorney general is such that it appears that, where their powers are concurrent, either officer may initiate appropriate proceedings in the name of the state if the other has not acted.[7] We hold, therefore, that the attorney general is a proper party defendant in this action.

[2, 3] Defendants challenge the standing of the plaintiffs to raise the claims which they assert. The female plaintiffs allege that the operation of the statute deprived them of their asserted right to terminate unwanted pregnancies in the state of their residence. They assert that they have been injured either by having been forced to bear unwanted children or by having to travel to foreign states to obtain abortions by qualified medical personnel. We have no doubt that, "On the basis of plaintiffs' substantive contentions, * * * there * * * exists a 'nexus between the status asserted by the [female plaintiffs] and the claim(s) (they present).'"[8] The standing requirements of Flast v. Cohen, 392 U.S. 83, 102, 88 S.Ct. 1942, 20 L.Ed. 2d 947 (1968), are thus satisfied by the litigative posture of the female plaintiffs. Moreover, the physician-plaintiffs have standing to raise the claims of their

3. On March 23, 1970, Poe moved for leave to intervene and for the issuance of a temporary restraining order enjoining the defendants from attempting to enforce the Illinois statute against Poe's physician for terminating her pregnancy. On March 27 Poe was allowed to intervene, but her request for a restraining order was denied. On March 30 the Court of Appeals for the Seventh Circuit issued the temporary restraining order requested by Poe.

[4] Plaintiffs contend that the Illinois abortion statute must be adjudged unconstitutionally vague. We agree. The statute prohibits all abortions except those "performed by a physician * * * in a licensed hospital or other licensed medical facility because necessary for the preservation of the woman's life." [10] Plaintiffs point to the italicized language as the basis for their assertion that the statute is invalid under the due process clause of the fourteenth amendment because of its imprecision. It is clear that, as the Supreme Court has said:

> No one may be required at peril of life, liberty or property to speculate as to the meaning of penal statutes. All are entitled to be informed as to what the State commands or forbids. * * * "[A] statute which either forbids or requires the doing of an act in terms so vague that men of common intelligence must necessarily guess at its meaning and differ as to its application, violates the first essential of due process of law." [11]

The question thus becomes whether men of ordinary intelligence must guess at the meaning of the words, "necessary for the preservation of the woman's life."

We note at the outset that these words, or substantially identical ones, have convinced some courts that they are incapable of certain interpretation,[12] and other courts have disagreed.[13] If courts cannot agree on what is the essential meaning of "necessary for the preservation of the woman's life" and like words, we fail to see how those who may be subject to the statute's proscriptions can know what it prohibits. On the issue of vagueness, we are in agreement with the reasoning of People v. Belous [14] and Roe v. Wade.[15] One need not inquire in great depth as to the meaning of such words as "necessary" and "preserve" to conclude that the holdings of those cases are correct. "Necessary" has been characterized as vague by the United States Supreme Court [16] and has been similarly described by other courts.[17] It is "a word susceptible of various meanings. It may import absolute physical necessity or inevitability, or it may import that which is only convenient, useful, appropriate, proper, or conducive to the end sought." [18]

The word "preserve" is similarly susceptible of so broad a range of connotations as to render its meaning in the statute gravely amorphous, since it may mean anything from maintaining something in its status quo to preventing the total destruction of something.[19] The treating physician who believes an abortion is medically or psychiatrically indicated thus finds himself threatened with becoming a felon as well as with the possibility of losing his right to practice his profession if he errs in the legal interpretation of a penal statute, the words of which have not been sufficiently definite for courts to agree on their meaning.[20] This is precisely the kind of situation that the void-for-vagueness doctrine is intended to prevent.

II

[5] Aside from the fact that the statute is vague, its practical effect is to make abortion unavailable to women unless there is a reasonable certainty that death will result from a continuation of pregnancy. This practical effect of the statute constitutes an intrusion on constitutionally protected areas too sweeping to be justified as necessary to accomplish any compelling state interest. These protected areas are women's rights to life, to control over their own bodies, and to freedom and privacy in matters relating to sex and procreation.

The Supreme Court has long recognized that a person possesses a fundamental, constitutionally protected right to privacy and freedom in certain personal and intimate matters, especially those pertaining to the home and family.[21] This right was developed and applied by the Supreme Court to strike down a state's birth control statute in Griswold v. Connecticut.[22] The Court there held that "specific guarantees in the Bill of Rights have penumbras, formed by emanations from those guarantees that help give them life and substance. * * * Various guarantees create zones of privacy."[23] Griswold set out in broad terms the right of married couples to be free from governmental intrusion into their intimate affairs:

> We cannot distinguish the interests asserted by the plaintiffs in this case from those asserted in Griswold. In both, "[t]he essence of the interest sought to be protected * * * is the right of choice over events which, by their character and consequences, bear in a fundamental manner on the privacy of individuals."[24] It is as true after conception as before that "there is no topic more closely interwoven with the intimacy of the home and marriage than that which relates to the conception and bearing of progeny."[25] We believe that Griswold and related cases establish that matters pertaining to procreation, as well as to marriage, the family, and sex are surrounded by a zone of privacy which protects activities concerning such matters from unjustified governmental intrusion.[26]

20. The problem faced by a treating physician in Illinois is as described in Roe v. Wade, 314 F.Supp. 1217, 1223 (N.D.Tex. 1970):

> How likely must death be? Must death be certain if the abortion is not performed? Is it enough that the woman could not undergo birth without an ascertainably higher possibility of death than would normally be the case? What if the woman threatened suicide if the abortion was not performed? How imminent must death be if the abortion is not performed? Is it sufficient if having the child will shorten the life of the woman by a number of years? These questions simply cannot be answered.

We do not agree with the defendants that the choice whether to have a child is protected before conception but is not so protected immediately after conception has occurred.[27] A woman's interest in privacy and in control over her body is just as seriously interfered with by a law which prohibits abortions as it is by a law which prohibits the use of contraceptives. The majority of courts which have considered the question have so held, concluding that a woman has a fundamental interest in choosing to terminate a pregnancy. In People v. Belous, supra, the California Supreme Court struck down that state's abortion statute, holding:

> The fundamental right of the woman to choose whether to bear children follows from the Supreme Court's and this court's repeated acknowledgment of a "right of privacy" or "liberty" in matters related to marriage, family, and sex.[28]

In United States v. Vuitch, supra, a single district court judge struck down a portion of the District of Columbia abortion statute, saying:

> There has been, moreover, an increasing indication in decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States that as a secular matter a woman's liberty and right of privacy extends to family, marriage and sex matters and may well include the right to remove an unwanted child at least in early stages of pregnancy. * * * Matters have certainly reached a point where a sound, informed interest of the state must affirmatively appear before the state infringes unduly on such rights.[29]

More recently, in Babbitz v. McCann,[30] and in Roe v. Wade, [31] three-judge courts found that the right to choose whether to bear a child was fundamental and struck down state abortion statutes.

[6] Of course, the determination that women have a fundamental interest in choosing whether to terminate pregnancies does not establish that the Illinois statute is unconstitutional. The critical issue is whether the state has a compelling interest in preventing abortions in the early stages of pregnancy except where the death of the woman is reasonably certain.[32] A stat-

26. As former Supreme Court Justice Tom C. Clark has said:
> The result of [Griswold and its predecessors] is the evolution of the concept that there is a certain zone of individual privacy which is protected by the Constitution. Unless the State has a compelling subordinating interest that outweighs the individual rights of human beings, it may not interfere with a person's marriage, home, children, and day-to-day living habits. This is one of the most fundamental concepts that the Founding Fathers had in mind when they drafted the Constitution.

Clark, Religion, Morality, and Abortion: A Constitutional Appraisal, 2 Loyola Univ. (L.A.) L.Rev. 1, 8 (1969).

27. Again, Mr. Justice Clark observed:
> [A]bortion falls within that sensitive area of privacy—the marital relation. One of the basic values of this privacy is birth control, as evidenced by the Griswold decision. Griswold's act was to prevent formation of the fetus. This, the Court found, was constitutionally protected. If an individual may prevent conception, why can he not nullify that conception when prevention has failed?

ute which requires a woman to risk physical and emotional harm short of death when a therapeutic abortion would remove that risk does not bear scrutiny as a health measure for the benefit of women.

[7] Moreover, a statute which forces the birth of every fetus, no matter how defective or how intensely unwanted by its future parents, displays no legitimately compelling state interest in fetal life, especially when viewed with regard for the countervailing rights of pregnant women. We do not believe that the state has a compelling interest in preserving all fetal life which justifies the gross intrusion on a woman's privacy which is involved in forcing her to bear an unwanted child. We therefore rule that during the early stages of pregnancy—at least during the first trimester—the state may not prohibit, restrict or otherwise limit women's access to abortion procedures performed by licensed physicians operating in licensed facilities.

In holding that the state has not shown sufficient justification to permit us to uphold its abortion statute in its entirety, we are in agreement with the court's statement in Babbitz v. McCann:

> The defendants urge that the state's interest in protecting the embryo is a sufficient basis to sustain the statute. Upon a balancing of the relevant interests, we hold that a woman's right to refuse to carry an embryo during the early months of pregnancy may not be invaded by the state without a more compelling public necessity than is reflected in the statute in question.[33]

Accordingly, the Illinois abortion statute, Illinois Revised Statutes, Chapter 38, Section 23–1, is unconstitutional because it is impermissibly vague and unduly infringes women's right to privacy insofar as it restricts or prohibits the performance of abortions during the first trimester of pregnancy by licensed physicians in a licensed hospital or other licensed medical facility.

ORDER

1. The foregoing opinion shall stand as findings of fact and conclusions of law.

2. The motion of plaintiffs for summary judgment is hereby granted, and the motion of defendants for summary judgment is hereby denied.

3. The motion of defendant Scott to dismiss this action as against him is hereby denied.

4. All other motions presently outstanding are hereby denied to the extent not expressly granted herein or mooted by or subsumed in the foregoing opinion or this order.

It is therefore ordered, adjudged and decreed:

1. That the Illinois abortion statute, Illinois Revised Statutes, Chapter 38, Section 23–1, be and the same is hereby declared to be violative of the Constitution of the United States and is null and void insofar as it restricts or prohibits the performance of abortions during the first trimester of pregnancy by licensed physicians in a licensed hospital or other licensed medical facility.

2. That the defendants, their officers, agents, servants, employees, and attorneys, and those persons who act in active concert or participation with them be and the same are hereby permanently enjoined, without bond, from executing or enforcing, or threatening to execute or enforce, the Illinois abortion statute, Illinois Revised Statutes, Chapter 38, Section 23–1 against physicians licensed to practice medicine and surgery in all its branches performing abortions during the first trimester of pregnancy in a licensed hospital or other licensed medical facility.

CAMPBELL, Senior Judge (dissenting).

The typically erudite opinion of our distinguished Chief Judge Swygert excellently presents some philosophical reasons for amendment to or repeal of the existing abortion statute by the Illinois Legislature. I must respectfully disagree however when these reasons are advanced to support a judicial determination that the statute "is unconstitutional because it is impermissibly vague and unduly infringes women's right to privacy." Neither the wisdom of this statute nor its conformity to the accepted mores of Illinois in 1971 is the issue before us. As a federal court we are concerned only with the limited question of whether in enacting this statute the people of Illinois have exceeded the limitations of the United States Constitution.

By their foregoing decision and order in this case concluding that those limits have been exceeded, my learned brothers strike down a state statute which has been enforced for one hundred years [1] and impose upon the people of Illinois their own views on this most important and controversial issue concerning public health and morals. In my view this unwarranted intrusion by the federal judiciary into the affairs of Illinois in the name of constitutional interpretation is far beyond properly limited federal powers and is not supported by the facts of this case nor the precedents cited by my brethren.

The basis of the majority decision is twofold: (1) the Illinois statute (and particularly the exception found therein) is so vague as to render it unconstitutional; and (2) by prohibiting the destruction of fetal life the statute invades the privacy of the women and the family entities of Illinois.

On the vagueness question I first observe that we have before us no contention by any party that an actual situation exists where a licensed physician acting in good faith is in jeopardy of prosecution for performing an abortion he believed to be "necessary for the preservation of the woman's life." In other words we are presented with no actual circumstance where the vagueness question is in issue. The rather forced game of semantics urged by plaintiffs and adopted by the majority has not presented any actual controversy but is merely a convenient vehicle for these plaintiffs to challenge a law which they believe is unwise and which they have thus far despite heroic efforts been unable to repeal or amend by the legislative process.[2]

A perusal of state and federal criminal codes reveals numerous examples of statutes which have been held constitutional and which are not as clear and definite as this one. Indeed Chief Judge Swygert, in writing his court's opinion upholding the constitutionality of the Illinois disorderly conduct statute, found that the language of that statute prohibiting any act done in "such unreasonable manner as to alarm or disturb another" was not unconstitutionally vague. As stated by him in that opinion: "The Constitution does not require impossible standards of specificity in penal statutes. It requires only that the statute convey 'sufficiently definite warning as to the proscribed conduct when measured by common understanding and practices.'" United States v. Woodard, 376 F.2d 136, 140 (7th Cir. 1967).

His opinion goes on to state, "The statute proscribes conduct that is so unreasonable as to 'alarm or disturb' another and provoke a 'breach of the peace'. The term 'breach of the peace' has never had a precise meaning in relation to specific conduct. Yet from its early common law origin to the present it has received a fairly well defined gloss." (Id. at 141). In our case, however, the same judge concludes that men and women of ordinary intelligence cannot understand the essential meaning of the words, "necessary for the preservation of the woman's life." I find it difficult to reconcile the reasoning in the Woodard case with that set forth in the opinion of the majority herein.

1. The present statute is essentially the same as that enacted in 1874. (R.S. 1874, Ch. 38, Div. 1, § 3.)

2. Attempts to amend or repeal the present statute failed in the last (1969) session of the General Assembly. New proposals have already been introduced in the present (1971) session.

The words of the Illinois Abortion Statute taken in their ordinary meaning sufficiently convey definite warning as to the proscribed conduct and "have over a long period of years proved entirely adequate to inform the public, including both lay and professional people, of what is forbidden." Steinberg v. Rhodes, 321 F.Supp. 741, 745 (N.D.Ohio, 1970); Babbitz v. McCann, 310 F.Supp. 293, 297 (E.D.Wis.1970). The statement of the court in the Steinberg opinion is appropriate here:—"The problem of the plaintiffs is not that they do not understand, but that basically they do not accept, its proscription." 321 F.Supp. at p. 745.

I find the second conclusion of the majority, that the statute is not supported by a sufficient legitimate state interest, even more disconcerting. As the majority correctly points out, the determination that women have a fundamental interest in choosing whether to terminate pregnancies does not in and of itself establish that the Illinois statute is unconstitutional. The critical issue is whether the state has a sufficient interest in preventing abortion to justify its prohibition. My brothers conclude that the State of Illinois does not have a sufficient interest in preserving fetal life to support the statute before us, when the same is viewed with regard for countervailing rights to terminate pregnancies. It is at this juncture that I again part company with my brothers.

We, as did the Illinois Legislature, have before us the following undisputed facts relating to fetal life. Seven weeks after conception the fertilized egg develops into a well proportioned small scale baby. It bears all of the familiar external features and all the internal organs of an adult human being. It has muscles; hands with fingers and thumbs; and the legs have recognizable knees, ankles and toes.

The brain is operative and sends out impulses that coordinate the function of the other organs. Brain waves have been noted at 43 days. The heart beats; the stomach produces digestive juices; the liver manufactures blood cells; and the kidneys begin to function by extracting uric acid from the blood.

In the third month it can kick its legs, turn its feet, curl and fan its toes, make a fist, move its thumb, bend its wrist, turn its head, and even open its mouth and swallow and drink the amniotic fluid that surrounds it. Thumb sucking has been noted at this age and the first respiratory motions move fluid in and out of its lungs with inhaling and exhaling respiratory movements.

In the twelfth week it can move its thumb, in opposition to its fingers. It swallows regularly. It has active reflexes. The facial expressions of a fetus in its third month are already similar to the facial expression of its parents. By the end of that first trimester the fetus is a sentient moving being.

In the third month finger nails appear; sexual differentiation is apparent in both internal and external organs; and vocal chords are completed.

From the twelfth to the sixteenth week the child grows to eight or ten inches in height and receives oxygen and food from its mother through the placental attachment. In the fifth month it gains two inches in height and ten ounces in weight. A doctor will soon hear the heart beat with his stethoscope. It sleeps and wakes and may be awakened by external vibrations.

In the sixth month the fetus develops a strong muscular grip with its hands; starts to breathe regularly and can maintain a respiratory response for twenty-four hours if born prematurely. It may even have a slim chance of surviving in an incubator. A child has been known to survive between twenty to twenty-five weeks old. Indeed, as medical science progresses in the field of detection the date of potential viability moves continually closer to earlier stages of gestation.

Dr. Arnold Gesell, in his publication. "The Embryology of Behavior,[3] notes:—

"Our own repeated observation of a large group of fetal infants (an individual born and living at any time prior to forty weeks gestation) left us with no doubt that psychologically they were individuals. Just as no two looked alike, so no two behaved precisely alike. One was impassive when another was alert. Even among the youngest there were discernible differences in vividness, reactivity and responsiveness. These were genuine individual differences, already prophetic of the diversity which distinguishes the human family."

Similar facts of fetal life are discussed in detail in a recently published Law Review article, Byrn, Abortion-On-Demand: Whose Morality? 46 N.D. Law. 5 (1970). Professor Byrn concludes:—

"In summary: at eight weeks, after which the great majority of abortions are performed, the fetus is irreversibly organized into a recognizable human-child, is responsive to stimulation, and is possessed of a pumping heart, a functioning circulatory system, an active brain and all other internal organs. From the practical scientific point of view, 'By the eighth week the embryo or fetus, as we now call it, is an unmistakable human being * * *.'"

This author also points out that abortion is a violent procedure regardless of the stage of pregnancy. Byrn, Supra, p. 32.

Professor Byrn also relates (at pp. 8–9) the following experience of Paul E. Rockwell, M.D., Director of Anesthesiology at Leonard Hospital, Troy, New York:

"Eleven years ago while giving an anesthetic for a ruptured ectopic pregnancy (at two months gestation) I was handed what I believe was the smallest living human being ever seen. The embryo sac was intact and transparent. Within the sac was a tiny (approx. 1 cm.) human male swimming extremely vigorously in the amniotic fluid, while attached to the wall by the umbilical cord. This tiny human was perfectly developed, with long, tapering fingers, feet and toes. It was almost transparent, as regards the skin, and the delicate arteries and veins were prominent to the ends of the fingers.

"The baby was extremely alive and swam about the sac approximately one time per second, with a natural swimmer's stroke. This tiny human did not look at all like the photos and drawings and models of 'embryos' which I have seen, nor did it look like a few embryos I have been able to observe since then, obviously because this one was alive!

"* * * When the sac was opened, the tiny human immediately lost its life and took on the appearance of what is accepted as the appearance of an embryo at this age (blunt extremities, etc.)

"It is my opinion that if the lawmakers and people realized that very vigorous life is present, it is possible that abortion would be found much more objectionable than euthanasia."

In my opinion the undisputed medical facts of record herein establish a sufficient state interest in the preservation of life to support the constitutionality of the statute before us.

The majority opinion does not hold that the Illinois Statute is void in its entirety or that every statute that prohibits the destruction of fetal life is unconstitutional. Rather, it seems to hold that the people of this State have a legitimate legislative interest in protecting some fetal life, but that the present statute which protects, "every fetus, no matter how defective or how intensely unwanted by its future parents, displays no legitimately compelling state interest." I believe what the majority is suggesting is that if the Illinois Legislature had adopted a statute which, while prohibiting abortions generally, permitted the destruction of the "defective" fetus or one that is "intensely unwanted" it would have displayed a legitimate state interest. It seems to me apparent, however, that if the legislature has the power to decide that a non defective fetus may not be destroyed, it can also decide that a defective fetus may not be destroyed. How much latitude shall judicially be given the legislature in its determination as to what is and what is not a sufficient "defect" to warrant destruction? How unwanted must a potential child be before its parents can demand destruction under the suggested judicial "intensely unwanted" standard? Merely stating these propositions illustrates the extent to which my brothers have wandered into the legislative domain in reaching their decision in this case.

3. Harper and Brothers, Publishers (1945), at p. 172.

But the majority does not rest its conclusion of unconstitutionality on such a tenuous base. Instead, the majority states: "We therefore rule that during the early stages of pregnancy—at least during the first trimester—the state may not prohibit, restrict or otherwise limit women's access to abortion procedures * * *" The opinion does not explain or even intimate how it arrived at this constitutional conclusion. It appears to me that my brothers have, by judicial fiat, successfully amended the Illinois statute to permit abortions in the first three months of pregnancy. Ironically, their amendment does not even meet sound legislative standards. No where do they explain how the "first trimester" test was arrived at, or what relationship it might have to the previously discussed notions of defectiveness or unwantedness. What rational basis supports their conclusion that the people of Illinois may have a sufficient interest in protecting the life of a fetus which has matured to the first trimester, but that no legitimate interest exists for protecting a life of a fetus a few days younger? I believe the Illinois Legislature, in adopting the present statute, was less arbitrary even if not as competent as my brothers on these social and moral matters. In my opinion, however, the legislature alone should determine what value society will place on this form of life, regardless of the age of development.

Thus far I have avoided any discussion of the sensitive subject of whether fetal life is "human" life. Admittedly physicians argue as to what point in the fetal development human life commences. As former Supreme Court Justice Tom C. Clark states in the Law Review article quoted by the majority, "Some physicians argue that abortion should be permitted with impunity at any time up to the sixth month of pregnancy since prior to that time the fetus is no more than a growing plant. On the other hand, many eminent physicians believe that the fertilized ovum has human life from the time of conception. In support of this argument they refer to the International Code of Medical Ethics, which states that a physician will maintain the utmost respect for human life, from the time of its conception." Clark, Religion, Morality and Abortion: A Constitutional Appraisal, 2 Loy.U.L.Rev. 1, 5 (1969). Assuming arguendo that fetal life is human life, can there be any question but that the State of Illinois has a sufficient legislative interest in its protection? And, in view of the varied opinions in medical science, is not the determination of when human life commences better left to the legislature, rather than the courts? This was the conclusion reached by Mr. Justice Clark in the above quoted article. Significantly, while liberally quoting Justice Clark's article on the subject of abortion (see notes 26 and 27), the majority conveniently ignores its conclusion and admonition as follows:—

"Accommodation of conflicting doctrine is more difficult to achieve in the judicial than in the legislative process. Courts cannot reach out to reform our society. A problem comes to the Court in the form of a justiciable issue and is narrowly drawn, rendering the Court's ruling contracted and finespun. Legislatures, on the other hand, have such facilities for investigation as hearings and may address themselves to the necessities of broad social needs and the correction of evils, both probable and existing. As Mr. Justice Cardozo said, 'Legislation can eradicate a cancer, right some hoary wrong, correct some definitely established evil, which defies the feebler remedies, the distinctions and the fictions familiar to the judicial process.'

"The courts work on a case-by-case system which deals with the past rather than the future. Society would not have the benefit of the sweeping effect of a statute, nor would the doctor have the protection that he is entitled to receive. The case method would be slow, expensive, and possibly disastrous. It is for the legislature to determine the proper balance, i. e., that point between prevention of conception and viability of the fetus which would give the State the compelling subordinating interest so that it may regulate or prohibit abortion without violating the individual's constitutionally protected rights." (At pp. 10–11).

To support their conclusion that the people of Illinois have exceeded the proper bounds of legislative interest, the majority primarily rely on the rationale of the Supreme Court in Griswold v. Connecticut, 381 U.S. 479, 85 S.Ct. 1678, 14 L.Ed.2d 510. But Griswold held only that a statute which forbade the use of contraceptives by married couples violated their right to privacy. In writing the opinion of the Court, Mr. Justice Douglas indicated that the Connecticut statute was "unnecessarily broad" and prevented activities which might otherwise be subject to state regulation. (381 U.S. 485, 85 S.Ct. 1678). The more thorough concurring opinion, written by Mr. Justice Goldberg, stressed that there was in that case no showing that the statute was necessary to accomplish a permissible state interest.

In this case, however, there is in my opinion a valid and permissible state interest—the protection of human life or at least the protection of potential human life in the fetus. In my opinion the statute in question is no broader than is necessary to accomplish this valid and permissible state interest even though it does not distinguish or provide exceptions, as my brothers would prefer, for those which are "defective" or "intensely unwanted," or have not matured to "the first trimester of pregnancy."

In citing Griswold, the majority concludes: "we cannot distinguish the interests asserted by the plaintiffs in this case from those asserted in Griswold." In other words, in their views, there is no distinction that can be made between prohibiting the use of contraceptives and prohibiting the destruction of fetal life, which as explained above may reasonably be construed to be human life. I find this assertion incredible. Contraception prevents the creation of new life. Abortion destroys existing life. Contraception and abortion are as distinguishable as thoughts or dreams are distinguishable from reality.

As for myself I am confronted with and bound by the plain facts before us in this case and I must conclude that the people of Illinois have a legitimate and sufficient interest in protecting fetal life to support the statute here considered. I find nothing in the Court's teachings in Griswold to the contrary.

No individual right or freedom is ever advanced in this country through an unwarranted intrusion of the judiciary into the proper province of the legislature. Indeed, in these days of pressure groups regularly seeking from courts that which only legislatures can properly give, constitutional government is weakened each time courts place their personal philosophical views above the law.

I would grant the motion of defendants for summary judgment and leave the plaintiffs' cause where under the Constitution it belongs—in the Illinois Legislature.

Item No. 19

IN THE UNITED STATES DISTRICT COURT FOR THE DISTRICT OF UTAH

CENTRAL DIVISION

JANE DOE, Plaintiff, vs. CALVIN L. RAMPTON, Governor of the State of Utah; and VERNON B. ROMNEY, Attorney General of the State of Utah, Defendants.	TEMPORARY RESTRAINING ORDER No. C-234-70

The above entitled matter having come duly before the above entitled Court, the Honorable Willis W. Ritter presiding, on Monday, the 14th day of September, 1970, upon the plaintiff's Application for a Temporary Restraining Order, and the plaintiff being represented by counsel, David S. Dolowitz, Esq., and the defendants being represented by counsel, Joseph P. McCarthy, Esq., and the Court having considered the records, files, papers and the arguments of counsel in the foregoing matter, this Court enters the following findings of fact:

FINDINGS OF FACT

1. That plaintiff Jane Doe is pregnant, being, upon her doctor's advice, in her tenth to twelfth week of pregnancy.

2. That plaintiff Jane Doe has three children.

3. That plaintiff Jane Doe is currently receiving public welfare assistance from the State of Utah.

4. That plaintiff Jane Doe desires to be aborted from her pregnancy.

5. That the danger in performing an abortion increases substantially after the twelfth week.

6. That plaintiff Jane Doe desires and Dr. X is willing to perform, a therapeutic abortion, aborting and terminating the current pregnancy of the plaintiff.

From the foregoing findings of fact, this Court makes the following conclusions of law:

CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

1. That the plaintiff Jane Doe will suffer immediate and irreparable injury if the defendants are not enjoined and restrained from enforcing the provisions of Sections 76-2-1 and 76-2-2, Utah Code Annotated 1953.

2. That the issues presented in this case are substantial issues of federal constitutional law and it appears from examination of the applicable cases, to wit: Griswold v. Connecticut, 381 U.S. 479; People v. Bellous, 80 Cal. Rptr. 354, 458 P.2d 194 (1969), cert. den. 38 L.W. 3320, 3325; Babbitz v. McCann, 310 F. Supp. 293 (E.D. Wis. 1970); and United States v. Vuitch, 305 F. Supp. 1032 (D.D.C. 1969); see Doe v. Scott, 310 F. Supp. 689 (N.D. Ill. 1970), reversed ___ F.2d ___ (7th Cir. 1970), that the plaintiff is likely to prevail on the merits.

3. That no security should be required of the plaintiff for the issuance of this Order.

Accordingly, IT IS HEREBY ORDERED that the Governor of the State of Utah, the Honorable Calvin L. Rampton, and the Attorney General of the State of Utah, the Honorable Vernon R. Romney, defendants in the above entitled matter, are hereby enjoined and restrained from enforcing the provisions of Sections 76-2-1 and 76-2-2, Utah Code Annotated 1953, to plaintiff Jane Doe for securing and to her physician, Dr. X, from providing a therapeutic abortion, aborting and terminating her current pregnancy. This Order shall run for ten days from the signing hereof.

IT IS FURTHER ORDERED that said Order shall be entered without the requirement of the posting of security.

Dated this 14th day of September, 1970.

E. Michael McCANN, District Attorney of Milwaukee County, F. Ryan Duffy, Jr., Judge of the County Court, Milwaukee County, Defendants.

No. 69-C-548.

United States District Court, E. D. Wisconsin.

March 5, 1970.

A physician brought an action challenging constitutionality of Wisconsin abortion statute and sought injunctive and declaratory judgment relief. A Three-Judge District Court held that Wisconsin statute making it a criminal offense to perform an abortion except a therapeutic abortion which is necessary to save life of mother is not unconstitutionally vague or a denial of equal protection of the laws, but is an unconstitutional invasion of woman's private right to refuse to carry unquickened embryo during the early months of pregnancy.

Declaratory judgment for plaintiff and injunctive relief denied.

Nathaniel Rothstein, Milton R. Bordow and Roy O. Conen, Milwaukee, Wis., for plaintiff.

E. Michael McCann, Dist. Atty., Milwaukee, Wis., for defendants.

Before KERNER, Circuit Judge, and REYNOLDS and GORDON, District Judges.

PER CURIAM.

The plaintiff is a physician who challenges the constitutionality of the Wisconsin abortion statute. He seeks an injunction restraining the defendants from enforcing a part of Wis.Stat. § 940.04 and a judgment declaring it unconstitutional.

A temporary restraining order was denied by the order of a single-judge district court, 306 F.Supp. 400, and the instant three-judge district court was convened to consider the other issues presented. We hold that portions of the statute are constitutionally invalid, but we decline to enjoin the pending state prosecution of the plaintiff.

The plaintiff is being prosecuted by the district attorney of Milwaukee county for allegedly having performed an abortion in violation of § 940.04, Wis. Stats. The statute provides in part as follows:

"(1) Any person, other than the mother, who intentionally destroys the life of an unborn child may be fined not more than $5,000 or imprisoned not more than 3 years or both.

"(2) any person, other than the mother, who does either of the following may be imprisoned not more than 15 years:

"(a) Intentionally destroys the life of an unborn quick child; or

* * * * * *

"(5) This section does not apply to a therapeutic abortion which:

"(a) Is performed by a physician; and

"(b) Is necessary, or is advised by 2 other physicians as necessary, to save the life of the mother; and

"(c) Unless an emergency prevents, is performed in a licensed maternity hospital.

"(6) In this section 'unborn child' means a human being from the time of conception until it is born alive."

The state warrant issued against Dr. Babbits reads as follows:

"That the above named Defendant on the 6th day of September, 1969, in the County of Milwaukee, Wisconsin, did feloniously destroy the life of an unborn child of one, [woman], said offense occurring at number 231 West Wisconsin Avenue, Milwaukee, Wisconsin, said abortion not being advised by two other physicians as necessary to save the life of [woman], the mother of said child, said information being obtained by sworn testimony of [woman] before the Honorable Christ T. Seraphim, County Judge, acting as magistrate."

[1] The complaint asserts that there is jurisdiction in this court pursuant to 28 U.S.C. § 1343, 42 U.S.C. § 1983 and 28 U.S.C. §§ 2201 and 2202; we agree with such position.

The complaint charges that the Wisconsin statute is unconstitutional for violating the first and fourteenth amendments of the United States Constitution and for abridging the mother's right of privacy. Dr. Babbitz has not been charged with having destroyed an unborn child which was "quick", and therefore subsections (2) and (2) (a) of the statute quoted above are not applicable in the instant case. There is no allegation that the state officials are acting in bad faith in prosecuting Dr. Babbitz.

I. ABSTENTION

[2] The plaintiff has alleged a deprivation of rights secured by the Constitution, and serious federal questions are raised here concerning the constitutionality of certain portions of the Wisconsin abortion statute. Since the complaint seeks injunctive relief and since the statute in question has state-wide operation, the designation of a three-judge court was appropriate under 28 U.S.C. § 2281.

The request for an injunction raises a threshold problem of abstention. Congress, in 28 U.S.C. § 2283, has stated a strong policy of abstention, as follows:

"Stay of State court proceedings. A court of the United States may not grant an injunction to stay proceedings in a State court except as expressly authorized by Act of Congress, or where necessary in aid of its jurisdiction, or to protect or effectuate its judgments."

Except for those rather recent cases which have noted exceptions to the scope of § 2283, the federal courts have generally given the statute literal application. In addition, the policy of abstention has found expression in a long history of judge-made rules of federal judicial forebearance. Mr. Justice Frankfurter's expressions in Railroad Commission of Texas v. Pullman Co., 312 U.S. 496, 500–501, 61 S.Ct. 643, 645, 85 L.Ed. 971 (1941), typify these court-fashioned rules of abstention:

"Few public interests have a higher claim upon the discretion of a federal chancellor than the avoidance of needless friction with state policies, whether the policy relates to the enforcement of the criminal law, Fenner v. Boykin, 271 U.S. 240, 46 S.Ct. 492, 70 L.Ed. 927; Spielman Motor Co. v. Dodge, 295 U.S. 89, 55 S.Ct. 678, 79 L.Ed. 1322; or the administration of a specialized scheme for liquidating embarrassed business enterprises, Pennsylvania v. Williams, 294 U.S. 176, 55 S.Ct. 380, 79 L.Ed. 841, 96 A.L.R. 1166; or the final authority of a state court to interpret doubtful regulatory laws of the state, Gilchrist v. Interborough Co., 279 U.S. 159, 49 S.Ct. 282, 73 L.Ed. 652; cf. Hawks v. Hamill, 288 U.S. 52, 61, 53 S.Ct. 240, 77 L.Ed. 690. These cases reflect a doctrine of abstention appropriate to our federal system whereby the federal courts, 'exercising a wise discretion', restrain their authority because of 'scrupulous regard for the rightful independence of the state governments' and for the smooth working of the federal judiciary."

The abstention policy has also played a role in the development of the law of removal of pending state cases to the federal courts. In City of Greenwood, Miss. v. Peacock, 384 U.S. 808, 828, 86 S.Ct. 1800, 1812, 16 L.Ed.2d 944 (1966), the Supreme Court observed:

"* * * the vindication of the defendant's federal rights is left to the state courts except in the rare situations where it can be clearly predicted by reason of the operation of a pervasive and explicit state or federal law that those rights will inevitably be denied by the very act of bringing the defendant to trial in the state court."

The approach to abstention which this policy requires has been followed by many federal courts without any general exception being recognized for cases arising under 42 U.S.C. § 1983. Boyle v. Landry, 422 F.2d 631 (7th Cir. February 5, 1970); Goss v. Illinois, 312 F.2d 257, 259 (7th Cir. 1963); Smith v. Village of Lansing, 241 F.2d 856 (7th Cir. 1957); Baines v. City of Danville, 337 F.2d 579 (4th Cir. 1964); Vick v. Schiro, 296 F.Supp. 173 (E.D.La.1969). Cf. Cooper v. Hutchinson, 184 F.2d 119 (3rd Cir. 1950).

One of the reasons underlying this practice of refusing to enjoin pending state prosecutions is particularly apposite to the case at bar. In Stefanelli v. Minard, 342 U.S. 117, 72 S.Ct. 118, 96 L.Ed. 138 (1951), a federal court was petitioned to enjoin the use of illegally seized evidence in a state criminal trial. Denying relief, the Supreme Court said, at page 123, 72 S.Ct. at page 121–122:

> "The consequences of exercising the equitable power here invoked are not the concern of a merely doctrinaire alertness to protect the proper sphere of the States in enforcing their criminal law. If we were to sanction this intervention, we would expose every State criminal prosecution to insupportable disruption. Every question of procedural due process of law—with its far-flung and undefined range—would invite a flanking movement against the system of State courts by resort to the federal forum, with review if need be to this Court, to determine the issue. Asserted unconstitutionality in the impaneling and selection of the grand and petit juries, in the failure to appoint counsel, in the admission of a confession, in the creation of an unfair trial atmosphere, in the misconduct of the trial court—all would provide ready opportunities, which conscientious counsel might be bound to employ, to subvert the orderly, effective prosecution of local crime in local courts."

Notwithstanding the impressive authority which would bar our enjoining the prosecution of Dr. Babbitz, he presses us to issue such an injunction. Perhaps he draws comfort from the fact that the United States Supreme Court has on two separate occasions expressly reserved ruling on the question whether the Civil Rights Act suspends the anti-injunction provisions of § 2283. Cameron v. Johnson, 390 U.S. 611, 614, n. 3, 88 S.Ct. 1335, 20 L.Ed.2d 182 (1968); Dombrowski v. Pfister, 380 U.S. 479, 484, n. 2, 85 S.Ct. 1116, 14 L.Ed.2d 22 (1965).

Also, the plaintiff may arguably find support for his position from expressions by several of the justices of the United States Supreme Court. For example, in Gorun v. Fall, 393 U.S. 398, 399, 89 S.Ct. 678, 679, 21 L.Ed.2d 628 (1969), four members of the Court referred to "our recent decisions saying over and over again that a federal claim in a federal court should be decided by the federal court and not relegated to a state tribunal".

Finally, it may seem somewhat anomalous that a court may find a state statute unconstitutional and yet deny an injunction against its enforcement by the state. In effect, such a ruling might protect all persons from prosecution except the very man who has persuaded us of the statute's unconstitutionality.

Notwithstanding these arguments, we do not believe that the circumstances of this case justify an exception to the oft-repeated and strong policy of federal abstention, especially in a criminal case. The forebearance required under § 2283 is not lifted in the case at bar by the teachings of Dombrowski v. Pfister, 380 U.S. 479, 85 S.Ct. 1116, 14 L.Ed.2d 22 (1965). We have already noted that the case at bar does not involve a bad faith enforcement of the abortion statute. In addition, we doubt that the prosecution of Dr. Babbitz has resulted in a chilling of his first amendment rights. A first amendment right is more than a personal right; it is also a public right. When such a right is impinged, the general public is hurt, and the effective functioning of our free society is encumbered. This may explain why § 2283 is not strictly applied in first amendment cases. We do not accept the plaintiff's claim that his prosecution under the state abortion statute dampened his first amendment rights.

Although the subject of abortion is fraught with highly emotional pressures, we do not find here any "special circumstances" as discussed in Cameron v. Johnson, 390 U.S. 611, 618, 88 S.Ct. 1335, 20 L.Ed.2d 182 (1968), which would entitle Dr. Babbitz to injunctive action. Cf. Machesky v. Bizzell, 414 F.2d 283 (5th Cir. 1969); Romero v. Weakley, 226 F.2d 399 (9th Cir. 1955); 80 Harv.L.Rev. 604, 608–9 (1967).

We believe we must apply the standard established in Douglas v. City of Jeanette, 319 U.S. 157, 163, 63 S.Ct. 877, 87 L.Ed. 1324 (1943); there the Supreme Court observed that it was Congressional policy to leave to the state courts the trial of state criminal cases, and that such proceedings should be enjoined only in exceptional circumstances. We do not regard this as an exceptional case, and Dr. Babbitz is not entitled to injunctive relief. In the event that the state persists in the prosecution of Dr. Babbitz, we have no reason to doubt that the state courts of Wisconsin will fully vindicate his federal constitutional rights. See Zwicker v. Boll, 270 F.Supp. 131 (W.D.Wis.1967), aff'd 391 U.S. 353, 88 S.Ct. 1666, 20 L.Ed.2d 642 (1968); Soglin v. Kauffman, 286 F.Supp. 851 (W.D.Wis.1968).

[3] Notwithstanding our denial of injunctive relief, a federal court is obliged to weigh separately the issue of declaratory relief. In Zwickler v. Koota, 389 U.S. 241, 254, 88 S.Ct. 391, 399, 19 L.Ed.2d 444 (1967), the Supreme Court held that the federal district court must decide the "merits of the declaratory request irrespective of its conclusion as to the propriety of the issuance of the injunction". Although it was the application for an injunction which triggered the appointment of this three-judge court under § 2281, we do not understand that the denial of injunctive relief precludes us from resolving the declaratory judgment application.

II. VAGUENESS

[4] The plaintiff urges that § 940.04(5), Wis.Stats., is vague and nebulous upon its face. That subsection, quoted above, excepts a therapeutic abortion when it is performed under specified terms. We have examined the challenged phraseology and are persuaded that it is not indefinite or vague. In our opinion, the word "necessary" and the expression "to save the life of the mother" are both reasonably comprehensible in their meaning.

The United States Supreme Court has ruled that a criminal statute must be definite enough to acquaint those who are subject to it with the conduct which will render them liable to its penalties. Lanzetta v. New Jersey, 306 U.S. 451, 453, 59 S.Ct. 618, 83 L.Ed. 888 (1939); Connally v. General Construction Co., 269 U.S. 385, 391, 46 S.Ct. 126, 70 L.Ed. 322 (1926). See also Unconstitutional Uncertainty—An Appraisal, 40 Cornell Law Quarterly, 195, 196 (1955).

We believe that § 940.04(5) sets forth with reasonable clarity and sufficient particularity the kind of conduct which will constitute a violation. Jordan v. De George, 341 U.S. 223, 71 S.Ct. 703, 95 L.Ed. 886 (1951); United States v. Ragen, 314 U.S. 513, 62 S.Ct. 374, 86 L.Ed. 383 (1942). In United States v. Wurzbach, 280 U.S. 396, 399, 50 S.Ct. 167, 169, 74 L.Ed. 508 (1930), Mr. Justice Holmes stated:

> "Whenever the law draws a line there will be cases very near each other on opposite sides. The precise course of the line may be uncertain, but no one can come near it without knowing that he does so, if he thinks, and if he does so, it is familiar to the criminal law to make him take the risk."

In People v. Belous, 80 Cal.Rptr. 354, 458 P.2d 194 (1969), the California court found that the words "necessary to preserve her life" in that state's abortion statute were unconstitutionally vague. While the Wisconsin statute uses slightly different language ("necessary to save"), we doubt that the distinction between the words used in the two statutes is significant. However, we do not share the view of the majority in Belous that such language is so vague that one must guess at its meaning.

Slightly different language was before the court in United States v. Vuitch, 305 F.Supp. 1032 (D.D.C.1969), which invalidated an abortion law. That statute contained the following expression: "necessary for the preservation of the mother's life or health". The court concluded that the word "health" was vague both in interpretation and in practice. That precise problem is not presented under the terms of the Wisconsin statute.

Our reading of the Wisconsin statute persuades us that it meets the test set forth by the United States Supreme Court in Connally, cited above, 269 U.S. at page 391, 46 S.Ct. at page 127:

> "And a statute which either forbids or requires the doing of an act in terms so vague that men of common intelligence must necessarily guess at its meaning and differ as to its application, violates the first essential of due process of law."

The plaintiff also charges that there is confusion in subsection (6), which provides that the words "unborn child" mean "a human being from the time of conception until it is born alive". The plaintiff may have medical or even practical justification for his disagreement with the correctness of this statutory definition of an unborn child, but he fails in his effort to convince us that the Wisconsin legislature was vague or indefinite in its choice of language.

III. EQUAL PROTECTION OF THE LAWS

The plaintiff contends that the statute denies to him equal protection of the laws as guaranteed by the fourteenth amendment. It is urged that medical facilities are not constant throughout the state and that a doctor in a rural area in Wisconsin might be justified in performing a "necessary" abortion, whereas a doctor treating the same patient in Milwaukee would be unwarranted in performing the abortion because of the availability in Milwaukee of superior medical facilities.

[5] We find more cogency in the argument that a wealthy woman, but not a poor one, is able, upon demand, to secure a safe and legal abortion in Japan or some other locale in which abortion is permitted. We take judicial notice of the fact that there are a number of places throughout the world where legal abortions are available. We have also considered the argument that an affluent woman, unlike the poor one, may enjoy a long-standing, personal relationship with a well-paid physician, who might more likely be willing or able to persuade his fellow doctors to authorize a therapeutic abortion. We are reluctant to equate these types of inequality with a denial of a protected right under the fourteenth amendment. We know of no analogous situation which goes as far as the plaintiff would have us go in applying the fourteenth amendment to the case at bar.

There is presently pending in the United States Supreme Court a challenge to the practice of imposing a jail term upon a defendant who is unable to pay an assessed fine. Williams v. Illinois, 396 U.S. 1036, 90 S.Ct. 689, 24 L.Ed. 2d 680, probable jurisdiction noted January 19, 1969, being an appeal from People v. Williams, 41 Ill.2d 511, 244 N.E.2d 197 (1969). We cannot anticipate that the decision in the Williams case will buttress the plaintiff's contention that there is a denial of equal protection of the laws implicit within the Wisconsin abortion statute.

IV. INVASION OF PRIVATE RIGHTS

The ninth amendment to the United States Constitution provides:

> "The enumeration in the Constitution, of certain rights, shall not be construed to deny or disparage others retained by the people."

An examination of recent Supreme Court pronouncements regarding the ninth amendment compels our conclusion that the state of Wisconsin may not, in the manner set forth in § 940.04(1) and (5), Wis.Stats., deprive a woman of her private decision whether to bear her unquickened child.

In terms of the Wisconsin statute, we do not purport to decide the question of a woman's aborting a fetus which has already quickened. We received into evidence the view of a gynecologist that a fetus normally becomes quick at about four and a half months after conception. Dorland's Illustrated Medical Dictionary (24th ed. 1965) defines "quick" as "Pregnant and able to feel the fetal movements." "Quickening" is defined as "The first recognizable movements of the fetus in utero, appearing usually from the sixteenth to the eighteenth week of pregnancy." The plaintiff is being prosecuted under § 940.04(1) and (5); he is not being prosecuted under those portions of § 940.04 which relate to the abortion of a quickened child; therefore, the validity of such provisions are beyond the scope of this opinion.

While problems of over-population, ecology and pollution have been brought to our attention, we deem them secondary as decisional factors in a judicial resolution of the issues at hand. So, too, we find it necessary to set aside arguments involving theological and ecclesiastical considerations.

Obviously, there is no topic more closely interwoven with the intimacy of the home and marriage than that which relates to the conception and bearing of progeny. Recent court cases have considered the sanctity of the right to privacy in home, sex and marriage; however, the concept of private rights, with which the state may not interfere in the absence of a compelling state interest, is one of long standing.

As long ago as 1891, in Union Pacific Railway Co. v. Botsford, 141 U.S. 250, 251, 11 S.Ct. 1000, 1001, 35 L.Ed. 734 (1891), the court said:

> "No right is held more sacred, or is more carefully guarded, by the common law, than the right of every individual to the possession and control of his own person, free from all restraint or interference of others, unless by clear and unquestionable authority of law. As well said by Judge Cooley, 'The right to one's person may be said to be a right of complete immunity: to be let alone.'"

In Meyer v. Nebraska, 262 U.S. 390, 399, 43 S.Ct. 625, 626, 67 L.Ed. 1042 (1923), the United States Supreme Court held that the private right "to marry, establish a home and bring up children" was protected under the fourteenth amendment as an essential liberty. In Prince v. Commonwealth of Massachusetts, 321 U.S. 158, 166, 64 S.Ct. 438, 442, 88 L.Ed. 645 (1944), the court spoke of the "private realm of family life which the state cannot enter".

In Loving v. Virginia, 388 U.S. 1, 87 S.Ct. 1817, 18 L.Ed.2d 1010 (1967), there was a challenge to the constitutionality of a state statute which purported to restrict marriages solely on the basis of race. While the Supreme Court observed, at page 7, 87 S.Ct. at page 1821, that "marriage is a social relation subject to the State's police power," the court held, at page 12, 87 S.Ct. at page 1824:

> "The Fourteenth Amendment requires that the freedom of choice to marry not be restricted by invidious racial discriminations. Under our Constitution, the freedom to marry or not marry, a person of another race resides with the individual and cannot be infringed by the State."

See also Skinner v. Oklahoma, 316 U.S. 535, 62 S.Ct. 1110, 86 L.Ed. 1655 (1942); Farrington v. T. Tokushige, 273 U.S. 284, 47 S.Ct. 406, 71 L.Ed. 646 (1927); Pierce v. Society of the Sisters, 268 U.S. 510, 45 S.Ct. 571, 69 L.Ed. 1070 (1925). See, generally, Warren and Brandeis, "The Right to Privacy," 4 Harv.L.Rev. 193 (1890).

Recent decisions have asserted a judicial application of the ninth amendment to the matter of privacy in marital relations and contraception. In Griswold v. Connecticut, 381 U.S. 479, 85 S.Ct. 1678, 14 L.Ed.2d 510 (1965), the court struck down the Connecticut statute which forbade the use of contraceptives. In so doing, the Court noted that the Bill of Rights contains both specific and penumbral guarantees which protect an individual from governmental invasion of the sanctity of his home and the privacies of his life. In the words of the Court, at page 485, 85 S.Ct. at page 1682, many decisions by the Supreme Court "bear witness that the right of privacy which presses for recognition here is a legitimate one." Three of the justices in a concurring opinion stated, at page 491, 85 S.Ct. at page 1685:

> "To hold that a right so basic and fundamental and so deep-rooted in our society as the right of privacy in marriage may be infringed because that right is not guaranteed in so many words by the first eight amendments to the Constitution is to ignore the Ninth Amendment and to give it no effect whatsoever."

In People v. Belous, 80 Cal.Rptr. 354, 458 P.2d 194 (1969), the California supreme court invalidated a state statute which made it illegal to perform an abortion on a woman unless it was necessary to preserve her life. The court said, 80 Cal.Rptr. at page 359, 458 P.2d at page 199:

> "The fundamental right of the woman to choose whether to bear children follows from the Supreme Court's and this court's repeated acknowledgment of a 'right of privacy' or 'liberty' in matters related to marriage, family, and sex."

The Belous court pointed out, 80 Cal. Rptr. at page 360, 458 P.2d at page 200, that although this protected area of privacy is not explicitly stated in the Constitution, it is a fundamental liberty that is implicit in the penumbrae of the Bill of Rights, and is supported, by analogy, in many past decisions.

In United States v. Vuitch, 305 F. Supp. 1032, 1035 (D.D.C.1969), the court further observed:

> "There has been, moreover, an increasing indication in decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States that as a secular matter a woman's liberty and right of privacy extends to family, marriage and sex matters and may well include the right to remove an unwanted child at least in early stages of pregnancy."

Although no final decision has as yet been rendered, a three-judge court has been convened in New York in a case involving the same issues under consideration here. Hall v. Lefkowitz, 305 F. Supp. 1030 (S.D.N.Y.1969).

In 2 Loyola University Law Review 1, 8 (April, 1969), former Supreme Court Justice Tom C. Clark concluded from a study of Griswold and its predecessor cases:

> "The result of these decisions is the evolution of the concept that there is a certain zone of individual privacy which is protected by the Constitution. Unless the State has a compelling subordinating interest that outweighs the individual rights of human beings, it may not interfere with a person's marriage, home, children and day-to-day living habits. This is one of the most fundamental concepts that the Founding Fathers had in mind when they drafted the Constitution."

[6] It is clear that in order to justify the regulation of such fundamental private rights, the state must show a compelling need. In Bates v. City of Little Rock, 361 U.S. 516, 524, 80 S.Ct. 412, 417, 4 L.Ed.2d 480 (1960), the Court stated:

> "Where there is a significant encroachment upon personal liberty, the State may prevail only upon showing a subordinating interest which is compelling."

The Supreme Court, in Griswold, said, 381 U.S. at page 485, 85 S.Ct. at 1682:

> "The present case, then, concerns a relationship lying within the zone of privacy created by several fundamental constitutional guarantees. And it concerns a law which, in forbidding the use of contraceptives rather than regulating their manufacture or sale, seeks to achieve its goals by means having a maximum destructive impact upon that relationship. Such a law cannot stand in light of the familiar principle, so often applied by this Court, that a 'governmental purpose to control or prevent activities constitutionally subject to state regulation may not be achieved by means which sweep unnecessarily broadly and thereby invade the area of protected freedoms.' NAACP v. Alabama, 377 U.S. 288, 307, 84 S.Ct. 1302, 1314, 12 L.Ed.2d 325."

A comparable viewpoint was set forth by the California supreme court in Belous, 80 Cal.Rptr. at page 360, 458 P.2d at page 200, where that court said:

"The critical issue is not whether such rights exist, but whether the state has a compelling interest in the regulation of a subject which is within the police powers of the state * * *."

Similarly, in the case at bar, we must decide whether the state of Wisconsin has a sufficiently compelling interest to justify the broad restriction on a woman's inherently personal right that is contained in § 940.04(1) and (5), Wis. Stats.

[7] The defendants urge that the state's interest in protecting the embryo is a sufficient basis to sustain the statute. Upon a balancing of the relevant interests, we hold that a woman's right to refuse to carry an embryo during the early months of pregnancy may not be invaded by the state without a more compelling public necessity than is reflected in the statute in question. When measured against the claimed "rights" of an embryo of four months or less, we hold that the mother's right transcends that of such an embryo.

We also find no compelling state interest in a need to protect the mother's life. At common law, abortion was not a crime unless the mother was quick with child. People v. Belous, supra, 80 Cal.Rptr. at 358, 458 P.2d at 198. This position was reflected in the original Wisconsin abortion statute, Wis.R.S. 1849, c. 133, §§ 10 and 11, enacted in 1849, which made abortion a punishable offense only if performed upon an unborn quick child. However, in 1858 the abortion statute was revised by elimination of the word "quick," thereby making it an offense to perform an abortion at any time during pregnancy. This change reflected an interest in protecting the life of the mother, for in 1858 any surgical procedure done inside the body was extremely dangerous. Today, many types of surgery, including abortion in the first trimester, are safe and routinely employed medical techniques. People v. Belous, supra, 80 Cal.Rptr. at 360, 458 P.2d at 200. Thus, the result of this court's decision that a mother has the right to determine whether to carry or reject an embryo that has not quickened is a return to the common law definition of abortion; this is not a position without well-established precedent in the common law.

We are persuaded that a medical abortion during early pregnancy is not inherently dangerous to the mother. Nor do we find a compelling state interest in connection with the discouragement of non-marital sexual intercourse. The statute involved does not purport to distinguish between married and unmarried women.

We are invited to resolve the philosophical question, raised in some of the amicus curiae briefs, as to when an embryo becomes a child. For the purposes of this decision, we think it is sufficient to conclude that the mother's interests are superior to that of an unquickened embryo, whether the embryo is mere protoplasm, as the plaintiff contends, or a human being, as the Wisconsin statute declares.

There are a number of situations in which there are especially forceful reasons to support a woman's desire to reject an embryo. These include a rubella or thalidomide pregnancy and one stemming from either rape or incest. The instant statute does not distinguish these special cases, but in our opinion, the state does not have a compelling interest even in the normal situation to require a woman to remain pregnant during the early months following her conception.

[8] Under its police power, the state can regulate certain aspects of abortion. Thus, it is permissible for the state to require that abortions be conducted by qualified physicians. The police power of the state does not, however, entitle it to deny to a woman the basic right reserved to her under the ninth amendment to decide whether she should carry or reject an embryo which has not yet quickened. The challenged sections of the present Wisconsin statute suffer from an infirmity of fatal overbreadth.

V. CONCLUSION

The plaintiff is entitled to a declaratory judgment declaring § 940.04(1) and (5) violative of the United States Constitution. The plaintiff is not entitled to an injunction enjoining the defendants or their successors in office from prosecuting the plaintiff under § 940.-04(1) and (5).

It is so ordered.

Sidney G. BABBITZ, M.D., Plaintiff,

v.

E. Michael McCANN, District Attorney of Milwaukee County, F. Ryan Duffy, Jr., Judge of the County Court, Milwaukee County, Defendants.

No. 69-C-548.

United States District Court, E. D. Wisconsin.

Nov. 18, 1970.

Proceeding upon order, issued by a three-judge District Court on its own motion, to show cause why prosecutions under a state abortion statute should not be enjoined. Previously the court had adjudged portions of the statute unconstitutional. The Court held that where the court in declaring the abortion statute unconstitutional had hoped that state would forebear from further prosecution thereunder, but the state prosecutor publicly announced in effect that the court's judgment would not deter the state from prosecuting others under the statute and the state even declined to postpone trial of the doctor in question until a possible appeal to the Court of Appeals was determined, "special circumstances" required issuance of an injunction previously denied.

Judgment in accordance with opinion.

1. Courts ⇐405(15)

While motions were pending in Court of Appeals regarding propriety of docketing appeal from three-judge district court, three-judge district court had jurisdiction to grant interlocutory judgment pending such appeal and also to issue permanent injunction, against state court proceedings, to protect and effectuate court's judgment, under statute prohibiting federal court's stay of state court proceedings except where necessary in aid of federal court's jurisdiction or to protect or effectuate its judgments. 28 U.S.C.A. §§ 1253, 2283; Fed.Rules Civ.Proc. rule 62(c), 28 U.S.C.A.

2. Judgment ⇐829(1)

Although decision of three-judge district court declaring state abortion statute unconstitutional was perhaps not literally binding on state, fair application of comity doctrine required state authorities to desist from prosecuting doctor pending appeals which were taken from such declaratory judgment and also to desist from threatening prosecutions of others until such appeals could be resolved.

3. Courts ⇐508(1)

Where protected interests involve freedom of speech or assembly, three-judge district court is empowered to enjoin any chilling impact upon such First Amendment rights, and Ninth Amendment rights are equally deserving of federal protection. Fed.Rules Civ.Proc. rule 62(c), 28 U.S.C.A.; U.S.C.A.Const. Amends. 1, 9.

4. Courts ⇐508(7)

Where three-judge district court in declaring abortion statute unconstitutional had hoped that state would forebear from further prosecution thereunder, but state prosecutor publicly announced in effect that court's judgment would not deter state from prosecuting others under statute and state even declined to postpone trial of doctor in question until possible appeal to Court of Appeals was determined, "special circumstances" required issuance of injunction previously denied. Fed.Rules Civ. Proc. rule 62(c), 28 U.S.C.A.; 28 U.S. C.A. § 2283; W.S.A.Wis. 940.04(1, 5).

Before KERNER, Circuit Judge, and REYNOLDS and GORDON, District Judges.

PER CURIAM.

On October 28, 1970, a hearing was held pursuant to an order to show cause issued by this court on its own motion. At such hearing, arguments were heard on the question of our enjoining the defendants from prosecuting under §§ 940.04(1) and (5), Wis.Stats. Previously, this court had adjudged those portions of the Wisconsin statute unconstitutional. Our decision was filed on March 5, 1970 and is reported in 310 F. Supp. 293 (E.D.Wis.1970). An amended judgment, filed a few days later, on March 11, 1970, provided that the "injunctive relief sought by the plaintiff be and hereby is denied".

Subsequently, the plaintiff commenced another action in this federal district seeking an order restraining the prosecution. On May 11, 1970, as reported in 312 F.Supp. 725 (E.D.Wis.1970), a single-judge district court denied such relief, relying upon the prior analysis of the recent opinion and judgment of this three-judge court.

A direct appeal was taken from the judgment of the three-judge court to the United States Supreme Court, under 28 U.S.C. § 1253, which provides, in part, that "any party may appeal to the Supreme Court from an order granting or denying" (emphasis added) an injunction by a three-judge district court. That appeal was dismissed by the United States Supreme Court on October 12, 1970, and a few days thereafter this court issued the instant order to show cause.

[1] At the time of the hearing on this order to show cause, an appeal which had been taken from this court's judgment to the court of appeals for the seventh circuit had not as yet been docketed by the latter court; motions regarding the propriety of such docketing were then pending before the court of appeals. The defendants urge that this court does not have jurisdiction to amend its judgment of March 11, 1970, but they concede that we can temporarily restrain the prosecution of Dr. Babbitz under Rule 62(c), Federal Rules of Civil Procedure.

In our opinion, this court not only has jurisdiction to grant an interlocutory judgment pending such appeal, but also has jurisdiction to issue a permanent injunction in order to protect and effectuate the court's judgment under 28 U. S.C. § 2283, which provides:

"§ 2283. Stay of State court proceedings

A court of the United States may not grant an injunction to stay proceedings in a State court except as expressly authorized by Act of Congress, or where necessary in aid of its jurisdiction, or to protect or effectuate its judgments." (emphasis added)

In American Insurance Company v. Lucas, 38 F.Supp. 926, 932 (W.D.Mo. 1941), it was held that a three-judge court has the power to protect its judgments from imposition. Indeed, we believe that the competence of the court to reconsider its previous order, in the absence of a stay or supersedeas, is one that is inherent in a court. In Illinois Printing Co. v. Electric Shovel Coal Corp., 20 F.Supp. 181, 184 (E.D.Ill. 1937), the court said:

"Every court has power to control, vacate, or correct its own decrees in the interests of justice. It may do so in the furtherance of justice and its power does not depend upon statute but is inherent. Freeman on Judgments, §§ 200 and 220."

We also find authority to re-examine the question of an injunction under 28 U.S.C. § 2202, which provides:

"§ 2202. Further relief

Further necessary or proper relief based on a declaratory judgment or decree may be granted, after reasonable notice and hearing, against any adverse party whose rights have been determined by such judgment."

In Vermont Structural Slate Co. v. Tatko Bros. Slate Co., 253 F.2d 29, 30 (2d Cir. 1958), the court ruled that although the original declaratory decree did not contain a permanent injunction, such provision could be added later under the court's "residual power".

In our decision of March 5, 1970, we discussed the "impressive authority" which favored forebearance from enjoining pending state prosecutions; with reference to Dr. Babbitz, we indicated our expectation that the state courts would "fully vindicate his federal constitutional rights".

At the hearing in this case held prior to the time that the court filed its decision of March 5, 1970, one of the defendants, Mr. McCann, the district attorney of Milwaukee county, urged us not to issue an injunction. Thereupon, a member of this three-judge court asked him, from the bench, what difference it would make "whether we enjoin you from proceeding or enter a declaratory judgment that the law is unconstitutional? Does it have any practical difference?" The district attorney then responded, in part:

"Probably not a great deal, except I would urge upon the Court in a declaratory judgment action, even more than otherwise, the principles of comity and abstention should be considered. * * *" (emphasis added)

The record now before this court demonstrates that our previous forecast regarding the state's response to our judgment has not been met; we find that our declaration and judgment have been completely disregarded by the state authorities. For example, shortly after our decision, the state attorney general issued a statement in a publication entitled "The Prosecutors' Bulletin" in which he asserted that our declaratory judgment "legally affected only the rights of Dr. Babbitz". In effect, this is a public announcement that the judgment of this court will not deter the state from prosecuting others under the statute.

The record before this court also discloses that in a press release dated April 7, 1970, the attorney general stated that the case had been appealed to the United States Supreme Court and that "doctors performing abortions in reliance on Babbitz run the risk of prosecution in the event the decision is reversed." The chilling impact of this statement is patently clear.

At the hearing on the present order to show cause, defendants' counsel candidly acknowledged that the district attorney of Milwaukee county and the attorney general of the state of Wisconsin, not only believe that the statute in question is fully constitutional but that they intend to take no other stance until there is a contrary decision by the United States Supreme Court. It thus is unmistakably clear, both from the defendants' conduct and from their counsels' statements, that the Wisconsin prosecutors will steadfastly ignore a declaration of unconstitutionality emanating from either this three-judge district court or from the federal court of appeals.

Because of the state's tacit threats of prosecution, it follows that the general citizenry of Wisconsin will be obliged to disregard our judgment of unconstitutionality. In this sense, we regretfully observe that our hope that the state would "vindicate" the constitutional rights of Dr. Babbitz and others in his position has not been realized. Indeed, the state even declined to postpone the trial of Dr. Babbitz until a possible appeal to the court of appeals was determined. Unless we enjoin this prosecution, the trial of Dr. Babbitz in the state court will commence on November 30, 1970 under a statute which we have declared unconstitutional.

The state's insistence on going forward with the trial of Dr. Babbitz and the prosecutors' tacit threats to the medical profession completely change the context of this case with reference to injunctive relief. We are now in precisely the converse situation to that described in Dombrowski v. Pfister, 380 U.S. 479, 485, 85 S.Ct. 1116, 1120, 14 L.Ed.2d 22 (1965), where the court discussed Murdock v. Pennsylvania, 319 U.S. 105, 63 S.Ct. 870, 87 L.Ed. 1292 (1943):

> "Since injunctive relief looks to the future, and it was not alleged that Pennsylvania courts and prosecutors would fail to respect the Murdock ruling, the Court found nothing to justify an injunction."

We now find that there are "special circumstances" as discussed in Cameron v. Johnson, 390 U.S. 611, 618, 88 S.Ct. 1335, 20 L.Ed.2d 182 (1968), and Dombrowski v. Pfister, 380 U.S. 479, 485, 85 S.Ct. 1116, 14 L.Ed.2d 22 (1965), requiring the issuance of an injunction. Upon the present posture of this case, the state authorities have no reasonable expectation of securing a valid conviction of Dr. Babbitz.

[2] We are fully aware that our judgment could be reversed upon appeal. We are also mindful that it is arguable that our judgment may not be literally "binding" on the state. See United State ex rel. Lawrence v. Woods, 432 F.2d 1072 (7th Cir. 1970). Nevertheless, we believe that a fair application of the doctrine of comity required the state authorities to desist from prosecuting Dr. Babbitz pending the appeals which were taken in this case and also to desist from threatening prosecutions of others until such appeals could be resolved. In the case at bar, comity has proved to be a one-way street. The continued prosecution of Dr. Babbitz and the admonishments by the state officers meet the language of Cameron v. Johnson, 390 U.S. 611, 621, 88 S.Ct. 1335, 1341, 20 L.Ed2d 182 (1968), where the court said:

> "* * * the statute was enforced against them with no expectation of convictions but only to discourage exercise of protected rights."

[3] It is clear from Dombrowski that if the protected interests involve freedom of speech or assembly, this court is empowered to enjoin any chilling impact upon such first amendment rights. We believe that the ninth amendment rights of those involved are equally deserving of federal protection. See Griswold v. Connecticut, 381 U.S. 479, 85 S.Ct. 1678, 14 L.Ed.2d 510 (1965); NAACP v. Button, 371 U.S. 415, 83 S.Ct. 328, 9 L.Ed.2d 405 (1963). Indeed, it is arguable that the right to privacy of one's person is of even greater stature and magnitude than the meritorious rights included within the first amendment. As noted in Griswold (381 U.S. p. 491, 85 S.Ct. 1678), ninth amendment rights are fundamental ones, "deep-rooted in our society".

[4] In enforcing the statute in question, the state authorities are impinging not only on Dr. Babbitz' ninth amendment rights but upon those of the general public.

Unfortunately, it is apparent that the state judiciary has failed to discourage the prosecutors from trespassing on the federal rights in question. The reaction of the state authorities to our judgment relegates our ruling to nothing more than a gratuitous, advisory opinion. Zwickler v. Koota, 389 U.S. 241, 254, 88 S.Ct. 391, 399, 19 L.Ed.2d 444 (1967), places an affirmative duty on this court to weigh a request for a declaratory judgment that a state statute is unconstitutional:

> "We hold that a federal district court has the duty to decide the appropriateness and the merits of the declaratory request irrespective of its conclusion as to the propriety of the issuance of the injunction."

In Romero v. Weakley, 226 F.2d 399, 401 (9th Cir. 1955), the court quoted from Willcox v. Consolidated Gas Co., 212 U.S. 19, 40, 29 S.Ct. 192, 53 L.Ed. 382 (1909), as follows:

> " 'When a Federal court is properly appealed to in a case over which it has by law jurisdiction, it is its duty to take such jurisdiction * * *. The right of a party plaintiff to choose a Federal court where there is a choice cannot be properly denied.' "

The United States Supreme Court does not automatically review the judgments of lower tribunals as a matter of course; the case at bar appears to be a good example of that situation. Nevertheless, the state authorities have taken the position that they will refuse to respect our judgment of unconstitutionality or even that of the court of appeals and will be bound only by a ruling of the United States Supreme Court. Did the United States Supreme Court contemplate on the one hand that a federal three-judge district court must declare the constitutionality or unconstitutionality of a state statute and, on the other hand, that the state authorities may wholly dishonor such judgment?

Under all the circumstances of the instant case, we conclude that the only effective way to protect or effectuate our judgment is forthwith to issue an injunction permanently enjoining the pending prosecution of Dr. Babbitz and also permanently enjoining the defendants from henceforth prosecuting others under §§ 940.04(1) and (5), Wis.Stats.

It is ordered that the clerk enter an appropriate judgment.

Amanda HARLING, Petitioner,
v.
DEPARTMENT OF HEALTH AND SOCIAL SERVICES, Respondent.
No. 69-C-560.

United States District Court,
E. D. Wisconsin.
March 11, 1971.

Habeas corpus case by Wisconsin parolee. The District Court, Myron L. Gordon, J., held that a nonphysician's conviction for abortion could not stand in light of federal three-judge District Court ruling declaring Wisconsin abortion statute under which she was convicted to be unconstitutional.

Petition for writ of habeas corpus granted.

1. Habeas Corpus ⇐29

A petition for writ of habeas corpus is a proper means to attack constitutionality of a statute under which a petitioner had been convicted.

2. Abortion ⇐1

A nonphysician's conviction for abortion could not stand in light of federal three-judge district court ruling declaring that Wisconsin abortion statute under which she was convicted is unconstitutional. W.S.A. 940.04(1, 5).

Shellow & Shellow, Milwaukee, Wis., for petitioner.

Robert P. Warren, Atty. Gen. of Wis., by William A. Platz, Asst. Atty. Gen., Madison, for respondent.

DECISION and ORDER

MYRON L. GORDON, District Judge.

The petitioner was convicted by a state court on November 14, 1968, of the commission of an abortion in violation of § 940.04(1), Wis.Stats. (1967). She was sentenced on the same day to a term of three years in the Wisconsin Home for Women at Taycheedah. Her conviction was affirmed by the state supreme court in State v. Harling, 44 Wis.2d 266, 170 N.W.2d 720 (1969). After the present petition for a writ of habeas corpus was filed, Mrs. Harling was released from confinement and now is on parole.

Mrs. Harling's petition initially set forth two rather broad bases which she argued warranted the granting of her application. However, after her petition was filed, and while it still was pending, the case of Babbitz v. McCann, 310 F. Supp. 293 (E.D.Wis.1970), was decided. In Babbitz, upon the application of a physician who was undergoing prosecution for the commission of an allegedly illegal abortion, a three-judge district court declared that § 940.04(1) and (5) are unconstitutional.

On the basis of the Babbitz ruling, Mrs. Harling submitted a petition for a writ of habeas corpus to the Wisconsin supreme court; such petition was denied on April 13, 1970. Her petition to the federal court for a writ of habeas corpus subsequently was amended and the petitioner now contends that her state conviction on November 14, 1968, is void. It is this contention which will be considered in the present decision.

In an earlier time, it was generally held that a statute which was declared to be unconstitutional was void ab initio. Norton v. Shelby County, 118 U.S. 425, 6 S.Ct. 1121, 30 L.Ed. 178 (1886); Ex parte Siebold, 100 U.S. (10 Otto) 371, 376, 25 L.Ed. 717 (1880). In the latter case, at pages 376–377, the court said:

> "An unconstitutional law is void and is as no law. An offense created by it is not a crime. A conviction under it is not merely erroneous, but is illegal and void, and cannot be a legal cause of imprisonment. It is true, if no writ of error lies, the judgment may be final, in the sense that there may be no means of reversing it. But personal liberty is of so great moment in the eye of the law that the judgment of an inferior court affecting it is not deemed so conclusive but that, as we have seen, the question of the court's authority to try and imprison the party may be reviewed on habeas corpus, by a superior court or judge having authority to award the writ. We are satisfied that the present is one of the cases in which this court is authorized to take such jurisdiction. We think so, because, if the laws are unconstitutional and void, the Circuit Court acquired no jurisdiction of the causes. Its authority to indict and try the petitioners arose solely upon these laws."

The breadth of this rule was questioned in several subsequent decisions. See, e. g., Chicot County Drainage District v. Baxter State Bank, 308 U.S. 371, 374, 60 S.Ct. 317, 84 L.Ed. 329 (1940). Cf. Butts v. Merchants & Miners Transportation Co., 230 U.S. 126, 33 S.Ct. 964, 57 L.Ed. 1422 (1913); Campbell v. Sherman, 35 Wis. 103 (1874); Annot., 167 A.L.R. 517 (1947); Crawford, The Legislative Status of an Unconstitutional Statute, 49 Mich.L.Rev. 645, 650 (1951).

This latter group of cases, however, generally does not deal with statutes involving penal liability, and, in my opinion, they do not obviate the problem of whether Mrs. Harling's conviction can stand in light of a ruling declaring the statute under which she was convicted to be unconstitutional.

At no point prior to the time of the Babbitz decision did the petitioner raise the question of the constitutionality of § 940.04(1). In addition, it is to be noted that Mrs. Harling is not a physician, unlike the plaintiff in Babbitz. These two factors must be considered in resolving the present petition. However, it is clear that Mrs. Harling has exhausted her state remedies, for the supreme court denied her post-Babbitz petition for a writ of habeas corpus, concluding that Babbitz was not "binding upon this court or controlling."

It is arguable that the doctrine of the Chicot County case might preclude the granting of the relief sought in the case at bar. See Note, The Effect of the Unconstitutionality of a Statute, 37 Geo.L.J. 574, 584 (1949), in which the author suggests that Gayes v. New York, 332 U.S. 145, 67 S.Ct. 1711, 91 L.Ed. 1962 (1947), supports the view that if a petitioner has not raised the issue of the unconstitutionality of a statute at his trial, the court can refuse to consider his petition for a writ of habeas corpus. However, the precise scope of Gayes has been the subject of some discussion, and I have difficulty in applying it to the present action. Cf. Farnsworth v. United States, 98 U.S.App.D.C. 59, 232 F.2d 59 (1956), and United States v. Moore, 166 F.2d 102 (7th Cir. 1948).

[1, 2] A petition for a writ of habeas corpus is a proper means to attack the constitutionality of a statute under which a petitioner had been convicted. Furthermore, the few cases involving a petitioner who had been convicted under a statute later held to be unconstitutional in another case have generally granted relief by way of discharge upon a writ of habeas corpus. See, e. g., Ex parte Rose, 122 N.J.L. 507, 6 A.2d 389 (Sup.Ct.1939); Ex parte Downing, 7 Cal.App.2d 731, 47 P.2d 322 (Cal.App. 1935); Ex parte Barrett, 25 Okl.Cr. 431, 221 P. 124 (Okla.Crim.App.1923); cf. Desist v. United States, 394 U.S. 244, 261 n. 2, 89 S.Ct. 1030, 22 L.Ed.2d 248 (1969) (dissenting opinion); but see Dowd v. Grazer, 233 Ind. 68, 116 N.E.2d 108 (Ind.1953).

In 1 Sutherland, Statutes and Statutory Construction (Supp.1971 § 111, at 6), the author states:

> "[The] tenderness with which our system regards individual liberty has caused an exception to the rule of estoppel to be made for criminal statutes. Where a statute which declares conduct to be a crime is held unconstitutional, a person who was previously convicted under it may procure his release by habeas corpus."

Babbitz is clear that the state legislature may impose reasonable restrictions on the right of a woman to abort an unquickened fetus. Thus, in 310 F.Supp. at 302, the court stated:

> "Under its police power, the state can regulate certain aspects of abortion. Thus, it is permissible for the state to require that abortions be conducted by qualified physicians."

The declaration in Babbitz that § 940.04(1) and (5) are unconstitutional was based upon the premise that the statute is overbroad. On the other hand, rules of severability preclude "saving" a portion of the statute in question so as to accommodate the fact that Mrs. Harling is not a physician or to accommodate a construction that the declaration of unconstitutionality was meant only to extend to Dr. Babbitz or others in his precise position. This conclusion is buttressed by the rules of strict construction generally applied to penal statutes, and they are generally found to be void in their entirety whenever one portion is clearly unconstitutional.

Now, therefore, it is ordered that the petition for a writ of habeas corpus be and hereby is granted. The execution of the writ will be stayed for thirty days to allow the respondent an opportunity to seek appellate court review.

Item No. 23

IN THE UNITED STATES DISTRICT COURT

FOR THE WESTERN DISTRICT OF WISCONSIN

ALFRED L. KENNAN, M.D., ADRIENNE H. CAMPBELL, RITA W. SMIRNOFF, and ANN W. BASHORE, Plaintiffs v. GERALD C. NICHOL, Individually and as District Attorney, Dane County, State of Wisconsin; his agents, assistants, and all those acting in concert or cooperation with him to enforce Wisconsin Statutes 940.04(1) and (5); Defendants	OPINION AND TEMPORARY RESTRAINING ORDER 71-C-118

Plaintiffs attack Sections 940.04(1) and (5) of the Wisconsin Statutes, contending that they violate the Constitution of the United States. Section 940.04(1) provides that any person, other than the mother, who intentionally destroys the life of an unborn child may be punished by fine or imprisonment or both. Section 940.04(5) excepts from the prohibition a "therapeutic abortion," which it defines. For the purposes of subsections (1) and (5), an unborn child is defined as "a human being from the time of conception until it is born alive."

In verified pleadings filed April 26, 1971, plaintiffs Kennan, Smirnoff, and Bashore, allege that on April 19, 1971, at the direction of the defendant district attorney and pursuant to a search warrant issued by a judge of a state court of Wisconsin, police entered the medical offices occupied by plaintiff Kennan in connection with his specialized practice in the performance of abortions, in which office plaintiffs Smirnoff and Bashore were employed as social workers, and that the police seized a number of pieces of equipment and files and records. They allege that on April 19 and 20, the defendant made public statements threatening their imminent arrest under Section 940.04(1). They allege that on April 21, 1971, the defendant caused a criminal prosecution to be initiated against them by causing to be filed in a state court criminal complaints against them alleging violations of Section 940.04(1).

A complaint was filed in this court by the plaintiff Kennan on April 20, 1971, alleging that he was threatened with a criminal prosecution in the state court under the anti-abortion statute and asserting its unconstitutionality under the United States Constitution. On April 20, I entered an order to the defendant district attorney to show cause on April 26 why he should not be restrained from enforcing Section 940.04(1) against Kennan. On April 26, 1971, an amended complaint was filed by plaintiff Kennan, and another plaintiff Campbell, and on April 26, 1971, plaintiffs Smirnoff and Bashore moved for leave to intervene, were granted leave in the absence of objection, and filed a complaint.

In her verified complaint, plaintiff Campbell alleges that she is a married woman living in this district and bearing an unquickened child by her husband, that she and her husband do not wish to have the child, that she was scheduled to have an abortion on May 3, 1971, at the offices of the plaintiff Kennan in the city of Madison in this district, that she cannot afford to go to New York or elsewhere out of state where abortions can be performed legally, and that the criminal prosecution against plaintiff Kennan and the seizure of the medical equipment are preventing her from obtaining the abortion in this district. She undertakes to sue on behalf of a class consisting of members similarly situated.

By affidavit, plaintiff Kennan alleges that the effect of the seizure of the records and equipment in his office is to prevent him from continuing to perform abortions, and that there are over 300 females for whom appointments for the performance of abortions are presently scheduled.

For the purpose of deciding the motion for a temporary restraining order, and for no other purpose, I find the facts to be as I have summarized them above.

In Babbitz v. McCann, 310 F. Supp. 293 (E.D. Wis. 1970), a three-judge court consisting of Circuit Judge Kerner and District Judges Reynolds and Gordon, entered judgment declaring that Sections 940.04(1) and (5) violate the Constitution of the United States. My understanding is that this declaratory judgment has not been reversed or modified by any appellate court. In the same action, the same three-judge court later in 1970 enjoined the district attorney of Milwaukee County and a judge of a county court of Milwaukee County from continuing or initiating prosecutions under Secs. 940.04(1) and (5). 320 F. Supp. 219. On April 19, 1971, the Supreme Court of the United States vacated this injunctive judgment and remanded the case to the three-judge court in the Eastern District of Wisconsin for reconsideration in light of Younger v. Harris, 401 U.S. 37 (1971); and Samuels v. Mackell and Fernandez v. Mackell, 401 U.S. 66 (1971).

In view of the declaratory judgment by the three-judge court in Babbitz, and also in view of a similar decision with respect to a similar Illinois statute by a three-judge United States District Court in Doe v. Scott, 321 F. Supp. 1385, 1390 (N.D. Ill. 1971), appeal pending, Supreme Court Docket No. 1522, 1523, I conclude that plaintiffs here enjoy a reasonable good chance for ultimate success in this lawsuit on the merits, if it eventuates that a federal three-judge court is free to pass, and does pass, upon the federal constitutional contention.

I find that jurisdiction in this court is present. 28 U.S.C. § 1343(3); 42 U.S.C. § 1983.

The principal question, with respect to the availability of temporary injunctive relief, is whether the plaintiffs have a reasonably good chance ultimately to persuade a federal three-judge court that it should not abstain from acting on the merits of their constitutional claim, and from granting appropriate relief if they prevail on the merits. This question of abstention is rendered unusually difficult by reason of the opinions and orders entered by the Supreme Court of the United States on February 23, 1971, in Younger v. Harris, No. 2; Boyle v. Landry, No. 4; Samuels v. Mackell, Nos. 7 and 9; Perez v. Ledesma, No. 60; Dyson v. Stein, No. 41; and Byrne v. Karalexis, No. 83.

The complaint by plaintiff Kennan was filed in this court on April 20, when he was clearly threatened with a criminal prosecution in the state court but before that prosecution had been commenced. Thus this case presents a situation which was expressly excluded from consideration by the Supreme Court of the United States in its February 23, 1971, decisions. See Younger v. Harris, slip opinion at pp. 3-4 and, the concurring opinion by Mr. Justice Brennan in Perez v. Ledesma, slip opinion at p. 25, n. 9. It is contended here by the defendant that this chronological sequence of the commencement of the federal suit and the state court prosecution is too artificial to serve as a basis for determining whether a federal court should abstain. However, from the point of view of those who had sought a federal forum in the cases decided by the Supreme Court of the United States on February 23, 1971, the chronological sequence also appeared to be artificial, but a majority of the Supreme Court was prepared to regard it as decisive in those cases.

Of course, even if a federal court is not otherwise bound to abstain, in order to obtain temporary injunctive relief, a plaintiff must demonstrate that irreparable injury will occur if the relief is denied. Assuming that there is a federal constitutional right vested in a physician to perform abortions upon an unquickened embryo and a federal constitutional right vested in a pregnant woman to decide whether she should carry or reject an unquickened embryo (and I have concluded above that the plaintiffs enjoy a reasonably good chance to prevail in these contentions if the merits are reached by a three-judge federal court), then it clearly follows that to withhold a temporary restraining order is to permit this constitutional right to be lost irreparably with respect to the physician and those women for whom he could otherwise perform the operation in the meantime. For the present, I need not decide, finally, whether the interests of pregnant women can be considered in a suit to which only the physician is a party (only plaintiff Kennan's complaint was filed prior to the commencement of the criminal prosecution in the state court), but should this become a critical issue in this suit, Griswold v. Connecticut, 381 U.S. 479, 481 (1965), causes me to conclude that plaintiffs enjoy a reasonable good chance ultimately to prevail in the contention that the physician does enjoy standing to raise the constitutional rights of his patients and potential patients.

For the reasons stated, I conclude that the plaintiffs enjoy a reasonably good chance to prevail in their contention that a three-judge federal court should not abstain in this action,[1] and in their contention that Sections 940.04(1) and (5) violate the Constitution of the United States, and that injunctive relief is necessary to avoid irreparable injury.

Upon the entire record herein, and pursuant to 28 U.S.C. § 2284(3), it is hereby ordered that, until further order of the court:

(1) the defendant, and any and all persons acting in concert with him or at his direction or under his control, are hereby restrained from further enforcement, against the plaintiffs herein, of Sections 940.04(1) and (5), Wisconsin Statutes, in any case involving "an embryo of four months or less" (Babbitz v. McCann, 310 F. Supp. 293, 301); and

(2) the defendant, and any and all persons acting in concert with him or at his direction or under his control, are hereby ordered to deliver to the plaintiff Kennan, on or before April 30, 1971, either the originals, or true and complete copies, of all of the documents seized April 19, 1971, which relate to persons who are or may be candidates for abortions on and after that date, and also the two Gomco vacuum pump machines seized April 19, 1971; and

(3) the plaintiffs, and each of them, and all persons acting in concert or cooperation with them, or at their direction, or under their control, are to refrain from destroying or mutilating any of the items, documentary or otherwise, covered by (2), above, unless authorized to do so by further order of the court; and

(4) if the defendant believes that he is unable to comply with the provisions of subparagraph (2), above, he may show cause, on or before April 30, 1971, why he should be relieved of the duty to comply therewith.

ENTERED this 27th day of April, 1971.

1 I would be strengthened in this view if it appeared that the Supreme Court of Wisconsin had already had the chance to pass upon the federal constitutionality of Section 940.04 (1) and had rejected the challenge. From the incomplete information available to me, it appears that the Supreme Court of Wisconsin has had such an opportunity, State ex rel. Harling v. Superintendent, April 13, 1970, but its opinion in that case leaves me uncertain whether the Court intended to reject the constitutional challenge on its merits.

Item No. 24

IN THE UNITED STATES DISTRICT COURT

FOR THE WESTERN DISTRICT OF WISCONSIN

ALFRED L. KENNAN, M.D., Plaintiff v. ROBERT WARREN, Attorney General for the State of Wisconsin; and WISCONSIN STATE MEDICAL EXAMINING BOARD, Defendants	OPINION AND TEMPORARY RESTRAINING ORDER 71-C-132

This action (commenced April 28, 1971) relates to certain facets of a controversy centering upon the alleged operation by the plaintiff and his staff of a medical center in the City of Madison in this district, in which, it is alleged, abortions have been performed in violation of Sections 940.04(1) and (5), and 448.18(1)(a), Wis. Stat.

It appears that there are at least three legal facets of this controversy: (1) a criminal prosecution against Dr. Kennan and certain members of his staff which was commenced on April 21 or April 22, 1971, by the District Attorney of Dane County, Wisconsin, in the County Court for Dane County, charging violations of Sections 940.04(1) and (5); (2) a civil action commenced by the Attorney General of Wisconsin (by the service of a summons and complaint on April 21, 1971) in the Circuit Court for Dane County, Wisconsin, in which the State of Wisconsin is the plaintiff and Dr. Kennan is the defendant (No. 133151 in that court), which action purports to have been brought pursuant to Section 448.19, Wis. Stat., in which it is alleged that Dr. Kennan has repeatedly violated Sections 940.04(1) and 448.18(1)(a), Wis. Stat., and in which judgment is sought permanently enjoining Dr. Kennan and his staff from activity relating to the performance of other than "therapeutic" abortions as defined in Section 940.04(5), Wis. Stat.; and (3) a written warning by the Medical Examining Board of the State of Wisconsin, addressed to Dr. Kennan by the Board on April 27, 1971, that the Board will immediately suspend his license, pursuant to Section 448.18(7), Wis. Stat., unless he ceases to perform abortions "except in strict conformity to the exception to the criminal abortion law as stated in sec. 940.04(5), Stats., and in strict conformity with accepted medical and surgical standards." I will refer to these three facets herein as "the state court criminal action," "the state court civil injunction action," and "the Medical Board proceeding."

(1) The state court criminal action.

In an action initiated by Dr. Kennan in this court on April 20, 1971, under 42 U.S.C. § 1983 (Kennan et al., v. Nichol, W. D. Wis., No. 71-C-118), I entered a temporary restraining order April 27, 1971, pursuant to 28 U.S.C. § 2284(3). I initiated the convening of a three-judge court by the Chief Judge of the Circuit. A three-judge court has been convened by the Chief Judge of the Circuit. It consists of Circuit Judge Kerner, and District Judges Reynolds and Gordon. I have withdrawn from the action, and Judge Gordon is acting as the single United States District Judge for the Western District of Wisconsin in the action, as well as acting as a member of the three-judge court.

The temporary restraining order entered April 27, 1971, enjoined the defendant District Attorney of Dane County, "and any and all persons acting in concert with him or at his direction or under his control" from further enforcement of Sections 940.04(1) and (5), Wis. Stat., against Dr. Kennan and his staff, in any case involving an embryo of four months or less.

At a hearing in this court on May 4, 1971, in the present case (71-C-132), counsel for Dr. Kennan contended that by pursuing the state court civil injunction action, the Attorney General of Wisconsin is "acting in concert" with the District Attorney of Dane County, in violation of the temporary restraining order entered April 27, 1971, in 71-C-118. I permitted counsel for Dr. Kennan to state the contention, and I provided the opportunity for the Assistant Attorney General to respond. However, it is clear that I have no authority to deal with such a contention. If there is a desire to pursue it, it must be directed to the three-judge court which has been convened in 71-C-118, the action in which the temporary restraining order of April 27, 1971, was entered.

(2) The state court civil injunction action.

The complaint by Dr. Kennan against the Attorney General and the Medical Board in this present action, 71-C-132, alleges, among other things, that the Attorney General, acting as counsel for the Board, has commenced an action in state court to enjoin the operation of Dr. Kennan's clinic. The verified complaint prays for a temporary restraining order restraining the Attorney General and the Board from suspending, revoking or otherwise interfering with Dr. Kennan's license, "or from any other method of further enforcement against [Dr. Kennan] of Sections 940.04(1) and (5) and 448.18, Wis. Stat., in any case involving an embryo of four months or less," and prays for such other relief as the court deems just and proper. I entered an order to show cause on April 28, 1971, in the form submitted by counsel for Dr. Kennan, returnable May 4, 1971, requiring the Attorney General and the Board to show cause why they should not be restrained temporarily from interfering with Dr. Kennan's license, and temporarily "suspending and restraining the operation, enforcement, or execution of Chapter 448 of the Wisconsin Statutes...."

On May 3, 1971, there was filed in this action in this court a verified "amended complaint" in which the defendants (the Attorney General and the Board) remained as they were in the original complaint, but in which a second plaintiff, Adrienne H. Campbell, is shown. Parties may be added to an action only by order of the court. Rule 21, Federal Rules of Civil Procedure. No such order has been sought or entered. Dr. Kennan was free to amend his complaint, without leave of court, since no responsive pleading had been served. Rule 15(a), Federal Rules of Civil Procedure. I treat the amended complaint as an amended complaint by Dr. Kennan, verified by him, and since it is also verified by Adrienne Campbell, I treat it as an affidavit by her, in support of Dr. Kennan's motion for a temporary restraining order. However, Mrs. Campbell is not presently a party to this action.

The amended complaint includes more detailed allegations concerning the history of the state court civil injunction suit, and I will turn to them in a moment. The relief prayed for includes: a temporary restraining order preventing the defendants from interfering with Dr. Kennan's license or from any other method of further enforcement of Sections 940.04(1) and (5) and 448.18(1)(a) against Dr. Kennan, whether civil or criminal, in cases involving an embryo of four months or less; a temporary restraining order preventing the Attorney General from pursuing the state court civil injunction action and from seeking to enforce an order entered by the state court in that action April 30, 1971; the convening of a three-judge court; consolidation in this court of this action (71-C-132) with the earlier action (71-C-118); and permanent declaratory and injunctive judgments.

At the May 4 hearing in this action in this court on the order to show cause with respect to the motion for a temporary restraining order, counsel for the Attorney General and the Board objected to consideration of any temporary relief other than that specifically described in the order to show cause. That is, they contended that the hearing was limited to the Board's warning that Dr. Kennan's license may be suspended, and that it could not reach the matter of the state court civil injunction action. At the time of the hearing I expressed the view that there was merit to this contention, but I permitted argument on the matter of the state court civil injunction action, and provided an opportunity for the Attorney General to present evidence on the point if he so elected. Subsequently, I have concluded that the Attorney General's contention concerning the scope of the May 4 hearing was without merit. This is because I have since ascertained clearly that the state court civil injunction action was commenced pursuant to Section 448.19, Wis. Stat. The temporary relief sought, as stated in the order to show cause, included an order "suspending and restraining the operation, enforcement, or execution of Chapter 448 of the Wisconsin Statutes." The Attorney General and the Board were thus fairly warned that the May 4 hearing would reach the subject of the state court civil injunction action.

From the entire record herein, and by the exercise of judicial notice of the proceedings in the state court civil injunction action and in the earlier action in this court (71-C-118), I make the following findings of fact, for the purpose of acting upon Dr. Kennan's motion for a temporary restraining order, and for no other purpose.

I find that on April 19, 1971, pursuant to a search warrant issued by a judge of a state trial court, and at the direction of the District Attorney of Dane County, police entered the medical offices occupied by Dr. Kennan and his staff, in the city of Madison in this district, in connection with his specialized practice in the performance of abortions, that the police seized equipment and records, and that the practical effect of the seizure was to prevent the continuation of Dr. Kennan's abortion practice for some period of time. On April 19 and 20 the District Attorney made public statements threatening the imminent arrest of Dr. Kennan under Section 940.04(1), Wis. Stat. On April 21 or 22, 1971, the District Attorney commenced a criminal action against Dr. Kennan, alleging violations of Section 940.04(1).

An action (71-C-118) was commenced in this court by Dr. Kennan on April 20, 1971, seeking to enjoin the District Attorney from enforcing Sections 940.04(1) and (5).

On April 21, 1971, expressly pursuant to Section 448.19, Wis. Stat., the Board and the Attorney General commenced, in the name of the state, the state court civil injunction action against Dr. Kennan. No order was entered by the court in that action prior to April 30, 1971.

On April 27, 1971, this court entered a temporary restraining order, pursuant to 28 U.S.C. § 2284(3), preventing the District Attorney and those acting in concert with him, from further enforcement of Sections 940.04(1) and (5) against Dr. Kennan in any case involving an embryo of four months or less. The order was not limited to criminal prosecutions.

Following the issuance of the April 27, 1971, temporary restraining order in this court, in the action commenced here on April 20 by Dr. Kennan against the District Attorney, the Attorney General renewed his application to the court in the state court civil injunction action for an order to show cause and for an ex parte restraining order. On April 30, 1971, the state court entered an order to show cause returnable May 5, 1971, at 3:00 p.m., on the question whether Dr. Kennan should be enjoined from his abortion practice pending the final outcome of the state court action, and an order enjoining Dr. Kennan during the period from April 30, 1971, to May 5.

For reasons stated in some fullness in the opinion I entered in 71-C-118 on April 27, 1971, I conclude that in this present action, 71-C-132, Dr. Kennan enjoys a reasonably good chance of ultimate success in this lawsuit on the merits, if it eventuates that a federal three-judge court is free to pass, and does pass, upon the federal constitutional contention. My April 27 opinion related strictly to Sections 940.04(1) and (5), Wis. Stat. However, I conclude that Sections 448.18(1)(a) and 448.19 depend wholly upon Sections 940.04(1) and (5), since Section 448.18(1)(a) proscribes as "immoral or unprofessional conduct," "procuring, aiding or abetting a criminal abortion" (emphasis added).

With respect to the relief sought in this action in this court concerning the state court civil injunction action, I find that jurisdiction here is present. 28 U.S.C. § 1343(3); 42 U.S.C. § 1983.

Assuming that there is a federal constitutional right vested in a physician to perform abortions upon an unquickened embryo and a federal constitutional right vested in a pregnant woman to decide whether she should carry or reject an unquickened embryo (and I have concluded above that the plaintiff enjoys a reasonably good chance to prevail in these contentions if the merits are reached by a three-judge federal court), then it clearly follows that to withhold a temporary restraining order against state court interference with these rights is to permit them to be lost irreparably with respect to the physician and those women for whom he could otherwise perform the operation in the meantime. For the present, I need not decide, finally, whether the interests of pregnant women can be considered in a suit to which only the physician is a party, but should this become a critical issue in this suit, Griswold v. Connecticut, 381 U.S. 479, 481 (1965), causes me to conclude that plaintiffs enjoy a reasonably good chance to prevail in the contention that the physician does enjoy standing to raise the constitutional rights of his patients and potential patients. In accordance with 28 U.S.C. § 2284(3), I specifically find that irreparable damage will result if a state court restraint continues to prevent Dr. Kennan from performing any abortions except in compliance with Sections 940.04(1) and (5), in that time is of the essence for those women for whom Dr. Kennan would otherwise be free to perform abortions and for whom alternative opportunities for this procedure are unavailable, and that the support for this finding and conclusion is to be found in the verified amended complaint.

The principal question with respect to the availability of temporary injunctive relief affecting the state court civil injunction action, is whether the plaintiff has a reasonably good chance ultimately to persuade a federal three-judge court that it should not abstain from acting on the merits of his constitutional claim, and from granting appropriate relief if he prevails on the merits. On this question of abstention, I consider particularly the opinions and orders entered by the Supreme Court of the United States on February 23, 1971, in Younger v. Harris, No. 2; Boyle v. Landry, No. 4; Samuels v. Mackell, Nos. 7 and 9; Perez v. Ledesma, No. 60; Dyson v. Stein, No. 41; and Byrne v. Karalexis, No. 83.

The Younger group of cases involved state court prosecutions for alleged violations of criminal statutes and municipal ordinances. Whether the Younger doctrine is applicable to a state court civil injunctive action under Section 448.19, Wis. Stat., is a difficult question. However, under the view I take of this situation, this distinction is not critical.

The Younger doctrine places heavy emphasis upon whether a state action has actually been commenced prior to the time that the aggrieved party commences an action in the federal district court to vindicate his asserted federal constitutional rights. In the present situation, Dr. Kennan sought a forum here on April 20 (71-C-118). The state court criminal prosecution by the District Attorney was commenced on April 21 or 22, and the state court civil injunction action under Section 448.19 was commenced on April 21. However, in the action commenced by Dr. Kennan in this court on April 20 (71-C-118), only the District Attorney was named as a defendant. Dr. Kennan's present action (71-C-132) against the Attorney General and the Board was not commenced until April 28. The question, in terms of abstention, appears to require an evaluation of this time sequence.

I believe that the specific provisions of Section 448.18(1)(a) and 448.19 are critical to this evaluation. Section 448.18(1)(a) defines "immoral or unprofessional conduct" to include "procuring, aiding or abetting a criminal abortion." Section 448.19 provides that if it appears to the Board upon complaint, or if it is known to the Board, that any person is violating Section 448.18(1)(a) -- or other provisions of Chapter 448 -- the Board or "the district attorney of the proper county may investigate and may, in addition to any other remedies, bring action in the name and on behalf of the state against any such person to enjoin such person from such violation. . . ." Had the District Attorney commenced the state court civil injunctive action against Dr. Kennan on April 21, the Younger doctrine would have been inapplicable since Dr. Kennan's action against him (71-C-118) had been filed here April 20. Thus, it must be determined whether Younger's heavy emphasis upon the time sequence can be escaped by having the Board, with the Attorney General as its attorney, initiate an action to enjoin Dr. Kennan from "procuring, aiding or abetting a criminal abortion." As I have observed above in another connection, the contention that Dr. Kennan has violated Section 448.18(1)(a) turns on whether the abortions he has performed have been "criminal," and this in turn depends upon whether they were in violation of Sections 940.04(1) and (5), the enforcement of which against Dr. Kennan had been prohibited by the April 27 order.[1]

[1] I am aware that the complaint in the state court civil injunction action recites that the State Assembly by resolution "authorized" the Attorney

I believe that the Younger doctrine should not be amplified to deny a federal forum to an otherwise qualified plaintiff, to assert a federal constitutional challenge to Sections 940.04(1) and (5), solely because his action in the federal court, filed April 20, failed to anticipate every means by which some state or local governmental officer or agency might subsequently attempt to enforce those very statutory provisions against him. I conclude that Dr. Kennan enjoys a reasonably good chance ultimately to persuade a federal three-judge court not to abstain for this reason.

(3) The Medical Board proceeding

With respect to this branch of the present case, I incorporate and reaffirm all of those findings of fact and conclusions of law set forth in part (2) of this opinion, and I add the following findings of fact, solely for the purpose of deciding the motion for a temporary restraining order.

I find that on or about March 29, 1971, the Board decided to initiate an investigative hearing under Section 448.17, at its next regularly scheduled meeting on April 23, 1971, concerning whether Dr. Kennan's activities in operating an abortion clinic were inimical to public health; that such an investigative hearing was held on April 23; that the testimony presented at said hearing persuaded the Board to continue the investigative hearing, and that the Board voted to warn Dr. Kennan; that by letter dated April 27, 1971, the Board did warn Dr. Kennan that it would immediately suspend his license, pursuant to Section 448.18(7), Wis. Stat., unless he ceased "performing abortions except in strict conformity to the exception to the criminal abortion law as stated in 940.04(5), Stats., and in strict conformity with accepted medical and surgical standards"; and that on April 30, 1971, the Board decided that the April 27 warning would continue to stand as issued.

General to commence it, and that the action was brought pursuant to Section 165.25(1), Wis. Stat., as well as Section 448.19. I note that the resolution "requests" him to "institute proceedings in the appropriate court to obtain an injunction." I note that under Section 165.25(1), when requested by a branch of the legislature, the Attorney General

In accordance with 28 U.S.C. § 2284(3), I specifically find that if the Board is not temporarily restrained from suspending Dr. Kennan's license for a period of not to exceed three months, and a possible like period thereafter, pursuant to Sec. 448.18(7), irreparable injury will result. I find that this irreparable injury consists of that described in part (2) of this opinion, as well as in an inability to practice any kind of medicine during the suspension or suspensions, as well as the damage to Dr. Kennan's reputation and standing. I find support for these findings in the verified amended complaint. I conclude that there is no basis for abstention by a federal district court with respect to the Medical Board proceeding. The Younger doctrine is unrelated to state administrative proceedings, as distinguished from state court proceedings. In an action under 42 U.S.C. § 1983, a plaintiff is not required to exhaust either state administrative remedies or state judicial remedies. Monroe v. Pape, 365 U.S. 167 (1961); McNeese v. Board of Education, 373 U.S. 668 (1963); Damico v. California, 389 U.S. 416 (1967).

shall "appear for the state and prosecute . . . in any court . . . any cause or matter, civil or criminal, in which the state or the people thereof may be in anywise interested." I find nothing in Section 165.25(1) to create any cause of action. Therefore, I consider that the state court civil injunction action must rest solely on Section 448.19. In any event, whether the state court civil injunction action is viewed as having been brought by the Board or independently by the Attorney General, it is an action to enforce Sections 940.04 (1) and (5).

ORDER

Like the temporary restraining order entered April 27, 1971 in 71-C-118, this order is intended to be a temporary restraining order entered pursuant to 28 U.S.C. § 2284(3), and it is to remain in force only until the hearing by a full three-judge court if the Chief Judge of the Circut convenes such a court in response to my notification to him under 28 U.S.C. § 2284(1).

Upon the entire record herein, and pursuant to 28 U.S.C. §2284(3), IT IS HEREBY ORDERED that:

(1) the defendant Attorney General and the defendant Board and the defendant members of said Board, and any and all persons acting in concert with any of them or at the direction of any of them, are restrained from:

(a) further proceedings under Sections 165.25(1), 448.19, 940.04(1), or 940.04(5), Wis. Stat., whether civil or criminal, to enforce against the plaintiff Alfred L. Kennan, the provisions of Sections 940.04(1) and (5) and Section 448.18(1)(a) in any case involving "an embryo of four months or less" Babbitz v. McCann, 310 F. Supp. 293, 301 (E.D. Wis. 1970)); and

(b) further proceedings under Sections 448.18 (I)(a) and 448.18(7), Wis. Stat., and any other provision of any statute and Board regulation, to suspend or to revoke the license of plaintiff Kennan to practice medicine and surgery under Section 448.06, Wis. Stat., for the sole reason that he has performed abortions, or intends or threatens to perform abortions, otherwise than in conformity with Section 940.04(5), Wis. Stat., in any case involving "an embryo of four months or less."

IT IS FURTHER ORDERED that at any time prior to the convening of a three-judge court in this action by the Chief Judge of the Circuit, any party hereto may apply to the single judge of this district for an order modifying or amending the terms of this order.

IN THE UNITED STATES DISTRICT COURT

ALFRED L. KENNAN, M. D., Plaintiff v. ROBERT WARREN, Attorney General for the State of Wisconsin; and WISCONSIN STATE MEDICAL EXAMINING BOARD, Defendants	SUPPLEMENTAL OPINION 71-C-132

This opinion is intended to supplement the opinion I entered herein on May 5, 1971, in conjunction with the entry of a temporary restraining order. It supplements that portion of the May 5 opinion which dealt with the state court civil injunction action by the State of Wisconsin against Dr. Kennan in the Circuit Court for Dane County.

(1)

In Goss v. State of Illinois, 321 F.2d 257 (7th Cir. 1963), and Smith v. Village of Lansing, 241 F.2d 856(7th Cir. 1957), the Seventh Circuit Court of Appeals held that 42 U.S.C. § 1983 is not an exception to 28 U.S.C. § 2283, a provision which generally prevents a federal court from staying state court proceedings. In my dissent from the majority opinion in Zwicker v. Boll, 270 F. Supp. 131 (W.D. Wis. 1967), I expressed the view that intervening decisions of the United States Supreme Court were inconsistent with the earlier Seventh Circuit opinions. This view also has been expressed by the United States District Court of the Northern District of Illinois in Landry v. Daley, 288 F. Supp. 200 (N.D. Ill. 1968).

The Court of Appeals for the Seventh Circuit, in one portion of its opinion in Boyle v. Landry, 422 F.2d 631 (7th Cir. 1970), appears to reaffirm its holdings in Goss and Smith, that injunctions to stay proceedings in a state court have not been "expressly authorized" by 42

U.S.C. § 1983. However, if this were the holding in Boule, it would follow that in a § 1983 action, 28 U.S.C. § 2283 would constitute an absolute bar to an injunction against proceedings in a state court. I am obliged to conclude that this was not the intended holding in Boule because the bulk of the opinion was devoted to a discussion of whether the district court's injunction was "an abuse of discretion" (422 F.2d at 634); whether the district court had made a finding that the state court prosecution was in "bad faith" (id.); whether the state court "prosecutions are so great and extensive as to result in a chilling effect on First Amendment rights" "sufficient to justify federal intervention" (id.); and whether there had been a showing that any federal question arising in the state court trial would not be adequately disposed of in the state courts or ultimately on review in the United States Supreme Court. Boule, therefore, appears to mean that in an appropriate case under § 1983, an injunction against state court proceedings is permissible.

The Supreme Court of the United States has expressly refrained from passing on this question on at least three separate occasions. Dombrowski v. Pfister, 380 U.S. 479, 484, n.2 (1965); Cameron v. Johnson, 390 U.S. 611, 613, n.3 (1968); Younger v. Harris (No. 2, October Term, 1970, February 23, 1971), pp. 16-17 of slip opinion.

For these reasons, as well as those expressed in Lardru v. Daley, 288 F. Supp. 200, 224 (N.D. Ill. 1968) and my dissent in Zwicker v. Boll, 270 F. Supp. 131, 144-146 (W.D. Wis. 1967), I conclude that a temporary restraining order is permissible in some circumstances, and I conclude further that the circumstances of the present case render such an order appropriate.

My principal purpose in entering the opinion and order in Kennan v. Nichol, 71-C-118, on April 27, 1971, and the opinion and order in Kennan v. Warren, 71-C-132, on May 5, 1971, is to prepare the way for a federal three-judge court to consider all of the implications of the state court criminal prosecution of Dr. Kennan, the state court civil injunction action against him, and the Medical Board proceedings in his case, all of which are grounded in the state's criminal statutes on abortion, Sections 940.04(1) and (5). It will be for the three-judge court to determine whether jurisdiction is present; if so, whether it should nevertheless abstain; if it should not abstain, whether plaintiff is entitled to the relief sought.

It is wholly understandable and proper in a situation of this kind that state and local prosecutors and opposing parties and counsel should bring what they consider to be appropriate proceedings in what they consider to be the appropriate judicial forums, and that when such a proceeding is commenced in a state court, the state court should respond as it may feel obliged to respond under the law as it has been determined, or, if the law has not yet been determined, then under the law as the state court believes it should be. I suggest that when a party commences a proceeding in a federal court, it is equally understandable and proper that the federal court should respond as it may feel obliged to respond under the law as it has been determined, or, if the law has not yet been determined, then under the law as the federal court believes it should be.

These questions of the relationships between the state and federal courts have a long and significant history which was most recently the subject of extended and discrepant discussion by various members of the United States Supreme Court in opinions filed February 23, 1971, in Younger v. Harris, No. 2, and several related cases. They are profound questions, and their resolution requires a weighing of many competing values.

For the present I undertake to say only that the question of when and under what circumstances the doors of the federal district courts will be open to plaintiffs seeking to vindicate rights claimed to be secured by the federal constitution is a national question. When the question is finally answered, the doors of the federal courts will be open or closed, not only to a physician or a pregnant married woman in Madison, Wisconsin, but to blacks in Mississippi, slum dwellers in Harlem, and grape pickers in California. A federal court must not be headstrong. But amenity among state and federal judicial officers must never cause a federal court to close its door to those to whom the door should open.

CRAVEN, Circuit Judge:

This is a class action brought before a three-judge court, 28 U.S.C. § 2281, to have the North Carolina Abortion Statute,[1] G.S. §§ 14-44 to 14-45.1, de-

1. The statute reads:

§ 14-44. Using drugs or instruments to destroy unborn child.—If any person shall wilfully administer to any woman, either pregnant or quick with child, or prescribe for any such woman, or advise or procure any such woman to take any medicine, drug or other substance whatever, or shall use or employ any instrument or other means with intent thereby to destroy such child, he shall be guilty of a felony, and shall be imprisoned in the State's prison for not less than one year nor more than ten years, and be fined at the discretion of the court.

§ 14-45. Using drugs or instruments to produce miscarriage or injure pregnant woman.—If any person shall administer to any pregnant woman, or prescribe for any such woman, or advise and procure such woman to take any medicine, drug or anything whatsoever, with intent thereby to procure the miscarriage of such woman, or to injure or destroy such woman, or shall use any instrument or application for any of the above purposes, he shall be guilty of a felony, and shall be imprisoned in the jail or State's prison for not less than one year nor more than five years and shall be fined, at the discretion of the court.

§ 14-45.1. When abortion not unlawful.—Notwithstanding any of the provisions of G.S. 14-44 and 14-45, it shall not be unlawful to advise, procure, or cause the miscarriage of a pregnant woman or an abortion when the same is performed by a doctor of medicine licensed to practice medicine in North Carolina, if he can reasonably establish that:

There is substantial risk that continuance of the pregnancy would threaten the life or gravely impair the health of the said woman, or

There is substantial risk that the child would be born with grave physical or mental defect, or

The pregnancy resulted from rape or incest and the said alleged rape was reported to a law-enforcement agency or court official within seven days after the alleged rape, and

Only after the said woman has given her written consent for said abortion to be performed, and if the said woman shall be a minor or incompetent as adjudicated by any court of competent jurisdiction then only after permission is given in writing by the parents, or if married, her husband, guardian or person or persons standing in loco parentis to said minor or incompetent, and

Only when the said woman shall have resided in the State of North Carolina for a period of at least four months immediately preceding the operation being performed except in the case of emergency where the life of the said woman is in danger, and

Only if the abortion is performed in a hospital licensed by the North Carolina Medical Care Commission, and

Only after three doctors of medicine not engaged jointly in private practice, one of whom shall be the person performing the abortion, shall have examined said woman and certified in writing the circumstances which they believe to justify the abortion, and

Only when such certificate shall have been submitted before the abortion to the hospital where it is to be performed; provided, however, that where an emergency exists, and the certificate so states, such certificate may be submitted within twenty-four hours after the abortion.

clared unconstitutional and its enforcement enjoined.

Although the law is no respecter of persons, plaintiffs' very occupations lend credence to their contention that the state may not constitutionally prevent or circumscribe the fundamental right of a woman to choose whether or not to bear children and to prevent it by abortion if she and her physician should decide to do so.

Dr. Elizabeth Corkey is the Medical Director of the Mecklenburg County Family Planning Clinic, a medical expert in obstetrics and contraception, and formerly a medical missionary. Plaintiffs Hendrix, Parker and Burt are also doctors of medicine and respectively the Chairmen of the Departments of Obstetrics and Gynecology at the teaching hospitals of the University of North Carolina, Duke University and Wake Forest University. Each is a registered and licensed physician and surgeon under North Carolina law and each is certified as a specialist in the field of obstetrics and gynecology. Plaintiff Jones is a member of the North Carolina General Assembly and was largely responsible for the passage of the 1967 amendment to the statutes challenged in this law suit. For many years he has been an interested student of contraception, abortion and family planning. It is interesting that he asks the court to invalidate a statute for which he is largely responsible. His position is that it is the least restrictive legislation he could get enacted but that even so it is an unconstitutional burden on fundamental liberty.

Unquestionably, every one of the five plaintiffs is a qualified and informed expert on the problem of abortion in North Carolina. Indeed, each of them is doubtless qualified to testify as an expert witness in this very case. Although we deeply respect their informed opinions that the state has no justifiable interest in interfering with a woman's fundamental right to choose whether or not to bear children and implementing that right by choosing to abort, we think such a conclusion necessarily involves a value judgment we may not properly make. It seems to us the legislature may not unreasonably conclude that there is a sufficient public interest in protecting the embryo to permit limited statutory intrusion into what would otherwise be a protected zone of privacy. In only one minor respect do we hold the statute unconstitutional: the residency requirement as a condition precedent to obtaining a therapeutic abortion unconstitutionally, we think, limits the right to travel.

We avoid another serious constitutional problem by interpretation. We think the legislature did not intend to reverse the presumption of innocence, and that the burden of proof in a prosecution is on the state to show that an abortion did not come within the exemptions of G.S. § 14-45.1.

[1, 2] Despite the several assertions made by the state concerning matters of jurisdiction, we decline to dismiss on these grounds. The issues have been exhausted in other actions considering abortion laws, and we therefore deal with them summarily. First, we find that this is not a proper case in which to apply the doctrine of abstention, there being no state court interpretation of the statute that would alter the statute's constitutional impact. Zwickler v. Koota, 389 U.S. 241, 88 S.Ct. 391, 19 L.Ed.2d 444 (1967); Doe v. Randall, 314 F.Supp. 32 (D.Minn.1970). Nor do we accept the argument that justiciability fails for lack of standing. Flast v. Cohen, 392 U.S. 83, 88 S.Ct. 1942, 20 L.Ed.2d 947 (1968); Roe v. Wade, 314 F.Supp. 1217, 1220 (N.D.Tex.1970); see Berger, Standing to Sue in Public Actions, Is It a Constitutional Requirement? 78 Yale L.J. 816 (1969). Finally, we agree that the plaintiffs are able to represent the rights of the class whose members they seek to protect. See Griswold v. Connecticut, 381 U.S. 479, 481, 85 S.Ct. 1678, 14 L.Ed.2d 510 (1965); Roe v. Wade, supra, 314 F.Supp. at 1219-1220.

I.

[3, 4] There is nothing in the United States Constitution about birth, contraception or abortion. But in Griswold v. Connecticut, supra, the Supreme Court derived from the several amendments to the Constitution a right of privacy. We are urged to extend Griswold v. Connecticut, supra, and its zone of privacy to insulate abortion from legislative control. In Griswold the Supreme Court recognized a zone of marital privacy into which the state may not constitutionally intrude where its only interest in doing so was said to be the discouragement of extramarital sexual relations. Thus, the court struck down Connecticut's law forbidding the giving of information and instruction and advice to married persons as to the means of preventing conception.

We agree with plaintiffs that there is no more precious aspect of the concept of liberty than the right to be left alone. As Mr. Justice Brandeis said dissenting in Olmstead v. United States, 277 U.S. 438, 478, 48 S.Ct. 564, 572, 72 L.Ed. 944 (1928):

> The makers of our Constitution undertook to secure conditions favorable to the pursuit of happiness. They recognized the significance of man's spiritual nature, of his feelings, and of his intellect. They knew that only a part of the pain, pleasure and satisfactions of life are to be found in material things. They sought to protect Americans in their beliefs, their thoughts, their emotions and their sensations. They conferred, as against the government, the right to be let alone—the most comprehensive of rights and the right most valued by civilized men.

Even earlier, in Union Pacific Railway Company v. Botsford, 141 U.S. 250, 251, 11 S.Ct. 1000, 1001, 36 L.Ed. 734 (1891), the Court said:

> No right is held more sacred, or is more carefully guarded, by the common law, than the right of every individual to the possession and control of his own person, free from all restraint and interference of others, unless by clear and unquestionable authority of law. As well said by Judge Cooley, 'The right to one's person may be said to be a right of complete immunity: to be let alone'.

We also agree with plaintiffs that whether or not to bear a child is ordinarily and up to a point within the zone of privacy of a woman and that she has the right to be let alone in making that determination. In short, it is none of the state's business whether a woman chooses to become pregnant, and beyond its province to forbid the practice of contraception. Griswold v. Connecticut, supra.

But that is not quite the question in this case. We think it is this: Can the State of North Carolina constitutionally assign to the human organism in its early prenatal development as embryo and fetus the right to be born (with certain exceptions as set out in the statute)? We think the answer must be "yes".

For the purposes of this case we assume, if we are not required to recognize, e. g., Griswold v. Connecticut, 381 U.S. 479, 85 S.Ct. 1678 (1965); Baird v. Eisenstadt, 1 Cir., 1970, 429 F.2d 1398, that as a general matter women possess under our Constitution a "fundamental right" to determine whether they shall bear children before they have become pregnant. A state may interfere with this right of choice only in special circumstances. E. g., Buck v. Bell, 274 U.S. 200, 47 S.Ct. 584, 71 L.Ed. 1000 (1927). We deal in this case, however, not merely with whether a woman has a generalized right to choose whether to bear children, but instead with the more complicated question whether a pregnant woman has the right to cause the abortion of the embryo or fetus she carries in her womb. We do not find that an equation of the generalized right of the woman to determine whether she shall bear children with the asserted right to abort an embryo or fetus is compelled by fact or logic. Exercise of the right to an abortion on request is not essential to an effective exercise of the right not to bear a child, if a child for whatever reason is not wanted. Abstinence, rhythm, contraception and sterilization are alternative means to this end. The first is, of course, infallible; the latter three are reliable to varying degrees approaching certainty. Before the "moment" of conception has occurred, see generally Ziff, Recent Abortion Law Reforms (Or Much Ado About Nothing), 60 J.Crim. L.C. & P.S. 3, 20–21 (1969), the choice whether or not to bear children is made in circumstances quite different from those in which such a choice might be made after conception. Apart, the sperm and the unfertilized egg will die; neither has the capacity to grow and develop, independently as does the fertilized egg. During fertilization, sperm and egg pool their nucleii and chromosomes. Biologically, a living organism belonging to the species homo sapiens is created out of this organization. Genetically, the adult man was from such a beginning all that he essentially has become in every cell and human attribute. See generally Gray, Anatomy of the Human Body 21–60 (Goss 27th ed. 1959); 5 Lawyers' Medical Cyclopedia § 37.1 (1960). The basic distinction between a decision whether to bear children which is made before conception and one which is made after conception is that the first contemplates the creation of a new human organism, but the latter contemplates the destruction of such an organism already created. To some engaged in the controversy over abortion, this distinction is one without a difference. These men of intelligence and good will do not perceive the human organism in the early part of its life cycle as a human "being" or "person". In their view, the granting to such an organism of the right to survive on a basis of equality with human beings generally should be delayed until a later stage in its development. To others, however, the "moment" of conception or some stage of development very close to this "moment" is the point at which distinctively human life begins. In their view, the difference between the decision not to conceive and the decision to abort is of fundamental, determinative importance. Thus the root problem in the controversy over abortion is the one of assigning value to embryonic and fetal life. See Giannella, The Difficult Quest for a Truly Humane Abortion Law, 13 Vill.L.Rev. 257 (1968).

"In considering the problem of valuing prenatal life, we heed the words of Mr. Justice Holmes:

> 'It is a misfortune if a judge reads his conscious or unconscious sympathy with one side or the other prematurely into the law, and forgets that what seem to him to be first principles are believed by half his fellow men to be wrong * * *.'

Holmes, Collected Legal Papers 295 (1920). When distinctively human life begins is a matter about which reasonable, fair-minded men are in basic disagreement. Thus this case does not concern simply whether the pregnant woman has a fundamental right to be let alone in the control of her body processes, cf. Union Pac. Ry. Co. v. Botsford, 141 U.S. 250, 11 S.Ct. 1000, 35 L. Ed. 734 (1891) (submission to surgical examination), for it is unresolved whether, in the common understanding of the society in which she lives, choice of the destiny of the human organism developing within her is a matter directly affecting only her individual rights." Rosen v. Louisiana State Board of Medical Examiners, 318 F.Supp. 1217, 1224 (E.D.La.1970) (footnotes omitted).

Our inquiry must focus on the nature and extent of the state interest necessary to justify an invasion of the fundamental right of privacy. We are mindful of Holmes' admonition in his now vindicated[2] dissent in Lochner v. State

2. See, e. g., Williamson v. Lee Optical of Oklahoma, 348 U.S. 483, 75 S.Ct. 461, 99 L.Ed. 563 (1955); Giboney v. Empire Storage and Ice Company, 336 U.S. 490, 69 S.Ct. 684, 93 L.Ed. 834 (1949); Lincoln Federal Labor Union of New York, 198 U.S. 45, 74, 25 S.Ct. 539, 49 L.Ed. 937 (1905), that the Constitution "is made for people of fundamentally differing views, and the accident of our finding certain opinions natural and familiar, or novel, and even shocking, ought not to conclude our judgment upon the question whether statutes embodying them conflict with the Constitution of the United States." 198 U.S. at 76, 25 S.Ct. at 547.

The concept of state interest is one that has evaded specific definition.[3]

> An attempt to define its reach or trace its outer limits is fruitless, for each case must turn on its own facts. The definition is essentially the product of legislative determination addressed to the purposes of government, purposes neither abstractly nor historically capable of complete definition. Subject to specific constitutional limitations, when the legislature has spoken, the public interest has been declared in terms well-nigh conclusive.

> Public safety, public health, morality, peace and quiet, law and order—these are some of the more conspicuous examples of the traditional application of the police power to municipal affairs. Yet they merely illustrate the scope of the power and do not delimit it.

Berman v. Parker, 348 U.S. 26, 32, 75 S.Ct. 98, 99 L.Ed. 27 (1954).

To determine the state interest we shall not attempt to choose between extreme positions. Whether possessing a soul from the moment of conception or mere protoplasm, the fertilized egg is, we think, "unique as a physical entity," Lucas, Federal Constitutional Limitations of the Enforcement and Administration of State Abortion Statutes, 46 N.C.L.Rev. 730, 744 (1968), with the potential to become a person. Whatever that entity is, the state has chosen to protect its very existence. The state's power to protect children is a well established constitutional maxim. See, Shelton v. Tucker, 364 U.S. 479, 485, 81 S.Ct. 247, 5 L.Ed.2d 231 (1960); Prince v. Massachusetts, 321 U.S. 158, at 166–168, 64 S.Ct. 438, 88 L.Ed. 645. That this power should be used to protect a fertilized egg or embryo or fetus during the period of gestation embodies no logical infirmity, but would seemingly fall within the "plenary power of government." Poe v. Ullman, 367 U.S. 497, at 539, 81 S.Ct. 1752, 6 L.Ed.2d 989 (Harlan, J., dissenting). That there is a state interest has until recently been taken for granted. History sides with the state.[4]

In Babbitz v. McCann, 310 F.Supp. 293 (E.D.Wis.1970), a three-judge court sitting in judgment of Wisconsin's abortion law recognized the interest of the unborn child as well as that of the mother. That court chose to weigh the two: "For the purposes of this decision, we think it is sufficient to conclude that the mother's interests [before quickening] are superior to that of an unquickened embryo, * * *" Id. at 301. See also, Roe v. Wade, 314 F.Supp. 1217 (N.D.Tex.1970). Striking such a balance is not unreasonable. It may, indeed, be wide, humane and enlightened, but we

3. See, e. g., United States v. O'Brien, 391 U.S. 367, 88 S.Ct. 1673, 20 L.Ed.2d 672 (1968).

4. Under the common law in England, and in the early periods of this country's existence, it was a crime to commit acts leading to an abortion only after "quickening", but the scope of the prohibited period was extended to cover the entire time from conception to natural birth by statute in this country beginning in the latter part of the nineteenth century. Lucas, Federal Constitutional Limitations on the Enforcement and Administration of State Abortion Statutes, 46 N.C.L.Rev. 730, 731–35 (1968). The North Carolina statute in question was enacted in its original form in 1881 and thereafter not amended until 1967.

submit it is a value judgment not committed to the discretion of judges but reposing instead in the representative branch of government. Although there is a difference between social due process and the discredited economic due process of Lochner, supra, there is, we think, no real distinction. Both involve values. As Mr. Justice Frankfurter wrote:

> Courts can fulfill their responsibility in a democratic society only to the extent that they succeed in shaping their judgments by rational standards, and rational standards are both impersonal and communicable. Matters of policy, however, are by definition matters which demand the resolution of conflicts of value, and the elements of conflicting values are largely imponderable. Assessment of their competing worth involves differences of feeling; it is also an exercise in prophesy. Obviously the proper forum for mediating a clash of feelings and rendering a prophetic judgment is the body chosen for those purposes by the people.

American Federation of Labor v. American Sash & Door Co., 335 U.S. 538, 557, 69 S.Ct. 258, 267, 93 L.Ed. 222 (1949).

Persuasive, therefore, as the host of statistics, facts and opinions plaintiffs urge upon us appear to be, and as commendable as the efforts plaintiffs have shown in their attempt to right what is considered by many a social wrong are, we must decline what we consider to be an invitation to decide what is best for North Carolina.[5] The legislature is the proper arena for the resolution of "fundamentally differing views." [6]

II.

[5] The plaintiffs also challenge the constitutionality of the residency requirement contained in G.S. § 14–45.1 limiting the availability of therapeutic abortions to those women who have "resided in the State of North Carolina for a period of at least four months immediately preceding the operation being performed except in the case of emergency where the life of the said woman is in danger." The basis of the attack on the constitutionality of this provision is that it unduly infringes upon the fundamental right to travel guaranteed to all citizens. Shapiro v. Thompson, 394 U.S. 618, 89 S.Ct. 1322, 22 L.Ed.2d 600 (1968); United States v. Guest, 383 U.S. 745, 86 S.Ct. 1170, 16 L.Ed.2d 239 (1966). See also, Keenan v. Board of Law Examiners of State of North Carolina, 317 F.Supp. 1350 (E.D.N.C.1970).

The state expresses a fear that has not materialized; taxation of our hospital facilities by an influx of out of state patients seeking abortions. We think our law is not so liberal. But if any protection is needed, the sweep of the provisions in 14–45.1 far exceeds the scope of the interest by penalizing those who enter North Carolina with the bona fide intent of making the state their permanent residence. "[T]he effect of the waiting-period requirement * * * is to create two classes * * * indistinguishable from each other except that one is composed of residents * * *." Shapiro v. Thompson, supra, at 627, 89 S.Ct. at 1327.

We conclude that the requirement is overbroad. The interest of the state in maintenance of quality medical treatment for its citizens can be effected without such unnecessary discrimination against other citizens of the United States. In the unlikely event medical facilities should become overtaxed, some fair system of priority, short of flat

5. Since the state's interest in the protection of the embryo is sufficient to support the legislation, we need not consider the interest in protecting the mother's health except to say we think that interest is exhausted with the sensible requirement that no unlicensed practitioner may perform an abortion. Apparently, abortions by competent medical doctors within the first three months are no more dangerous to life and health than live births. See, People v. Belous, 80 Cal.Rptr. 354, 362, 458 P.2d 194, 200–201 (1969).

exclusion of non-residents, may be devised.

III.

[6] G.S. § 14–44 makes it a felony to willfully administer to any woman who is pregnant or quick with child any substance whatever with intent to destroy such child. G.S. § 14–45 is virtually identical but the evil intent proscribed is to procure a miscarriage or injure or destroy the woman. The thrust of 14–44 is to protect the unborn child and the thrust of 14–45 to protect the pregnant woman.

G.S. § 14–45.1, enacted in 1967, provides that G.S. §§ 14–44 and 14–45 do not apply when an abortion is performed by a doctor of medicine, licensed in North Carolina, "if he can reasonably establish that":

(1) There is substantial risk that continuation of the pregnancy would threaten the life or gravely impair the health of the woman or;

(2) substantial risk the child would be born with grave physical or mental defect or;

(3) the pregnancy resulted from rape or incest.

The foregoing are the three reasons that will suffice under North Carolina law to make abortion lawful. The rest of 14–45.1 establishes certain procedures that must be followed:

(1) the woman, or if she is a minor or incompetent, someone acting for her, must give her written consent to the abortion;

(2) the abortion must be performed in a hospital licensed by the North Carolina Medical Care Commission;

(3) three doctors must have certified in writing the circumstances they believe to justify the abortion and the certificate furnished to the hospital. There is a provision that in an emergency the certificate may be submitted to the hospital within 24 hours after the abortion.

Although we may not interpret a state statute with finality, for that is the province of North Carolina's highest court, we think the words in G.S. § 14–45.1 authorizing abortion by a medical doctor "* * * if he can reasonably establish that * * *" simply means that the doctor must establish to his own satisfaction that one of the three statutory reasons for abortion exists before he may lawfully proceed. We would not lightly assume that the legislature meant to make all abortions unlawful unless in a criminal prosecution the medical doctor could reasonably establish his innocence. The presumption of innocence is deeply rooted in our fundamental law. To read the statute so as to place the burden of proof upon the defendant in a criminal prosecution would offend a maxim implicit in due process—that the accused is presumed innocent until proven guilty. Coffin v. United States, 156 U.S. 432, 453–460, 15 S.Ct. 394, 39 L.Ed. 481 (1895). See also, United States v. Vuitch, 305 F. Supp. 1032, 1034 (D.D.C.1969). The burden of proof must be upon the state to show that the conditions for performing therapeutic abortions, a substantial risk to the life or the health of the mother, or a substantial risk that the child would be born with grave physical or mental defect, or rape or incest, were not present. Due process forbids that the accused be required to establish to the court and jury that the abortion performed came within the exemptions of the statute.

We think this was unquestionably the legislative intent, and since the statute can be saved only by such an interpretation, we do not hesitate to put that construction upon it.

An appropriate judgment will be entered declaring the statutes constitutional except for the residency requirement.

OPINION

DON J. YOUNG, District Judge.

This is another in a series of cases which have been and are being filed in various courts throughout the United States attacking the constitutionality of state statutes forbidding abortions. This particular action was brought under Title 28 U.S.C. §§ 1331-1343, Title 28 U.S.C. §§ 2201 and 2202, Title 28 U.S.C. §§ 2281 and 2284, and Title 42 U.S.C. § 1983. The plaintiffs seek a declaratory judgment that Ohio's abortion statute, Section 2901.16 Ohio Rev.

Code,[1] is unconstitutional under the First, Fourth, Fifth, Eighth, Ninth, and Fourteenth Amendments to the Constitution of the United States. They also seek injunctive relief against the enforcement of the statute. Hence a three judge court was convened to hear and determine the matter.

The plaintiffs claim that each of them represents a class of persons who are affected by the Ohio statute complained of. One plaintiff is a physician specializing in obstetrics and gynecology; one is a psychiatrist; one is a social worker; one is a minister of religion; and the final one is a young woman, married but separated from her husband, the mother of one child born in wedlock, and at the time of commencement of the action early in September, 1970, eight to ten weeks pregnant with another child conceived in wedlock.

The defendants named in the amended complaint are the Governor and Attorney General of the State of Ohio, the Prosecuting Attorney of Lucas County, Ohio, wherein this Division of the District Court sits, and the Chief of Police of the City of Toledo, the county seat of Lucas County.

The amended complaint seeks a declaratory judgment that Section 2901.16 Ohio Rev.Code is in violation of the rights of the plaintiffs under the six amendments to the Constitution listed above and for injunctive relief.

A motion for a temporary restraining order was heard and overruled by the single judge of the Western Division of the Northern District of Ohio, and a motion to intervene as a party defendant on behalf of the unborn child of the plaintiff Mary Doe, and the class of unborn children of the women of the class represented by Mary Doe, filed by Homer Schroeder, M. D. was granted by this single judge.

Dr. Schroeder also filed a motion to be appointed as Guardian ad Litem for the unborn child, and motions for leave to file briefs amicus curiae were filed by a group of some forty organizations and individuals supporting the plaintiffs, and by the Ohio Right to Life Society, Inc. supporting the defendants. Various other motions were filed, including motions by all of the defendants except the intervening defendant Schroeder to dismiss the complaint, and a motion of the plaintiff to dismiss the intervening defendant Schroeder.

The motions to dismiss were overruled, as were the motion to appoint a guardian ad litem for the unborn child and children, and the other technical motions. The two principal motions for leave to file briefs amicus curiae were granted.

The case was submitted upon the evidence offered at the hearing on the motion for a temporary restraining order, certain stipulations, the deposition of John F. Hillabrand, M. D., the briefs, and arguments of counsel.

The evidence indicated that the plaintiffs Steinberg and Fitzgerald had been consulted by the plaintiff Mary Doe. When Dr. Steinberg examined her on October second, she appeared to be eight to ten weeks pregnant, but he testified that another doctor might think she was twelve to fourteen weeks pregnant. He also testified that she was in normal physical condition, and that her previ-

1. Ohio's abortion statute provides:

> No person shall prescribe or administer a medicine, drug, or substance, or use an instrument or other means with intent to procure the miscarriage of a woman, unless such miscarriage is necessary to preserve her life, or is advised by two physicians to be necessary for that purpose.
> Whoever violates this section, if the woman either miscarries or dies in consequence thereof, shall be imprisoned not less than one nor more than seven years.

This statute or one very similar to it has been in effect since at least 1834. Section 1 of the Act of February 7, 1834, S & C Stat. 440. Wilson v. State, 2 Ohio St. 319 (1853). There have been many prosecutions under it but until the present case, so far as we have been able to ascertain, no one has ever challenged its constitutionality.

ous pregnancy had been normal, with no complications. He further testified that at that stage of her pregnancy, abortion would present less hazard to life than to carry the child to term, but this situation would not continue, as the hazards of abortion increase later in pregnancy.

The plaintiff psychiatrist, Dr. Fitzgerald, testified that Mary Doe had a serious defect in her ability to make judgments about people and situations; that her daydreams influenced her more than the actual facts; that she was moderately depressed and withdrawn; that she was seriously disturbed, and presented gross or serious defects in her ego-functioning; that she could become a child-battering mother; and that she irrationally rejected the alternative to abortion of carrying the child to term and then consenting to adoptive placement. However, he did not predict that she would either die or kill herself if this pregnancy were carried to term, although it would do her grave psychological harm. He stated that the likelihood of great damage coming to the infant from neglect or abuse were high indeed. It was his conclusion that in such states as California or Colorado, Mary Doe could receive therapeutic approval for abortion on psychiatric and medical grounds.

The evidence revealed that Mary Doe was a welfare recipient in Wood County, Ohio, adjacent to Lucas County. She is twenty-one years old.

Both of the plaintiff doctors testified that they believed they would be violating the Ohio abortion statute if they advised the plaintiff Mary Doe to seek an abortion outside the State of Ohio, although it was stipulated in evidence that no physician had ever been prosecuted in Lucas County for a violation of Section 2901.16 Ohio Rev.Code as an aider and abettor on the ground that he counselled or procured an abortion, nor had any minister or social worker. It was also stipulated that no such prosecutions had ever been threatened, nor had any of the plaintiffs ever been warned by any law enforcement authorities.

The only other evidence in the case was the deposition of Dr. Hillabrand offered by the defendants. This concerned the development of unborn children from conception to birth. It also offered statistical evidence that the risk of maternal mortality was far higher from abortions performed even under clinical conditions than from carrying the child until natural childbirth. This testimony is, of course, in square conflict with that of the plaintiff Steinberg, but it is unnecessary for the purposes of this opinion to resolve this conflict, since it involves policy considerations which are properly legislative, rather than judicial, concerns.

This case presents threshold questions of the right to injunctive relief, standing of the plaintiffs to maintain the action, and the doctrine of abstention. These problems have been considered in other similar cases.

[1] The question of standing is considered in Roe v. Wade, 314 F.Supp. 1217 (N.D.Texas 1970), and Doe v. Bolton, 319 F.Supp. 1048 (N.D.Georgia 1970). Both cases resolved the question favorably to parties who stood in the positions of the plaintiffs here. We accept the conclusions in these cases, and hold that the plaintiffs herein have proper standing to maintain this action. Cf. Flast v. Cohen, 392 U.S. 83, 88 S.Ct. 1942, 20 L.Ed.2d 947 (1968).

[2] The problem of abstention was considered and abstention denied in the case of Babbitz v. McCann, 310 F.Supp. 293 (E.D.Wis.1970) app. dis. 400 U.S. 1, 91 S.Ct. 12, 27 L.Ed.2d 1 (1970). See also, Doe v. Bolton, supra. There was no proof that prosecution of any of the plaintiffs was commenced or even threatened. Plaintiffs are therefore not entitled to injunctive relief. The prayer for injunction restraining the enforcement of the statute is therefore denied.

This then requires a resolution of the merits of the plaintiffs' request for declaratory relief, to which we now address ourselves.

The plaintiffs' first contention is that Section 2901.16 Ohio Rev.Code is unconstitutionally vague and indefinite. This same contention has been raised in a number of cases, involving statutes of different states. There are differences in language among all of the various statutes that have been brought before the courts, and by using the same sort of hair-splitting semanticism that the plaintiffs have employed in argument, it would be possible to distinguish the Ohio statute from the others. It does not appear to us, however, that there is sufficient difference in substance among the various statutes involved in other cases to make it desirable to use so narrow and limited an approach to the problem. It seems preferable to take a stand with one group or the other of the divided authorities.

Abortion statutes have been held unconstitutionally vague in the cases of California v. Belous, (1969) 71 Cal.2d 954, 80 Cal.Rptr. 354, 458 P.2d 194, cert. denied, 397 U.S. 915, 90 S.Ct. 920, 25 L.Ed.2d 96 (1970); United States v. Vuitch, 305 F.Supp. 1032 (D.D.C.1969), prob. juris. noted, 397 U.S. 1061, 90 S.Ct. 1497, 25 L.Ed.2d 683 (1970); and Roe v. Wade, 314 F.Supp. 1217 (N.D. Texas 1970). Contrary holdings are found in Babbitz v. McCann, supra and Rosen v. Louisiana State Board of Medical Examiners, 318 F.Supp. 1217 (E.D. La. New Orleans Div. 1970). The question was raised, but not decided, in Doe v. Bolton, supra.

[3] We believe that the better reasoning is found in those cases which hold that there is no unconstitutional vagueness in the abortion statutes which they consider. It appears to us that the vagueness which disturbs the plaintiffs herein results from their own strained construction of the language used, coupled with the modern notion among law review writers that anything that is not couched in numerous paragraphs of fine-spun legal terminology is too imprecise to support a criminal conviction. See Davis v. Toledo Metropolitan Housing Authority, 311 F.Supp. 795, 797 (N.D.Ohio W.D.1970). The words of the Ohio statute, taken in their ordinary meaning, have over a long period of years proved entirely adequate to inform the public, including both lay and professional people, of what is forbidden. The problem of the plaintiffs is not that they do not understand, but that basically they do not accept, its proscription.

The second contention of the plaintiffs and those amicus curiae who support their position is that the Ohio abortion statute deprives them of the right of privacy which is supposedly protected by several amendments to the Constitution of the United States. The arguments and authorities cited go on at inordinate length, but when the meringue is sluiced away, they come down to the contention that the decision of the Supreme Court in Griswold v. Connecticut, 381 U.S. 479, 85 S.Ct. 1678, 14 L.Ed.2d 510 (1965), which recognized the right of marital privacy by voiding a statute preventing dissemination of contraceptive information and devices, must by extension protect the right to destroy the product of conception after it has taken place.

[4] Again the authorities are divided, some courts accepting the plaintiffs' view, and others refusing to do so. The majority of this Court do not accept the plaintiffs' contentions as constitutionally valid, but believes that the cases which do accept them have not been based on a proper legal or factual understanding. The plaintiffs' contentions seek to extend far beyond the holding in the Griswold case this "right of privacy", which is nowhere expressly mentioned in the Constitution or its amendments, but is only found in the "penumbra" of those articles. Rights, the provision of which is only implied or deduced, must inevitably fall in conflict with the express provisions of the Fifth and Fourteenth Amendments that no person shall be deprived of life without due process of law. The difference between this case and Griswold is clearly apparent, for here there is an embryo or fetus incapable of protecting itself. There, the only lives were those of two competent adults.

[5] Without going into all of the myriad of cases and texts that deal with various aspects of this problem, the question resolves itself into whether or not the state has a legitimate interest to legislate for the purpose of affording an embryonic or fetal organism an opportunity to survive. We think it has and on balance it is superior to the claimed right of a pregnant woman or anyone else to destroy the fetus except when necessary to preserve her own life.

One of the great puzzles of the law is why its practitioners blithely argue their cases and make their decision in total disregard, if not ignorance, of the laws of nature. Automobile collision cases, for example, are often decided on the basis of facts which are completely impossible under the physical laws of motion and mechanics. So in this area, those decisions which strike down state abortion statutes by equating contraception and abortion pay no attention to the facts of biology.

The evidence offered by the defendants in this case shows clearly, conclusively, and in detail that neither the human ovum or spermatozoon are alive, or capable of independent life, in the accepted meaning of that word. One dictionary definition of the word "life" is > that quality or character [that] distinguishes an animal or a plant from inorganic or dead organic bodies and which is especially manifested by metabolism, growth, reproduction and internal powers of adaptation to the environment. Webster's New International Dictionary of the English Language (2nd ed. 1934).

Biologically, when the spermatozoon penetrates and fertilizes the ovum, the result is the creation of a new organism which conforms to the definition of life just given. Although this is a definite beginning, there is no assurance in any particular case as to how long the life thus begun will continue. It may endure only a few hours or days, or it may continue in excess of a century, so far as human life is concerned. In other life forms it may continue for many measurable centuries, or even for an immeasurable and endless period. Thus when a new life comes into being with the union of human egg and sperm cells, it may terminate, or be terminated, at any moment after it commences, and before, at, or after the particular developmental process called "birth" takes place. Such terms as "quick" or "viable", which are frequently encountered in legal discussion, are scientifically imprecise and without recognized medical meaning, and hence irrelevant to the problem here presented. As scientific knowledge of prenatal physiological processes increases, medical intervention will have a greater chance of avoiding premature termination of lives of children, both before and after birth.
